AMPHLETT, B.—The first question which I think it will be convenient to consider in this case is whether the damage for which compensation can be claimed under the 45th clause of the Drainage

Act is confined to actionable damage. Now it could not be, and was not, in fact, denied on the part of the plaintiffs that by a long series of cases of which I need only mention the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Mac. 229), it is perfectly settled that the right to compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act 1845 is limited to actionable damage. It is true that the language of the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, which speaks of lands "being injuriously affected," is slightly more favourable to the limited construction, but the courts have adopted the same construction in analogous cases where the language used was practically identical with that of the clause we are considering:—In The New River Company v. Johnson (2 E. & E. 435; 29 L. J. 93, M. C.) under the Waterworks Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) where the words were "that in the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act the undertakers shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full compensation to all parties interested for all damage sustained by them through the exercise of such powers," and in Hall v. The Mayor, &c. of Bristol (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 322; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 572; 36 L. J. 110, C. P.) under the Public Health Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) where the words were "that full compensation shall be made . . . to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act." I cannot but think, under these circumstances, that it would be very undesirable on light grounds to disturb this unanimity of decision upon a point constantly arising in practice, and which with the single example of Lord Westbury in Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542, 547; L. Rep. 2 H. L. 176, 200), has been approved of on general grounds by almost all who have taken part in such decisions. But it was argued on the part of the plaintiffs that the Legislature must have used the word "damage" in a more extended sense in the 45th section, since otherwise that section would have given the owners and occupiers of the lands mentioned therein no further protection than they would be entitled to under the Lands Clauses Act. I think, however, that there are two answers to that argument. First, having regard to the decision in the King v. The Directors of the Bristol Dock Company (12 East, 429); and the language of Lords Cranworth and St. Leonards in the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (sup.), I think it would be an arguable question (and that is sufficient for this purpose) whether persons who have rights in respect of a public road or a public river, the same in principle, but different in degree from other people, could claim compensation under the Lands Clauses Act for damage either to one or the other which was authorised by Act of Parliament; secondly, the compensation given by the 45th clause of the Drainage Act is quite different from that given by the Lands Clauses Act. In the latter case compensation is given once for all, whereas in the former case it is to be given from time to time, the reason, no doubt, for which was that as the only damage that could accrue to the lower lands from the improved drainage of the upper would be at flood times it would be impossible to estimate the damage except when the floods happened. These reasons satisfactorily account for the introduction of the special clauses without supposing the Legislature intended to enlarge the subject matter of compensation. Indeed, looking at the object of the Act, which was for the more effectual drainage of a large tract of country, which is expressly recited to be, as it manifestly was, for the public benefit, it is difficult to suppose that the Legislature intended that the commissioners in the execution of their duties should be hampered by claims for compensation in respect of acts which the riparian proprietors had a common law right to do with impunity, and if the Legislature had any such intention, it is strange that they should have used language which had already at that time acquired by judicial decision a more limited sense. In my judgment, therefore, the first point ought to be decided, if it should be necessary, in favour of defendants. Then arises a question how the amount of such actionable damage (if any) is to be ascertained. By the terms of the Act in case of dispute such amount is to be settled by arbitration as provided in the Lands Clauses Act, and it is now settled, after a great conflict of opinion among the judges, that the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, or in this case the umpire, is confined to settling the amount, and does not enable them to determine what is or is not actionable damage as distinguished from damage in fact. The Queen v. The London and North Western Railway Company (sup.), Chapman v. The Monmouthshire Railway Company (2 H. & N. 267; 27 L. J. 97, Ex.), Bradley v. The Southampton Local Board of Health (sup.), and numerous other cases are to be found in the reports, where the same point is either decided or recognised. It follows from these decisions that after the award it is competent to the defendants in an action to recover the amount awarded to deny that there was any actionable damage, and if they succeed in that issue the award will fall to the ground. So far I think there is at the present day no room for controversy, but then in the present case, since the plaintiffs produced no evidence but the award itself, the question arises whether the award, though ex concessis not conclusive, is not prima facie evidence of actionable damage. On the part of the defendants in this case it may be said that it would be very extraordinary to hold that the finding of the umpire in a matter in respect of which, according to the decision, he had no jurisdiction at all should, nevertheless, have the effect of changing the onus probandi from the plaintiffs to the defendants, which might in some cases, and probably in this, be of vital importance, and the remarks of Coleridge, J., at the end of his elaborate judgment in The Queen v. The London and North Western Railway Company (sup.), as to the inconvenience of even a preliminary and inconclusive inquiry when there is to be a second and conclusive trial, are well worth attending to. Those remarks, however, were made in a case where the damage was capable of being assessed on the assumption that the road alleged to be stopped was a public road. Without going into the question whether that assumption was correct in point of fact or not, it does not apply in a case like this, when it was absolutely necessary for the umpire to ascertain from what acts of the defendants the damage arose, and certainly it would be a most lamentable waste of time and money to prove that matter over again in the action. Upon the whole I am of opinion that these conflicting views may be best reconciled by holding, as I am disposed to do, that the award ought to be taken as prima facie evidence of the particular acts which give rise to the damage, but not any evidence at all on the question whether such damage was actionable or not, that being according to the decisions altogether beyond the jurisdiction of the umpire to determine. The only question then which remains is whether the finding of the umpire in respect of those acts enable the court to decide that the damage arising from them is all actionable; for if they do I think there was a case on the mere evidence of the award when put in which called upon the defendants for an answer. Now if the case had depended upon the first part of the award, before we came to the special case, I should have thought the court could not have so decided, because it merely finds that the damages assessed arose from the exercise of the powers of the Act, some of which extend to acts which might have been done by the landowners without making themselves liable to an action, and there would be nothing in the award itself to show that the damages attributable to the last mentioned acts were excluded. I think, however, that the latter part of the award ought not to be excluded altogether from consideration, and that we must read the award by the light of the facts subsequently stated in the special case. Now, it is there stated, sect. 6, that there were four distinct classes of works taken into consideration by the umpire: First, diversions of tributaries; second, new cuts; third, removal of shoals; fourth, removal of weir, and all these, excepting perhaps the removal of the shoals, of which I shall say a word presently, were clearly acts in respect of which damage would be actionable. Probably from not having seen the evidence, or knowing the way in which the case was shaped before the umpire, I find it very difficult to ascertain the exact meaning of the subsequent findings, but I think it must be taken to be this: The damage I have assessed has been occasioned by the four classes of works I have mentioned. I have ascertained that the removal of the weir made no substantial difference, and I am unable to ascertain whether the works, exclusive of the shoals or weir, would or would not have produced damage. This amounts, in my opinion, to a finding that the damage was caused by the conjoint result of three acts, and that the proportion due to each it was impossible to ascertain, and if that is so, the damage would be actionable, although that arising from one of these acts, if it could have been assessed separately, would not have been so. Entertaining this view of the construction of the award it is unnecessary to determine whether damage from the removal of the shoals alone would have been actionable. I will only say, therefore, that I think that question one of considerable difficulty, and on which very little authority can be found in the books, and I should be very reluctant to decide it without having before me all material circumstances both as to the formation and as to the removal of the shoals. For the above reasons, I think that it sufficiently appears from the award itself, that the damage assessed was actionable damage, and that consequently the rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

BAKER (BART.) v. THE VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE.

Damage to private property by public works—Raising level of streets—Obstruction of ancient lights—Property injuriously affected—Claim to compensation for—St. Marylebone (Local) Acts (35 Geo. 3, c. 73, s. 53; 57 Geo. 3, c. 29, s. 52)—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (3 Vict. c. 18, ss. 6 to 15, and 16 to 68)—Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 98-150, 151, 152)—Incorporation of Lands Clauses Act in Metropolitan Act—Exclusion of compulsory clauses—Construction.

The defendants, as the vestry of St. Marylebone, were empowered by local Acts (35 Geo. 3, c. 73, and 57 Geo. 3, c. 29), to pave and repair, and to raise or lower the ground of the streets within their district, "without making compensation to owners of property thereby injured."

The Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), by sect. 98 empowers every vestry to pave and repair, and to raise or lower the ground or soil of the streets in their district as they think fit; and by sect. 150 they have power to purchase "any land or any right or easement in or over land," necessary for the formation or protection of any works authorised to be executed under the Act. By sects. 151 and 152 the Lands Clauses Act of 1845 (3 Vict. c. 18), except the compulsory purchase clauses, 16 to 68, which are expressly excluded, is incorporated; and by sect. 247 all Acts which are inconsistent with the Metropolitan Act are repealed.

Under the provisions of the said Acts, or one or more of them, the defendants raised and altered the road and pavement of a street in their district in a manner justified by the said Act, but thereby obstructed the ancient lights of and entrances to certain houses of the plaintiff, and "injuriously affected" the said houses.

Notice was given to the defendants under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act to summon a jury to settle the amount of compensation, but the defendants refused to pay the compensation claimed, or to enter into any agreement, or to summon a jury.

Held by the court, Bramwell, Cleasby, and Huddleston, BB. (although doubting whether the Legislature intended that a public body should be enabled for the public benefit to do an injury to an individual without giving him compensation) that the works were done under the local Acts of Geo. 3, which were not repealed or superseded by the Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855; that, there having been no agreement to purchase, sects. 150, 151, and 152 of the Metropolitan Act did not apply; and that sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act being expressly excluded from the Metropolitan Act, the plaintiff had no claim under that section, and, therefore, the case was governed and concluded by Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers for London in the Exchequer Chamber (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 295), and the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation.

Per Bramwell, B.—Sect. 150 of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, means that the vestry may acquire an easement in or over land, and not that they may purchase an already existing easement belonging to somebody else.

Quære (per Bramwell, B.), whether sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act of 1845 is limited to compulsory purchase.

THIS is an action brought for the recovery of 250L. for damages occasioned to certain houses and tenements of the plaintiff by the defendants under the circumstances hereinafter stated, and by consent and by judge's order, dated 2nd July 1875, according to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, there has been stated for the opinion of the court, without any pleadings, the following:

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiff is tenant for life of certain houses, known as Christ Church-buildings, situated in Little James-street, Lisson-grove, Marylebone, and which are now occupied by the Marylebone Association for Improving the Dwellings of the Industrial Classes, under a lease of which there are seventeen years still to run. The said houses have in them ancient lights overlooking Little James-street, Lisson-grove.

2. The defendants are the Vestry of St. Marylebone, in the county of Middlesex.

3. By the 53rd section of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, being an Act among other purposes for paving, repairing, cleansing, and lighting the parish of St. Marylebone, it was enacted that it shall and may be lawful to and for the vestrymen of the said parish to pave and keep in repair, or to cause to be paved and kept in repair, from time to time, all or any of the streets within the limit of the Act, and likewise to cause the ground thereof to be raised or lowered in such places, manner, and form, as they shall judge best.

4. By the 52nd section of 57 Geo. 3, c. 29 (local), being an Act for better paving, and improving, and regulating the streets of the metropolis, and for other purposes, it was enacted that it shall and may be lawful to and for the commissioners or trustees or other persons having the control of the pavements of the streets, in any parochial or other district within the jurisdiction of the said Act, from time to time to pave and keep in repair, or cause to be paved and kept in repair, all or any part or parts of the carriage ways or footways of all or any of the streets or public places in their respective parochial or other districts within the jurisdiction of the Act, and that they or their respective surveyor or surveyors of the pavements, or any inspectors or other officers by them appointed for the time being, shall and may from time to time cause the ground of any streets or public places within their respective parochial or other districts, to be raised or lowered in such manner as they or he should think necessary.

5. The Vestry of Saint Marylebone are the persons having control of the pavement of Little James-street, Lisson-grove, in the parish of Saint Marylebone, within the meaning of the said Act.

6. By the 98th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, being an Act for the better local management of the metropolis, it is enacted that it shall be lawful for every vestry and district board from time to time to cause all or any of the streets within their parish or district, or any part thereof respectively to be paved or repaired when and as often and in such form and manner and with such materials as such vestry or board think fit, and to cause the ground or soil thereof to be raised or lowered, and the course of the channels running in into or through the same to be turned or altered in such a manner as they think proper.

7. The defendants under the provisions of the said Acts, or one or more of them, have raised and altered the road and pavement of the said Little James-street, which is a street within the limits and jurisdiction of the said Act. Such raising and alteration of the said road and pavement was done in a manner justified by the said Act.

8. In consequence of the said works in the last paragraph mentioned, the ground floor of Christ Church-buildings is converted into an underground floor more than 8ft. below the said street, and the light and air of the said ground floor of the said buildings are seriously affected. The plaintiff alleges that the ground floor is rendered unfit for human habitation, but this the defendants deny. An area wall has been built within 3ft. of the windows of the ground floor of the said buildings, and the access to the said buildings has been blocked up and a new door and other alterations have become necessary by reason of the above-mentioned works of the vestry. A plan of such works is annexed hereto and forms part of this case.

9. In consequence of the said works the said buildings together with the said ancient lights in the said ground floor have been injuriously affected, and it has been agreed that if the defendants are held liable they shall pay for such injury the sum of 250L.

10. By sect. 151 of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), it is enacted as follows: "For the purpose of enabling the said metropolitan board and every district board and vestry to obtain any land or right or easement in or over any land which they respectively may require for the purposes of this Act, The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, except the provision of the Act with respect to the recovery of forfeitures, penalties, and costs, shall, subject to the provisions herein contained, be incorporated with this Act, and the provisions of the said Act so incorporated with this Act, which would be applicable in the case of a purchase of any land, shall be applicable in the case of the purchase of a right or easement in or over any land;" and by sect. 152 of the said Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), it is enacted "That the provisions of the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, shall not be incorporated with this Act, save for enabling the Metropolitan Board of Works to take land or any right or easement in or over land for the purpose of making any sewers or works for preventing the sewage or any part of the sewage within the metropolis from passing into the Thames, in or near the metropolis, or otherwise, for the purpose of the sewerage or drainage of the metropolis; provided also, that no land or right or easement, in or over land, for the purposes aforesaid shall be taken compulsorily by the said board without the previous consent in writing of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State."

No such consent has been obtained.

11. For the purposes of this case, but not otherwise, it is to be taken that the plaintiff gave notice to the defendants, under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, to summon a jury to settle the amount of compensation payable by the defendants to the plaintiff by reason of his premises having been injuriously affected as aforesaid. And that the defendants refused to pay the compensation so claimed, or to enter into a written agreement for the purpose, or to summon a jury within twenty-one days after the receipt of such notice.

12. For the purposes of this case, but not otherwise, it is to be taken that all notices required by the Lands Clauses Act have been given.

13. The said Acts of Parliament are to be taken as part of this special case.

14. The court is to have power to draw all inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the above-mentioned circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendants the above-mentioned sum of 250*l.*, or any part thereof.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for 250*l.*, or such other sum as the court shall name, with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment, with costs of defence, shall be entered up for the defendants.

The plaintiff's points for argument.—First, that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is incorporated in the special Act. Sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act confers the right to compensation to the claimant. Secondly, that the damage sustained by the claimant is the subject of compensation. Thirdly, that inasmuch as the right of action has been taken away by statute, the claimant is entitled to compensation. Fourthly, that there is nothing in the special Act to destroy the claimant's right to compensation by reason of the works carried out under the Metropolis Local Management Act.

Points of argument for the defendants.—First, that by the Acts of Parliament mentioned in the special case the defendants are expressly authorised to alter the level of the streets within their district, and to do the matters complained of in the special case. Secondly, that the said Acts of Parliament do not impose on the defendants the obligation of making compensation to the owners of property injuriously affected by the doing of the matters complained of. Thirdly, that it is expressly provided by the 152nd section of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 20), that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act shall not be incorporated with the said Act except for sewerage or drainage purposes. Fourthly, that the matters complained of were not done by the defendants for such excepted purposes. Fifthly, that the clause about obtaining the previous consent of one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State only applies to land or rights or easements in or over land taken for such purposes, and is not applicable to the present case.

A. L. Smith (with him was Joyce) for the plaintiff.—The decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversing the decision of this court in the case of Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers for London (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 295; L. Rep. 4 Ex.; 38 L. J. 202, Ex.) is, I must admit, conclusive upon the present question against the plaintiff, unless the two cases can be distinguished, which it is submitted they can be. In Ferrar's case it was decided that when the Lands Clauses Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18) was incorporated in the special Act under which the defendants there acted, but with the express exception of its compulsory clauses, the plaintiff, whose house was blocked up by the road being raised above its previous level, was not entitled to any compensation, and had no remedy either by action of trespass or for recovery of money damages. [BRAMWELL, B.—Do you mean that you are entitled to judgment if you would have been entitled to compensation under the Lands Clauses Act? Certainly, if the defendants have done wrong. [BRAMWELL, B.—If they have a right to stop up your lights on making compensation under the Act, that would not be doing wrong.] Not if they paid us. [Sir H. James, Q.C.—It may save time to state the issue the defendants seek to raise, viz., that under their local Acts they were justified in doing what they have done, and that no compensation has been given. In the first place, sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act is not incorporated in any Act under which the defendants did their works; and if it were, still what they have done is not an "injuriously affecting." I admit that if we have committed any tort, or if the court think we are bound by sect. 68 to give compensation, or, in other words, if we come within that section, then the plaintiff is entitled to the sum which he claims.] It may be taken then as admitted by the defendants, that if the plaintiff could maintain trespass or a claim for compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, he is entitled to judgment. Now in Ferrar's case (ubi sup.) a private Act enabled the commissioners to raise the street, and that private Act incorporated the Lands Clauses Act, and made its provisions applicable to the special Act, "except so far as the same provisions were inconsistent therewith or were therein declared not to extend thereto;" and the Exchequer Chamber held that, inasmuch as sect. 68, and what Lord Cairns called that "faggot of clauses" comprised under the heading, "with respect to the purchasing and taking of land otherwise than by agreement," were excluded, therefore there was no right to compensation to one whose land had been "injuriously affected." Were the Metropolitan Act here the same as the special Act in that case I could not distinguish the two cases. But the present case is governed by, and must be decided by, the true construction of the Metropolitan Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), sects. 98 and 247 of which repealed, or at all events superseded, the two Acts of Geo. 3 stated in the case. These works, therefore, were executed under the Metropolitan Act. By sect. 96 of that Act the vestries are made surveyors of highways, and by sect. 98 power is given to them to repair and raise or lower the level of the roads, and it is that section probably on which the defendants rely as entitling them to destroy the plaintiff's ancient lights and pay him nothing for so doing. Then comes sect. 150, by which the vestry is authorised to purchase easements. [BRAMWELL, B.—Does not that section mean that they may acquire an easement, and not that they may purchase an already existing easement belonging to somebody else? The plaintiffs here had an easement of ancient lights over this street or road ("an easement in or over land," in the words of sect. 151) and that easement the defendants required for the purpose of their works. Under sect. 150 (a) they had power to purchase such an easement, and it must be assumed that they agreed to do so under that power, or they would have been trespassers. Then, by sects. 151 and 152, the whole of the Lands Clauses Act, except only the compulsory purchase clauses, is incorporated, and therefore the plaintiff has the benefit of clauses 6 to 15 of that Act relating to the purchase of land by agreement, for, by sect. 151, the purchase or taking of an easement is expressly stated to be the same thing as the purchase or taking of land. In Ferrar's case there was no Metropolitan Act, nor any sections such as sects. 150 and 151 here, but it turned on their special Act entirely. The Legislature never contemplated or intended that vestries should have the power to deprive persons of these valuable properties and rights without compensation. On the contrary, they have, by sects. 150 and 151, and the incorporation of the purchase by agreement clauses of the Lands Clauses Act, expressly provided for their acquiring the property and making due compensation.

Sir H. James, Q.C. (with him were Crompton and Swan) for the defendants contra, was not heard.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that our judgment in this case must be for the defendants. Mr. Smith admits, and very properly, and indeed it is so, that the case is concluded by the case which he has cited of Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers for London (ubi sup.) unless he is able to distinguish it in the way in which he proposed and endeavoured to distinguish it. Now, as I understand his argument, the way in which he proposed to distinguish that case is this, that sect. 98 of the Metropolis Management Act repeals or supersedes the former local Acts of Parliament, and that the later Act is now the governing law. I should myself say that if there had been found in it such words as these: "They may raise or alter the road, or level the road, making compensation," then, no doubt, that would be a repeal of the former Act of Parliament, because it would be a different enactment, that is to say, if the local Act meant that you might do a man a damage without compensating him for it, and the Metropolis Management Act said that you must compensate him if you did it, that would be a repeal of the former local Act, because the first would be an absolute right, the other would be a right with an accompaniment. But sect. 98 contains no such express words. But then Mr. Smith says: "If you look at sects. 150, 151, and 152, which must be coupled with sect. 98, you will there find such a qualification as I have stated." I cannot find that; and I cannot find it for many reasons. One is, that I think the 150th section has a different meaning from that for which Mr. Smith contends. It says: "It shall be lawful for the Metropolitan Board of Works or any district board," and so forth, "to purchase or take on lease, &c., any land or any right or easement in or over any land." And it is argued that that extends not merely to the acquisition of an easement by them, but to the purchase by them of an easement which somebody else possesses. I think I appreciate Mr. Smith's argument, but I do not agree with him. I think it means that they may either take land or acquire an easement over land, and not that they may purchase an easement. But, supposing it were so, another difficulty arises, namely, that in this case they have not purchased it. There has been no agreement of any sort or kind, and the easement of the plaintiff is not absolutely given, it is only lessened; he has it to some extent, though not so fully as he enjoyed it before. It seems to me, therefore, that sect. 150 does not apply to the facts of this case. But then, if it did, there is another difficulty, and that is, how is the compensation to be got? Not by the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, because Mr. Smith admits that it has been held that that section is not included in this particular Act, inasmuch as that section applies to compulsory purchase, and not to purchase by agreement. Then Mr. Smith says: "Be that as it may, I rely upon this, that there was an agreement here." But, so far from that, there is no agreement, or shadow of an agreement, nor, indeed, any statement of any agreement, and the only way in which Mr. Smith can suggest that there was an agreement, is by saying that they should have taken the plaintiff's easement by agreement, that they have taken it (which is not true, by-the-by), and therefore that they must have agreed to take it. It is an ingenious argument, but it fails the moment that it is examined. It seems to me, therefore, that we must hold the defendants to have the same right now under the Metropolis Local Management Act as they had under the former Acts to raise or lower roads, and that, if they formerly had power to damage a man's property without making him any compensation, they have it still. But, for my own part, and speaking with great respect for anybody who has so decided, I cannot help thinking that it is, as a certain conclusion was called yesterday in the Court of Appeal, "a revolting one." It seems to me to be really outrageous that 5l. worth of property cannot be taken without a man's consent, but that 5000l. worth of damage may be done to his land by its being "injuriously affected" by the works done under the authority of the Act of Parliament. I have, with all respect for the authorities who so decided, the greatest misgivings upon the subject. It seems that the defendants might almost as well say "We were raising the road, which we had a perfect right to do, and we saw you, the plaintiff, walking by, and although some of the stones fell upon you and broke your limbs or fractured your skull, yet we had authority to inflict that injury upon you under this Act of Parliament without making you any compensation." A perfectly rational meaning may, I think, be given to this Act of Parliament, though it is going out of one's way to do so, and that is to say, "As far as roads are concerned, you (the defendants) may alter them or raise them or lower them, but of course, as with anything else, you must not do any damage to anybody in so doing." However, that is concluded and past hope in this court, and also, as I understand, in a Court of Appeal. Mr. Smith has not even made the point, but I cannot help suggesting that there must be some doubt upon it. Another matter upon which I should like to reserve my judgment is whether sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act is limited to compulsory purchase. That I say nothing about at present; only if it should go to the ultimate court of appeal there would be time and opportunity to look further into the point and give it greater consideration. Meanwhile, our judgment must be for the defendants.

CLEARY, B.—I am of the same opinion, and upon the statement of facts and the admitted law in this case, I cannot help coming to the conclusion, disagreeable as it is—I will not use any other expression—that the plaintiff is without redress. I should certainly have thought that the earlier Acts and the late Act did not contemplate such an act as has been done in this case, namely, an act which takes away the property of an individual without affording him any compensation. I can easily understand, as my brother Bramwell says, that so far as regards any interference with a public highway the defendants are not to commit a nuisance, or to place themselves in a wrong position in altering the level of the highway by raising or lowering it, although they have a right to alter it. I should have thought if the matter could have been brought before us free from the difficulties which the statement of the facts and the admission of the law creates, that this was a matter not to be answered by those Acts of Parliament at all. The case states that “the raising and alteration of the said road and pavement was done in a manner justified by the said Act;” that is to say, it is one of those things which the defendants are justified in doing to any extent if only it comes within the Act of Parliament. As regards the other question, the statutory authority under which the works in question were executed being admitted, it really is plain that the result of the legislation which has taken place upon that subject is, that in respect of injuries inflicted upon the owner of property by reason of a right of easement being taken away, as in the present case, there is no claim given by way of action and none by way of compensation. If there had been some agreement made between the parties here before the doing of the alterations or repairs which damaged his property, the plaintiff would have been entitled to have had the matter arranged and settled in the manner provided for by the earlier clauses of the Lands Clauses Act which have reference to the acquisition by public bodies of property by agreement. But, as the board or vestry here have chosen to do the act compulsorily under the powers vested in them by statute, the effect of the decision in Ferrar's case (ubi sup.), is that the plaintiff, the injured landowner, has no mode of getting compensation for the injury which he has sustained.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I regret very much that some means have not been pointed out to us by which the plaintiff might have been held to be entitled to compensation. I cannot suppose that it was contemplated by the Legislature that any board or other public body would be enabled, for the benefit of the public, to do what seems to have been a very serious injury to the plaintiff, without giving him compensation. Now, if this act was done, as it is alleged to have been done, under the Metropolitan Local Management Act, and if sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act could have been held to have been incorporated in that Act, then justice would have been done; because, the road being raised and the plaintiff's property “injuriously affected,” he could have claimed and would have obtained compensation under sect. 68; and really that does seem to be the reasonable construction. It has been said that it might be very well in the time of George III. to give power to a local authority to raise a road without affording compensation, but it certainly is not within the ordinary intention of Acts of Parliament of the present day that a public body should do an injury to a man without affording him some means of obtaining compensation for such injury. However, Mr. Smith admitted, on the part of the plaintiff, that he is concluded by the authority of the case in the Exchequer Chamber which has been referred to, and that he cannot successfully contend, after that decision, that sect. 68 does not come within the compulsory clauses which are excluded from the Metropolitan Local Management Act. This case, therefore, is entirely within that decision, except so far as it can be distinguished by introducing the power, under sect. 150 of the Metropolitan Act, to purchase by agreement. Under that the defendants might have had a power, had they chosen to exercise it, of purchasing this right of which they have deprived the plaintiff, and if they had done so then the Metropolitan Act points out in sects. 151 and 152, the means by which it might have been done, that is to say, the sections of the Lands Clauses Act, which relate to purchase by agreement would apply, and the compulsory clauses would be excluded, and so the purchase by agreement would be effected, and compensation for any damage thereby done to the plaintiff be provided for. But in fact there has been no agreement here at all. The defendants here have chosen to take it, and to say, “We will not make any agreement.” Therefore those clauses do not apply, and that throws us back upon the state of things which is governed by the case of Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers for London (ubi sup.). The result is, that, in obedience to the decision of the court of error in that case, we must hold that the defendants are entitled to our judgment. I can only say that I deeply regret that I am obliged to come to such a conclusion, and I fully agree with the strong expression, which seems to be of very recent introduction, that this decision is somewhat of “a revolting” character.

THE IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY (apps.) v. WILSON (resp.).

Income tax—Fire insurance company—Assessment of the law—Return of profits—Unearned premiums—Claim for deduction in respect of—Mode of return and assessment.

[EX. DIV.]

THE IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY (apps.) v. WILSON (resp.).

[EX. DIV.]

In making a return of their profits for assessment to income tax under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), a fire insurance company is not permitted by the Act to credit themselves with, or to claim a deduction for, a portion, calculated by them at 33 per cent., or one-third of the amount of premiums received during the given year, as the unearned or unexhausted portion of such premiums, although in respect of such portion the company remain liable to losses which may occur in the ensuing year. The fair and proper mode of ascertaining the amount of net profits for the purposes of the Act (it being impossible to ascertain it with such strictly mathematical accuracy as to do perfect and absolute justice) is to take on the one side the whole receipts and on the other the whole expenditure and disbursements for the given year, the balance remaining being, for the time at least, net profits on which the tax should be assessed. This being done year by year, there is an absolute balancing of accounts; and if any wrong be done by losses afterwards occurring in respect of premiums on which, as profits, income tax has been assessed and paid, that will be taken into consideration in the ensuing year.

This is a case stated for the opinion of the court, under Part 3 of the Act 37 & 38 Vict. c. 16, as to income tax, schedule D, as follows:

The directors of the Imperial Fire Insurance Company, of No. 1, Old Broad-street, in the City of London, gave notice of appeal to the special commissioners, through their solicitors, by letter dated the 3rd Dec. 1874, against an assessment of 67,927*l.*, made on them by the Commissioners for General Purposes, for the year ending 5th April 1875. The special commissioners issued their precept requiring statements of accounts for the three years preceding the yearly assessment, and in reply thereto a statement was sent in of which a copy (marked A) is annexed.

The appeal was heard at the office of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, Somerset House, on the 12th Feb. 1875, when Mr. Cozens Smith (general manager), Mr. Johnson (clerk in the accountants' office), and Mr. Oliver, solicitor, attended on behalf of the Imperial Fire Insurance Company. Mr. W. Wilson, the surveyor of taxes for the district (the respondent), also attended on behalf of the Crown. Mr. Oliver, the company's solicitor, was informed that he could take no part in the proceedings, but that there was no objection to his remaining in the room.

The company originally returned a loss, or rather put in a statement instead of a return, dated the 19th Dec. 1874, showing a deficit of 45,559*l.*; but afterwards they consented to pay on 42,340*l.* The books of the company were produced by Mr. Johnson, and showed that the accounts are made up to the 3rd Dec. in each year, and that no notice is taken therein of unearned premiums. In other respects the figures in the statement corresponded with the books, and showed an average of profit of about 67,000*l.* The commissioners would not allow the introduction of the unearned premiums, as they did not appear in the books, and as this was the first year in which they were taken into account by the company in making their return for income tax, the commissioners confirmed the assessment on 67,927*l.*

Mr. Smith, the company's manager, being dissatisfied with the determination of the special commissioners declared his dissatisfaction, and duly required the commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, under the provisions of the Act of 37 Vict. c. 16, which the commissioners accordingly did.

The following is a copy of the account "A" referred to in the case:

A. L. Smith (with whom was John, Q.C.), for the appellants company.—The company are entitled to credit themselves in their return to the income tax, or to claim a deduction for a certain portion, calculated by them at 33 per cent. of the total amount of premiums received by them in any given year, as the unearned portion of such premiums. Suppose, for instance, a fire company insure 100 people in a given year, there would be 100 premiums received; but inasmuch as the policies are dated and issued, and the premiums on them paid at different times and in different months during the year, the whole of those premiums would not be earned in that year. If all the premiums were paid on the 1st Jan. in any one year, then all the policies would have expired, and all the premiums have been earned on the 31st Dec. of that year; but assuming one premium to be paid in March, another in June, and another in September, and so on, then the whole of these premiums would not be earned till the subsequent months of March, June, and September respectively; and inasmuch as the company's books are made up in December every year, there would then remain a considerable portion of unearned premiums in respect of which the company would be liable to risks and losses during the subsequent year. This proportion is calculated on a fair average at 33 per cent. of the whole year's premiums. [KELLY, C.B.—How do you arrive at the proportion of 33 per cent.? The case does not state anything about that.] The case does not, but we have an affidavit of the manager, showing beyond doubt that that is the true average of the unearned premiums in any one year in insurance offices, and though I cannot refer to it, I may state the result as a matter of fact. True, the office has received all these premiums in the year, but they have not, in the words of the section, earned them, because throughout the whole of the next year they are liable to be called on to pay them back in case of losses occurring on the policies in respect of which they were issued; one-third, therefore, of the premiums received in the year is still unexhausted, and liable to losses which may occur in the succeeding year. A fair result cannot be arrived at by the mode adopted by the commissioners of taking the whole receipts of the year, and setting off the losses and expenses of that year, and assessing the company on the balance. The fair and just mode would be to take, as the appellants proposed to do, the whole receipts of one year, and then to deduct 33 per cent. therefrom, and carry it to credit next year, and so go on for three years. The unearned premiums should be brought into the account on both sides, and as the company debit themselves with the unearned premiums of, say, 1872, they ought not to be debited with the unearned premiums of 1873. Taking a fair average of a third in this last year, 1873, the assessable amount, instead of 67,000*l.*, is only 42,000*l.* (He referred to, and relied upon, the rules appended to sect. 100 of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, schedule D, case 1, rules 1, 3, 4.) The company have not made a gain of 600,000*l.* on the 31st Dec. 1874, inasmuch as throughout 1875 they are under liabilities with respect to one-third of the amount. [HUDDLESTON, B.—Suppose an agister of cattle takes them at 5*l.* a head per month, payable for the year in advance, if one is brought at the end of Dec., and he is paid 60*l.* in respect of it, he carries that into his account, because it is what he receives; but inasmuch as he has to give the animal twelve months' food next year, he debits himself with 5*l.* and credits himself with 5*l.* only; that is this case.]

Gorst, Q.C. (with whom were the Attorney-

General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), and Pinder, for the Crown, contra.—No doubt my friend's suggestion is an ingenious one for improving the method of keeping insurance companies' accounts, but it has been made merely for the purpose of reducing the amount of duty payable in this particular case; and the answer to it is that the company do not keep their books in that way themselves. For the purpose of ascertaining the dividend divisible amongst their shareholders, they take no account of these so-called "unearned premiums or profits," and therefore, if they leave them out of consideration in calculating the amount of profits divisible amongst their shareholders, it is not unreasonable to require them to be left out of consideration in ascertaining the amount of income tax payable by the company. As to the phrase "unearned premiums," the premium is earned the moment it is paid. It becomes an asset of the company, and cannot be received back from them. [AMPHLETT, B.—Has a servant who is paid a year's wages in advance earned his wages before he has served a year?] It is submitted that that is not a parallel case. This is not a case of service, nor is it like the agistment of cattle put by Huddleston, B.; but a case in which, in consideration of the company contracting to pay a very large sum upon a contingent event, a very small sum is paid in advance; and the loss, if it occur, is not paid out of the premiums, but out of the capital of the company. The Crown contend that there should be no deduction, except that which they have already allowed for actual losses and expenses of management. All left after these deductions is the net gain of the year. The tax is not and cannot be calculated upon an exact and scientific ascertainment of the profit of each year, but, according to the statute, upon a rough average of three years, the Crown having a right to a return of the gross actual receipts in those three years, and the company being entitled to treat as losses every expense actually incurred upon an average of three years. The mode now suggested is not a more strict and scientific mode of ascertaining the profit than that prescribed by the Act and pursued by the commissioners. The strictly scientific and accurate method would be to take the amount of every single contract during the year, putting on one side the premiums received in respect of those contracts, and on the other side the payments made in respect of losses which are the subject matter of them. So also the expenses of the management should be strictly confined to the given year. As a matter of fact, until every single contract entered into in any one year has come to an end, it is impossible to say whether the year's transactions result in a profit or a loss. The company now seek to apply that strict method to one item of the account only, viz., the premiums, but they have no right to include losses incurred in respect of contracts made in some other year. If premiums are to be dealt with in a particular way on one side of the account, losses should be dealt with in the same way on the other side. [HUDDLESTON, B.—If they debited themselves with the gross receipts and credited themselves with the expenses, and then with a fair proportion of the premiums applicable to the risks in the ensuing year, would not that be a fair way of getting at it?] I admit that that is a fairer principle and way of doing it, but here they have fixed on a lump sum which they choose to take at one-third. Their books, by which they are bound, show 67,927*l.* to be the right sum. He referred to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, sect. 100, schd. D, rule 1, par. 3; case 1, rule 1, sect. 133.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—KELLY, C.B.—It is with some reluctance that I feel that we ought to give judgment in this case in favour of the Crown. I say with reluctance, because it is impossible not to see that perfect justice cannot be done by giving our judgment for the Crown; and, on the other hand, it is not to be forgotten that the scheme or mode of making out and settling the accounts suggested by the insurance company seems substantially, though it is not really, unobjectionable. Perhaps it is the most reasonable mode that could be determined on in most cases; but it really is not according to law. There is nothing in the Income Tax Acts which enables the parties in such a case, the Crown on the one side and the insurance company on the other, to determine with certainty what is the amount or value of the risk which continues after the end of the year, while a number of policies upon which a year's premiums have been paid are unexhausted, and where there may or may not be, upon one, or two, or more, or all of them, losses to a large amount, or to a small amount, or no losses at all. Therefore, the company, in the mode suggested by them, are obliged to resort to a speculative mode of ascertaining the probable amount of the risk which continues; but I see no warrant in the Income Tax Acts, nor, indeed, in the principle of the law, which will enable this to be done. Under these circumstances, therefore, it seems to me that, unless we revert to the 133rd and 134th sections of the Act which have been referred to, but which do not apply in the present instance, the case stands thus: The only mode in which one can really say what is net profit is by taking on the one side the whole receipts, and on the other side the actual expenditure or disbursements for the given year, and all that remains is, at least for the time, profit; and, therefore, taking the sum of 682,000*l.* and odd as having been paid to and received by the company in the year 1873, and, taking, on the other hand, losses during that year to the amount of 275,000*l.* and odd, expenses to the amount of 221,000*l.* and odd, and some further disbursements which it is admitted should be allowed, and which reduces the sum on the profit side to 50,000*l.*, their profit for the year 1873 is 50,000*l.*; and if everything were to stop at once, and if nothing further were done by the company, 50,000*l.* would be the amount of their profits. It is open to this observation, however, and that is why this mode does not do, and I do not know any mode which can do, perfect justice; and it is this, that the company remain under the liability of paying the amount of any losses in respect of these policies upon which they have received the 600,000*l.* premiums, which may occur in the course of the ensuing year; and if they do occur, it is quite clear that the amount of the profits upon which the income tax has been assessed and paid will be thereby diminished. But there is a provision for that in the Act. If they leave off business the 134th section applies, and then a calculation is made in which perfect justice upon the figures is done. If, upon the other hand, they continue their business, then at the end of the year 1874 they again take the amount of premiums which they have received on the one side and they take the receipts and any other sums of money which may be properly set off against the amounts received, and they take the amount of the losses against which the 600,000*l.* and odd has been received in the year before, so that year by year, as they go on, there is an absolute balancing of accounts, and it is only when the last year comes—if a last year does come—when the company are about to cease carrying on their business, that, although they will have paid the income tax upon the same sum of 600,000*l.* and odd of premiums, they may leave off business within a month, but are liable to make good any loss which may happen upon the policies in respect of which this 600,000*l.* and odd has been paid. But that, as I have before said, can only happen in the last year of the business being carried on; and if that should happen, then, by the 134th section, there is a provision for the fact being ascertained and the matter being made clear in some way or the other, and a deduction if necessary being made. Looking, therefore, at the very nature of the case, and to the absolute impossibility of doing perfect justice, because, even if we were to take it upon an estimate of an actuary, which might be fair enough, if we take into account the number of policies and the amount of premiums paid upon them in numerous small sums, amounting in the aggregate to some hundreds of thousands of pounds, it would cost more money to get the calculations made by an actuary or anybody else than perhaps double the amount of the income tax which has to be paid. Under the circumstances, then, and seeing that at the moment it is profit, and that, if any wrong be done by losses afterwards occurring, that will all be taken into consideration in the next year's account, it seems to me that the only way in which something as near to exact justice as possible can be arrived at in a case of this nature is by taking the accounts as they have been made out and adjusted and the income tax upon them assessed. Our judgment, therefore, will be for the Crown.

AMPFLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I was certainly struck in the first instance with what seemed to me to be an apparent injustice in this mode of assessing the duty, but on further consideration I saw that the injustice, if any, was really confined to the first year when the company commenced business. In the first year there would, no doubt, be this injustice, which has been pointed out by my Lord—they would be charged upon all the premiums received, though as to some or most of them there would be a liability of loss, and in strictness that loss ought to have been taken into account in the first year when the business commenced. Not very much injury, however, arises, because in the very next year—one year too late, no doubt, so far as strict justice is concerned—these losses are all brought into the account and are allowed as a deduction to the company. It is not a recurring loss. After that system has been once begun, there is really no injustice at all for the subsequent years, unless it should happen that the business was an increasing business; and then, with regard to the increase of business done in any subsequent year, there would be a slight modicum of loss, the same as there was in the first year; but on the other hand, if in any subsequent year the business diminished, then

[Ex. Div.]

THE IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY (apps.) v. WILSON (resp.).

this way of keeping the accounts would be in favour of the company; and I observe that in these three years there was in the last year a not inconsiderable reduction in the premiums received. In that case it is actually rather an advantage to the company than otherwise. Taking, therefore, three years together, and taking the average, supposing the business to remain stationary, there is no recurring loss at all. The only thing is this, which my Lord has pointed out, if the business be stationary the account would be perfectly accurate for this year upon the average of the three years in this way of taking it; and assuming for the moment that the business did remain stationary, the only possible further injury which could be done would be after the last year, when the company would have paid income tax upon the whole amount of the premiums, and then there would be some loss which would remain unaccounted for in consequence of their having ceased to carry on business. I have no doubt that, under the section of the Act of Parliament which has been referred to, if this company should happen to come to an end of their undertaking, an allowance would be obtained from the commissioners in respect of that loss, which had not been taken into account during the year in which the premiums upon the policies were paid, and which would be a loss which had never been brought into the accounts in favour of the company. I cannot, therefore, help thinking that really the inconvenience is, at any rate now, after the insurance office has been started for some years, extremely small; and when we consider the inconvenience of having recourse to estimates and averages for the purpose of ascertaining how much contingent loss ought to be taken into account during the year in which the premiums are paid, I think that the insurance company themselves would find that they would gain nothing by now making any change of plan. If they find it to be for their interest to adopt a new system, I by no means intend to say that if they choose at a future time to alter their mode of taking the account, and to set aside, for instance, some fund to answer contingent losses in the next year; if they choose to do that, and make it intelligible, I by no means say that they may not oblige the commissioners to accept the accounts in that amended form. But they have not done so. They have kept the accounts, I have no doubt, in the most convenient way, taking the premiums as receipts in the year, and taking the actual losses incurred in that year as a payment, and striking the balance, and calling the balance profit. It is not exactly mathematically accurate, but that is the way in which, as between themselves and their own shareholders, they have found it most convenient to keep their books; and, therefore, I think that as long as they keep their books in this way, the commissioners have a right to apply the same rule in estimating the amount upon which they ought to be assessed. Under these circumstances, I think that we ought to give our judgment for the Crown.

HUDDESTON, B.—I should have thought that the most convenient way for the insurance company to have kept their accounts would have been to have debited themselves first of all with the amount of premiums applicable to the risks of the year; that is to say, they might very readily have ascertained when the premiums were paid, in whatever month it was, how much of them was applicable to the current year, and how much would be applicable to the risks to be incurred in the succeeding year, assuming them to be annual payments; and they might very readily have carried out a figure which would really represent the amount applicable to the rates of that year—that is to say, they might either, in the first instance, have taken the gross sum of the premiums received, deducting therefrom such proportion as would be applicable to the succeeding year, and have debited themselves with the balance; or they might have done it in the way in which it is suggested by the company that they should now do it here, they might have debited themselves with the gross sum, and then have credited themselves with the actual sum which would be applicable to the next year; and in that case I think that they probably would have got at the right amount of the gross profits. I do not see that in the case of fire insurances such a course would be very difficult, or, perhaps, as difficult as in the case of life insurances. This, however, the company has not done. What they have done is this: under these three years they have debited themselves first with the gross sum of the year, they have then added to that sum the sum with which they say they have credited themselves in the previous year, and then, adding to that the sum receivable from interest, they carry to the other side of the account first their losses, next their expenses, and then their dividends, which are all proper items of deduction, and then they take an arbitrary sum, which they say (but we have no evidence whatever of the fact) would represent the unearned premiums, and they take that at something like 33 per cent. We have to decide whether the difference between the two sides of the account, as stated by the company, is “the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade upon a fair and just average of three years.” They do it with reference to the three years. It is quite clear to me, looking at this arbitrary sum which they put in the credit side of the account, that they have not arrived at “the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade upon a fair and just average of three years.” They have not (as is found by the case) kept their accounts in that way as between themselves and their shareholders, and I find it also stated that “this was the first year in which they” (that is the “unearned premiums”) “were taken into account by the company in making their return.” Now, an obvious inconvenience arises. Supposing that at the expiration of the next three years the company should feel themselves justified in establishing a different mode of accounts; it might be that they would not carry to the debit of the first year of the next three years that sum which they had carried to their credit in the year previous to the first of the three years, and then justice would not be done. I cannot help thinking that, as the company have not in their accounts adopted this method of computation, as this is the first year in which they have made this attempt at changing the mode of keeping or stating the accounts, they must be bound by their accounts; and really, as pointed out by my Lord and my brother Amphlett, in the result, communibus annis, no injustice will be done. If they find that in one year there are great losses they may, under the 133rd section, get the matter put right by the commissioners. If they stop business they may, under the 134th section, obtain the proper return of what they have overpaid. On the whole, I think, looking at the case as stated before us, that our judgment must be for the Crown.

KELLY, C.B.—I may add that it is not unworthy of consideration that the company have in their hands during the whole of the year, say 1873, from the time of the receipt of each premium, the premiums upon the whole of these policies, and so they have in the year 1874, until the losses with respect to the policies begin to be sustained. They possess this advantage, which is a great one to them. We do not think that this is a case for costs. Each party must pay its own costs.

Judgment for the Crown.

THE CEsENA SULPHUR COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON; and THE CALCUTTA JUTE MILLS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON.

Revenue—Income tax—Company incorporated and registered in England—Business and profits carried on and earned abroad—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 40, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, sch. D.—“Person residing within the United Kingdom”—“Trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere”—Residence of a joint-stock company.

The Cesena Sulphur Company, incorporated in 1871 under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, with a capital of 35,000l., in 10l. shares, and registered in Italy for all purposes in 1872, was formed for the purpose of developing and working the mines of sulphur at Cesena, in Italy, and the manufacture and sale of sulphur there, with power to take occupation of lands wherever sulphur was likely to be found. As regards its affairs in the United Kingdom, the company is managed by a board of directors, who hold their meetings at the registered office of the company in London. An Italian delegation, consisting of two or three members of the board, reside in Italy, and carry on all the practical management of the company's properties and affairs, one of them being the managing director of the company, and residing at Cesena, where all the operations connected with the manufacture and sale of sulphur are exclusively carried on and the profits are earned. The Italian members of the board are in constant correspondence with their co-directors resident in France and England, who meet at the registered London office; and the working of the mines, the mode of the disposal thereof, and the general business of the company, are wholly under the order, direction, and management of the directors, subject to the control of general meetings, as provided by the articles. The original account books and all the moneys are kept at Cesena, but copies of such books are sent to London, where the register of shareholders prescribed by English law is kept. The company's principal banking accounts are kept at Turin and Paris, the London banking account being kept for payment of office and administrative expenses and the dividends required for the English shareholders, which are the only part of the company's profits which are sent to England. The shares of the company are divided between English and foreign holders in the proportion of 8924 held in England to 26,076 held abroad.

The Calcutta Jute Mills Company, incorporated in 1872, under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867, with a capital of 120,000l., in 20l. shares, was formed for the purpose of taking over the business, goodwill, and plant of certain jute mills near Calcutta, then belonging to and carried on by a firm of merchants resident there. The affairs of the company in the United Kingdom are managed by a board of not less than five directors, by whom one of the shareholders residing in Calcutta was appointed to be the managing agent and resident director of the company in India, and by whom and under whose entire control the buying of the raw material and its manufacture and sale, as well as all the operations connected with the company's business in all its branches, are wholly and exclusively carried on in India, where alone the profits of the company are earned; the company neither buying, manufacturing, nor selling in the United Kingdom. There is both an Indian and an English share register, and rather more than half the capital and shares are owned by residents in India. The company has no office or place of business in England, but, for purposes of registration, its address is at a merchant's office in London, where, by leave of the occupier, the meetings of the company are held. The books of accounts, documents, and moneys are kept, received, and dealt with by the manager in India, and the company has no property in the United Kingdom. Nothing whatever comes into the hands of the English directors, except periodical remittances from Calcutta to defray necessary expenses, and such portion of the profits realised in India as are divisible as dividends amongst the shareholders in the United Kingdom; and all that takes place in England after receiving such proportion of the profits is the calling by the directors of a meeting of shareholders, and a declaration by the directors of the amount to be distributed by way of dividend amongst the English shareholders for the current year.

The companies having been assessed to income tax in respect of the entire gains or profits of their business carried on by them in Italy and India respectively, appealed therefrom, and contended that they were only liable to be assessed on the portion of their profits remitted to England for distribution in the way of dividends amongst the shareholders resident in the United Kingdom.

Held by the Court (Kelly, C.B., and Huddleston, B.), giving judgment in favour of the Crown in each case, that it was clear from the constitution of both companies, as shown by their articles of association, that the entire and absolute control of their affairs and business was vested in and exercised by a board of directors in London, which place was therefore, in each case, the seat of business of the company, at which it must be deemed to “reside,” and that in effect the companies therefore were to be, and were rightly, assessed as a “person residing within the United Kingdom,” upon the whole of the annual profits or gains of their businesses carried on in Italy and India respectively.

THE CESENA SULPHUR COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON.

[Ex. Div.]

Per Curiam.—A corporation is not a partnership, nor are the shareholders in a joint-stock company partners; and a company cannot be divided into two portions, the English and the foreign, and income tax be assessed only upon the profits accruing or belonging to the shareholders residing in England.

THE Commissioners of Income Tax for the city of London assessed the above first-named company, the Cesena Sulphur Company, in the sum of 5834*l.*, under schedule D, in respect of their entire profits in their business of sulphur miners, &c., at Cesena, in Italy. They also assessed the other company, the Calcutta Jute Mills Company, under the same schedule, in respect of their profits in the sum of 25,000*l.*, being their entire or aggregate gains for the year 1874, as spinners and manufacturers of jute in India. The company in each case appealed, and contended that the assessment should be restricted to the portion of the profits distributed amongst the shareholders resident in the United Kingdom, and thereupon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in conformity with the provisions of the 37 Vict. c. 16, s. 7, stated two cases for the opinion of the court.

The question raised and the point involved in these two cases being very similar, the court decided to hear the arguments in each of them in succession before delivering their judgment in either.

The following are the material portions of the cases that were so stated:

THE CESENA SULPHUR COMPANY (LIMITED).

1, 2. The Cesena Sulphur Company (Limited), hereinafter called the company, was formed to carry on the trade or business of sulphur miners, manufacturers, or merchants, at Cesena, in the province of Firi, in Italy. It was incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867 on the 27th Oct. 1871, with a capital of 350,000*l.*, divided into 35,000 shares of 10*l.* each, and was subsequently registered in Italy, for all purposes, in the following year, viz., on the 1st Nov. 1872.

3. By the articles of association (forming part of the case) the company, so far as its affairs in the United Kingdom are concerned, is managed by a board of eight directors, holding their meetings at the registered office of the company in England. There is an Italian delegation, consisting of two or three members of the board, resident in Italy, by whom all the practical management of the company's properties and affairs is carried on. One of the Italian directors is managing director of the company, and resides at Cesena.

4. All the operations connected with the manufacture and sale of sulphur are wholly and exclusively carried on at Cesena, where the profits of the company (if any) are earned, but the Italian members of the board are in constant correspondence with their co-directors resident in France and England, who meet at the English registered office, No. 84, King William-street, in the City of London.

5. Transcripts and copies of the company's books of accounts are sent to London, where the register of the shareholders, prescribed by the English law, is kept, but all the original books of accounts of the company, and all its moneys, are kept in Italy, the dividends required for the English shareholders being the only part of its profits which are sent to this country. The principal banking accounts of the company are kept at Turin and at Paris; the London banking accounts being kept for the payment of offices and administrative expenses and of dividends here.

6. The shares of the company are divided between the English and foreign shareholders in the proportion of 8924 held in England to 26,076 held abroad.

7. The assessment or tax is leviable under Schedule D of the Acts of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and 16 & 17 Vict. 34; under the former of those Acts (see sect. 1, Schedule D) certain duties are granted to Her Majesty upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in Great Britain or elsewhere . . . and upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any profession, trade, employment, or occupation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere.

8. By sect. 40 of the first mentioned Act it is enacted that all bodies politic, corporate, or collegiate, companies, fraternities, &c., whether corporate or not corporate, shall be chargeable with such and the like duties, as any person would, under and by virtue of the said Act, be chargeable with.

9. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, the like duties as are referred to in paragraph 7, are granted to Her Majesty upon profits arising from property, profession, trade, and offices (inter alia) sect. 2.

SCHEDULE D.

For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing within the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

10. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 80, s. 2, persons entrusted with the payment of foreign dividends or annuities are required to deliver, for the use of the Commissioners of Taxes, true and perfect accounts of the amount of the annuities and shares payable by them respectively, and the said commissioners are empowered to make an assessment thereon under Schedule C.

And by sect. 10 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, the provision so made by the last recited Act is extended to the assessing and charging of the duties granted by the Act, "as well on such dividends and shares of annuities aforesaid, as on all interest, dividends, and other annual payments payable out of or in respect of the funds or shares of any foreign company, society, adventure, or concern, and which said interest, dividends, or other annual payments, have been or shall be entrusted to any person in the United Kingdom for payment to any persons, corporations, companies, or societies in the United Kingdom;" and all persons entrusted with the payment of any such interest, dividends, or other annual payments as aforesaid in the United Kingdom, or acting therein as agents, or in any other character, are required to perform all such acts and things in order to the assessing of the duties on such interest, dividends, and other annual payments as are required to be done by persons entrusted with the payment of annuities or any dividends under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 80, above referred to. And the assessment of the duties on all such interest, dividends, and other annual payments as

THE CALCUTTA JUTE MILLS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON.

[Ex. Div.]

aforesaid, shall be made by the Commissioners for Special Purposes under Schedule D.

11. By sect. 5 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, the duties thereby imposed are directed to be assessed under the regulations of the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

12. The duties granted by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, have been continued at various rates by a series of subsequent Acts, and the Act imposing the duty for the year 1874 is the 37 Vict. c. 16.

13. The commissioners, having regard to the articles of association accompanying the case, and to the certificate of incorporation signed by the Registrar of Joint-stock Companies, and also to the fact that the registered office of the company is in England, where the directors meet, and direct, and control the main operations of the company, were of opinion that the company is an English company, formed under the Joint-stock Companies Acts, for carrying on an undertaking abroad, and is, by virtue of sects. 40 & 192 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, in the same position as a "person" residing within the United Kingdom, and liable under the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, sect. 1, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, to make a return of the whole of the profits of any trade, whether the same shall be carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

The commissioners were further of opinion that the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case of The Imperial Ottoman Bank v. The Attorney-General, Alexander, and others (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 694; L. Rep. 10, Ex. 20; 44 L. J. 3, Ex.) was not adverse to but confirmatory of the contention of the Crown in the present case; the Court of Exchequer having there decided that the residence of a corporation must be regarded as the place of its incorporation, which, in the case of the Cesena Sulphur Company, is within the United Kingdom. That the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 80, s. 2, and sect. 10 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 40, referred to by the company in the present case, do not bear upon the question at issue, and apply only to agents or other persons entrusted with the payment of dividends or other annual payments payable out of or in respect of stocks, funds, or shares of any foreign company, society, or concern.

14. The assessment was accordingly confirmed upon the whole of the profits of the company.

15. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the company is bound to make a return in respect of all annual profits wholly made by its business in Italy, including the portion paid to the Italian shareholders, and is chargeable to income tax thereon; or whether, as is contended on the part of the company, the London directors are bound only to make a return and to pay income tax in respect of so much of the profits made abroad as actually pass through their hands for distribution among the shareholders residing in the United Kingdom.

Points for argument on behalf of the appellants.—First, that the company is not a person residing within the United Kingdom, within the meaning of schedule D to the Acts 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, respectively. Secondly, that residence in the United Kingdom cannot be predicated of a company within the meaning of the said Acts. Thirdly, that there is no one within the United Kingdom who receives any profits in respect of the said company's business, other than the amount of dividends required for the shareholders in this country. Fourthly, that the profits, other than the aforesaid amount of dividends, accrue outside the United Kingdom, and are received by persons not resident within the United Kingdom. Fifthly, that no part of the profits of the said company is liable to income tax except the amount of dividends distributed among shareholders in the United Kingdom.

Points for the Crown.—That the Cesena Sulphur Company, being an English company, registered in England under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867, and having also the registered office of the company in England, is in the same position as a person residing in the United Kingdom, and is liable to income tax under schedule D of the Acts 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in respect of the annual profits and gains of the company, whether made in England or elsewhere. Secondly, that on the facts of this case the company resides in the United Kingdom, and not in India. Thirdly, that the provisions of sect. 10 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, relied on by the appellants, apply to the case of dividends payable by or for a company or concern to shareholders residing in the United Kingdom, and have no application to the present case. Fourthly, that the return made by the secretary of the company is bad in law.

THE CALCUTTA JUTE MILLS COMPANY (LIMITED). CASE.

1. The Calcutta Jute Mills Company (Limited) (hereinafter called "the company") was formed for the purpose of taking over the business, goodwill, and plant of certain jute mills at Ishera, near Calcutta, in India, belonging to and then carried on by a firm of merchants, Messrs. Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., resident there.

2. The company was incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867, on the 16th April 1872, with a capital consisting of 120,000L., in 6000 shares of 20L. each.

3. By the articles of association (a copy of which forms part of the case) the company, so far as its affairs in the United Kingdom are concerned, is managed by a board consisting of not less than five directors. The directors have (inter alia) power to appoint one or more persons resident in Calcutta as "the Calcutta directors." As a matter of fact, there is at the present time one Calcutta director, Mr. George Muirhead Sturthers, who is a large shareholder in the company, and the acting partner of the firm of Messrs. Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., of Calcutta, the former proprietors of the mills.

4. On or about the 1st May 1872, the company commenced business as spinners and manufacturers of jute at Ishera, in Calcutta, aforesaid, and not elsewhere.

5. The buying of the raw material and the manufacture and sale of the same, as well as all the operations connected with the business of the company in all its branches, are wholly and exclusively carried on in India, where alone the gains and profits of the concern (if any) are earned.

6. At the time of the purchase of the said mills the company adopted an agreement whereby Messrs. Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., of Calcutta aforesaid, were constituted the managing agents in India, and they have had the entire control of its business and works at Ishera. At the same time they guarantee the solvency of those with whom they deal, and receive a del credere commission from the company in return.

7. There is an Indian as well as an English share register, and the larger amount of capital, as well as the greatest number of shares, are owned by persons residing in India.

8. On the 31st Dec. last the share register stood as follows: 3843 shares, representing a capital of 76,860*l.*, were held in India, and entered on the Indian share register; while only 2157 shares, representing a capital of 43,140*l.*, were held by persons residing in this country, and entered in the English share register.

9. The company has no office or other place of business in the United Kingdom, although, for the purpose of registration, its address here is No. 4, St. Helen's-place, in the City of London. This is, in fact, the office of Mr. Ferdinand Schiller, one of the directors of the company, and when meetings of the English members of the company are held there, it is entirely by his leave and favour.

10. All the company's books of accounts, papers, and other documents, as well as its moneys, are kept, received, and dealt with by the management in India.

11. As a matter of fact, the company has no property whatever in this country. Nothing comes into the hands of the English directors excepting what is remitted from Calcutta from time to time, to defray their necessary expenses. In addition to this, such proportion of the profits realised in India as is divisible amongst the shareholders in the United Kingdom by way of dividend, passes through their hands.

12. After receiving such proportion of the profits as is mentioned in par. 11, all that takes place in England is that the directors call a meeting of the shareholders, and declare the amount that is to be distributed by way of dividend amongst them for the current year.

13. For the year 1874 the sums received by the directors in this country as the proportion of the profits wholly made and acquired by the business of the company in India, and payable to the shareholders in the United Kingdom, amounted to 8497*l.*

14. In the said year the secretary of the company duly made a return of that amount to the commissioners for putting into execution the Income Tax Acts for the City of London, as the true and proper amount upon which the company was ready and willing to be assessed to income tax. To the said return there is appended a statement of the manner in which the same was made or estimated, as follows: "This return is made by me as secretary of the Calcutta Jute Mills Company (Limited). It includes the whole amount of the dividends or profits paid or payable to the shareholders residing in the United Kingdom for one whole year, on a fair computation or average, from the commencement of the business of the company on the 1st May 1872, but not the dividends or profits paid or payable to shareholders resident in the East Indies, and whose names are entered on the company's Indian share register. The trade of the company is that of jute spinners and manufacturers. The only place of manufacture as well as the place of sale is at Ishera, Calcutta. The company neither buys, manufactures, nor sells in the United Kingdom. The raw material is all purchased in India, manufactured there, and sold there, where also the entire profits are made."

Paragraphs 15 to 20 inclusive (setting forth the several sections of the Income Tax Acts applicable to the present question) are similar to paragraphs 7 to 12 inclusive in the previous case; and paragraphs 21, 22, 23, stating the opinion and decision of the commissioners, and the appeal of the company therefrom, and the question for the opinion of the court, are similar to paragraphs 13, 14, 15, in the previous case.

Points for argument on behalf of the appellants:—First, that under the circumstances stated, the Calcutta Jute Mills Company is not a company resident within the United Kingdom, within the meaning and for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts; secondly, that the trade of the said company is not exercised or carried on within the United Kingdom within the meaning and for the purposes aforesaid; thirdly, that under the said Acts the appellants are liable to pay income tax only upon so much of the profits as are received by them for distribution amongst the shareholders in this country.

The points for the Crown are similar to those in the previous case of the Sulphur Company.

The articles of association in each case, so far as they are material on the present occasion, are so fully stated and gone into in the judgments of the court, that it is unnecessary to set them forth here.

THE CSENA SULPHUR COMPANY (LIMITED).

Jan. 31 and Feb. 1.—Sir H. James, Q.C., and B.S. Wright (with them was R. T. Reid), argued on behalf of the appellants, and cited and referred to the following authorities:

B. S. Wright (for the appellants) replied.

The court then proceeded to hear the arguments in the case of

THE CALCUTTA JUTE MILLS COMPANY (LIMITED).

Feb. 1 and 2.—H. Matthews, Q.C. (with him were Sir H. Jackson, Q.C. and Rolland), argued on behalf of the appellant company, and, in addition to citing and commenting on all the cases and authorities that were cited and relied on upon both sides in the Uesena Sulphur Company's case, cited also the following:

Newby v. Van Oppen and others (Coll's Patent Fire Arms Manufacturing Company), 26 L. T. Rep. N.S. 164; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 293; 41 L. J. 148, Q. B.

Pinder (with whom were The Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.) and The Solicitor-General Sir H. S. Giffard, Q.C.) for the Crown (contra), was not called upon to argue.

In each case the contention on the part of the Crown was that the company was an English company under the Joint-stock Companies Acts for carrying on an undertaking in England, and was by virtue of the Income Tax Acts in the same position as a "person" residing in the United Kingdom, and was liable under the provisions of the Acts to make a return of and be assessed upon the whole of their profits, whether arising from business carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; the companies, on the other hand, insisting that they were not "persons" residing within the United Kingdom under the Income Tax Acts, and were only liable to be assessed upon the amount of the dividends sent to England and there received by and distributed amongst the shareholders resident in the United Kingdom.

It is unnecessary to state the arguments on either side more at length here, as they are fully noticed and commented on by the learned Barons in their judgments.

KELLY, C.B.—In both these cases I think that the Crown is entitled to the judgment of the court. I will first deal with the case of the Calcutta Jute Mills Company, which has been most admirably argued on both sides, and especially—if I may say so without being invidious—by Mr. Matthews, who in his zeal has certainly said and done all that was possible to overcome the difficulties by which he was environed. We have carefully considered both the cases, and the great principles of the law upon which they ought to be decided. Both are cases raising, I believe for the first time, a question of great importance both in its nature and the extent of its operations, and involving important principles of great weight as affecting the law of this country, and, I may almost say, the international law of the world. I should be glad if we felt it possible, consistently with our duty and the view which we take of the law, to decide the question otherwise than we are about to do; for it is in vain to deny that the result of our decision is to declare that the Legislature taxes foreigners who are neither natives nor inhabitants of this country, and, with the exception of India, are not within the jurisdiction of its laws. Now, the question in the case of the Calcutta Jute Mills Company is whether they can be held liable to income tax upon the entirety of their profits. It is a company incorporated in England under the Joint-stock Companies Acts, having a local position in this country, and occupying, or rather being permitted to occupy, an office within the City of London, where it transacts its business and exercises the very large and extensive powers with which it is invested by the Act of Parliament. On the other hand, it is equally true that the whole property in which the entire capital of the company is invested is not in this country, but in India, and that the mills are worked and the whole profits of the company earned in that country alone. It likewise appears (and it is here that the question arises) that out of the whole of its profits, amounting for the year in question to 25,000*l.*, about two-thirds of the dividends are payable, not to inhabitants of England, nor to persons having any connection with England, except that they happen to dwell under the same Crown and the same rule, but to persons residing out of England, and chiefly, if not entirely, in India. Again, the actual trading business of the company is transacted in India and not in England. But then, on the other hand, upon looking to the constitution of the company and its articles of association, under and by virtue of which it exists, we find that it is entirely under the control and in the actual possession of the governing body in England. It is stated in the case that "the company, so far as its affairs in the United Kingdom are concerned, is managed by a board, consisting of not less than five directors. The directors have power (inter alia) to appoint one or more persons resident in Calcutta as the Calcutta directors. As a matter of fact, there is at the present time one "Calcutta director," Mr. George Muirhead Struthers, who is a large shareholder in the company, and the acting partner of the firm of Messrs. Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., of Calcutta, the former proprietors of the mills. We begin, then, with this, that the company is incorporated in and under the law of England, and, therefore, its origin and first existence is in England, and England alone; that the governing body, the directors, are in England, and that they have power to appoint—not that there exists by virtue of the company's constitution a director having power himself to act and conduct the company's affairs in India—but that the governing body in England have power to appoint one or more persons resident in Calcutta as the Calcutta directors, and that they accordingly appointed a resident director at Calcutta, who controls the whole conduct of the business there. But he is merely the appointee or agent of the governing body of directors in England. Then we see that "the buying of the raw material, and the manufacture and sale of the same, as well as all the operations connected with the business of the company, in all its branches, are wholly and exclusively carried on in India, where alone the gains and profits of the concern (if any) are earned;" and further on in the case, without going at more length into what relates to the property itself, we find (and these are the passages chiefly relied on by the appellants) that the company has no office or other place of business in the United Kingdom, although for the purpose of registration its address here is No. 4, St. Helen's-place, in the City of London. This is, in fact, the office of Mr. Ferdinand Schiller, one of the directors of the company, and when meetings of the English members of the company are held there it is entirely by his leave and favour. Now it really signifies little, and makes no difference whether the office, in which the very important business of holding meetings at which everything, that is, may, or can be done by the company, is determined, is an office hired at a rent, or is a place lent for that purpose by one of the directors of the company for the use of the company and at their disposition, and for that purpose alone. There is their location, their "residence," to apply the term of the Act of Parliament; and there it is that the directors accordingly meet, and there the company, the great body of shareholders, hold their general and extraordinary meetings. It is, therefore, for all the purposes of this case, the office of the corporation. The case then states that, "as a matter of fact, the company has no property whatever in this country. Nothing comes into the hands of the English directors excepting what is remitted from Calcutta from time to time to defray their necessary expenses. In addition to this, such proportion of the profits realised in India as is divisible amongst the shareholders in the United Kingdom, by way of dividend, passes through their hands." Now, it may be convenient here to refer to what must be the basis of our decision, namely, the words of the Act of Parliament. By the 5th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. cap. 34, it is enacted that "The said duties hereby granted shall be assessed, raised, levied, and collected under the regulations and provisions of the Act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and of the several Acts therein mentioned or referred to, and also of any Act or Acts subsequently passed explaining, altering, amending, or continuing the said first mentioned Act;" and by schedule D there is the provision that the companies or persons are to be assessed "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere," and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount of such profits and gains. Now, the first thing important to be noticed here is that the tax is imposed upon "any person residing in the United Kingdom." By other Acts of Parliament for the word "person" may be substituted a "corporation" or "joint-stock company;" so that we may read this word "person" here as if the words were for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any "joint-stock company." Then follows the words "residing in the United Kingdom," and so forth. A great deal has been said as to how an individual entitled in his own right to property of this description would be assessed; but I think it leads only to complication and confusion to enter into all the cases which might well be applied to the tax as imposed upon a single individual, and to attempt to apply them to the tax as imposed upon a joint-stock company. I therefore pass away from that, and will consider the matter as if the words "joint-stock company" had been here used in place of the word "person." In order to come within the Act, it must be a joint-stock company "residing in the United Kingdom," and upon that a question of law arises, independently of the particular terms and provisions of this company's articles of association. Where does a joint-stock company "reside," and what is the meaning of the term "residing" as applicable to such a company? The answer to that question, without expressing any opinion at the present moment as to whether there may or not be two places at which a joint-stock company or corporation can reside, is that it resides where its place of incorporation is, and where its general body exercises the powers conferred upon it by the Act of Parliament and its articles of association, and where it meets, and is in bodily and personal presence for the purposes of the concern. Where, then, is that place in the present case? I deny that the whole case presents a single act which is done in Calcutta otherwise than in England or elsewhere than in this very office, which can truly be called the act of the company. That acts of the highest importance as affecting the well-being of the company, the operation of its business, and the realising and disposing of its funds, are done in India, is perfectly true, but they are all done by mere agents, whether they be directors or not, appointed under the sole authority of the general body of, and represented by, the corporation in this country, and so making their acts the acts of the corporation; therefore, within these words, if a company can be said to "reside" anywhere, as we must suppose that it can, in order to give effect to the Act of Parliament touching joint-stock companies, this company undoubtedly resides at the office or place where the directors meet—meetings of the whole company are held—and where they transact their business and exercise the powers conferred upon them by the law and their articles of association. I need not go into the cases about "residing." The question has arisen, as it did in the case of The Attorney-General v. Wheeler, whether the acts of a single member of a firm consisting of several partners, carrying on business in New York, and which single member happened to reside in Nottingham and represented the firm there, and purchased goods which were afterwards sent to America and purchased and paid for by the firm, their commencing the operations and performing a part of them in the name of the firm in this country, made the firm liable; and it was held that this one individual did not represent the firm, and that the firm were not liable to be assessed to the income tax in his person by reason of his carrying on a portion of the business, namely, that of buying goods and consigning or transmitting them to

America; because, in the first place, no one complete transaction of business was ever effected by him; and also because the principal seat of business and the place at which alone the great bulk of the business of the firm was carried on was in New York. There are a variety of other cases arising under the County Court Acts, where the question has arisen as to where the corporations constituting the great railway companies of this kingdom reside. Where, for instance, do the Great Western and the London and North-Western Railway companies reside? Everybody who knows anything of these affairs would say, directly the question was asked, why, at Paddington and at Euston. And it has been held that the railway companies do reside there, because there is the principal seat of their business, and there their directors meet and exercise their powers; there their books are kept, and there or thence all their lines of railway emanate, and either begin or end. I need refer to no other authority. There is none, nor the shadow of any quoted, which goes to show that the place in which the directors or governing body meet and the shareholders hold their general and special or extraordinary meetings and the power of transacting the business is exercised, is not the principal seat of business, and the place in which, in the language of the Act of Parliament, the company may be said to "reside." I am, therefore, clearly of opinion in this case, upon these principles, and for these reasons, that this joint-stock company resides at No. 4, St. Helen's-place, in the City of London. Now, it is said that the whole business is transacted in India, and that "nothing comes into the hands of the English directors excepting what is remitted from Calcutta from time to time to defray their necessary expenses; in addition to which, such proportion of the profits realised in India as is divisible amongst the shareholders in the United Kingdom by way of dividend, passes through their hands." All that is true; but every act which is done, the working of the mills, the realising of the profits, the transmission of the proportion of them to England, and the distribution of them in the form of dividends to the different shareholders, all that, if not done by the company directly in India is done by them indirectly, because it is done by the person whom they appoint and may recall at their pleasure, and who has no power to do a single act or any authority to interfere in any degree in the affairs of the company except the authority conferred upon him by the governing body at home. Then comes the other statement; "after receiving such proportion of the profits as is mentioned in paragraph 11, all that then takes place in England is that the directors call a meeting of the shareholders, and declare the amount that is to be distributed by way of dividend amongst them for the then current year." And then the case gives a statement of the amount of the profits payable to the shareholders in the United Kingdom. Now it is quite true that all that they actually do in England with respect to the dividend is that, having received a certain proportion, about one-third, of the profits, they apportion it among the shareholders who are in England, and distribute and pay over to each of those shareholders the dividend to which he is entitled. But the payment of the dividends to the shareholders who are in India or elsewhere, though not actually done by the hands of the governing body, is done under their authority; and, undoubtedly, at any time upon learning that 25,000*l.* was in the hands of their representative in India, and therefore to be distributed in dividends, they might direct that sum to be at once remitted to England; and if it was withheld by any person or banker into whose hands it had been paid, they might maintain an action against that banker for money had and received, and recover it against him. It is their money, and they are the persons who, in contemplation of law, are the possessors of it as of right; and it is only because it would be a very expensive and useless, and it might be, through the failure of agents and banks, sometimes a very hazardous proceeding to desire the acting director in India to remit the whole amount to the governing body in London for them to remit two-thirds of it back again to India for payment to the shareholders there, that that course is not adopted; they clearly have and might exercise that power if they chose so to do. I do not propose to refer particularly to any other of the statements in the case, because they will all be found to fall within the same principle and to be open to the same observation. Though the property is in India, and the whole capital invested there, and though the produce of the property is in India, and the whole of the money which the company are ever entitled to receive, whether as profits or in any other shape or way, or for any other purpose, is earned in India, yet it all belongs to the company, who might at any moment virtually take possession of it, and might bring ejectment against anybody in India who against their will and without their consent had taken possession of one of these mills, and to such an action there would be no defence. Everything, therefore, is the property of the company, and it is the company thus located in England that alone can deal or authorise the dealing with the property in any way whatever. That this is so appears clear also from the terms of the articles of association. The memorandum of association, after stating the name of the company, and that its registered office will be situate in England, goes on to state: "The objects for which the company is established are, first, the purchasing of the jute mills, land, business works, machinery, plant, and stock-in-trade of the present proprietors of the Ishera Jute Mills, Bengal, with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto belonging, the carrying on there of the trade or business of buying, selling, and manufacturing jute in all its branches, and the extending of the said business and works or either of them." Now, who is that purchaser? Not the director who has been over there, nor the shareholders who are resident in India, but the company themselves in this country. Then what is to be done? Why, the carrying on in all branches of the trades or businesses of dealers in jute and other similar materials including their purchase, preparation, pressing, and so forth, and all this to be done, not by people in India, though it must be done of course by the hands chiefly of labourers in that country, but by the company or by persons authorised by them to do the acts in question in India. So with regard to "the purchasing or otherwise acquiring of any total or partial or contingent interest in, or the taking out in Great Britain, British India, or elsewhere, and the working of letters patent or inventions which may be conducive to the advancement of the businesses aforesaid." No one but the company can do that. Indeed it, will be found that every single act which is to be done, from the beginning to the end, from the coming into existence down to the ultimate dissolution of the company, is to be done by the company, and by them alone, namely, by the governing body or by meetings of the shareholders, all in England and nowhere else. Then we come to this object, "the establishing of agencies for the purposes of the company either in the United Kingdom, British India, or elsewhere." Now there is the key to the whole of the proceedings on behalf of the company upon which the appellants rely. The learned counsel contended that all that is done in India is done by a director there, who may do as he pleases, and by certain persons under him who alone carry on the business of the company. How is that? It is under the last-mentioned article that the company authorised Mr. Struthers to go to India and to do this very act of establishing an agency in his person for carrying on the entire business of the company. But, as I have before said, his act is theirs, and it is they alone who do the acts which constitute the entire carrying on of the company's business. There is, then, a power to amalgamate the company, and so forth; and, finally, "the doing all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects." All this, as before said, is done by the company alone. The next article I will refer to is the third: "The directors may, with the sanction of a resolution of the company previously given in general meeting, increase its capital by the issue of new shares," and then there is provision made for that. Now, that is one of the most important powers which can be conferred upon a company. If their capital be a million, they may increase it to two millions. Could they do that, or take any step towards such an act, in India? Clearly not, even by their authorised agent there. It could only be done by the directors here with the authority of a general meeting. Then comes the last of the series of provisions to which it is necessary to call attention, viz., as to the creation of shares; the company being constituted and having come into existence under the Joint Stock Companies' Acts, and the articles of association being the constitution of the company, the questions come, How is it to be set going, what is to be done, and who is to do it? Here, again, we find that the company and they alone, are to do it. By article 5 "The directors may allot and issue shares in the capital of the company to such persons, upon such terms, and at such times, as they may think fit; and any shares which may be allotted in payment or part payment for property transferred, goods or machinery supplied, or for services rendered to the company, may be issued and, if so issued, shall be deemed to be fully paid-up shares." Here, again, is what we may call really the creation of the entire company. The creation of shares which may pass into the hands of Indians, Frenchmen, Italians, and Englishmen also, is entirely and exclusively the act and under the sole authority of the company. Before a single share is issued or allotted to anyone they belong to the company, who may by such machinery or system as they think convenient allot them to as many people, whether Englishmen or the natives of any other country, as they think fit. I need go no further into the articles of association. Suffice it to say that there are provisions for general meetings and powers given as to the forfeiture of shares and for a great variety of other purposes, all of which powers are vested solely in the company. The only remaining question, therefore, is this. It is the case that every power which has to be exercised touching the property of the company or the carrying on of their business must be exercised by the directors, the general body of the company, with or without the authority of a general meeting; the governing body, and these shareholders' meetings all being in England, where the "residing" is locally situated. Reliance was, no doubt, justly placed upon the fact that the whole carrying on of the business took place in India, but the carrying on of the business, the manufacture of the jute and the realisation of the funds, and the immediate and ultimate disposition of the funds, is wholly and exclusively under the authority of the general body in this country. And the language of the Act of Parliament is conclusive that the assessment shall be upon the company, "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing," and so forth, "from any kind of property whatever, whether it be in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any profession, trade, employment, or occupation, whether the same shall respectively be carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere." Is not this an assessment upon the company in relation to their property, although the property happens to be situated, in the language of the Act of Parliament, not in this country but in India, and in respect of profits which are earned and acquired, not in this country but in India? It appears to me, therefore, that the case is clearly and directly within the terms and meaning of the Act of Parliament, and that on this ground the Crown is, without any doubt, entitled to judgment. Before I conclude my observations on this case, I might say that in the first place the great principle of the law of England in relation to taxation is, that the tax shall only be imposed upon persons or things actually within this country. Here, undoubtedly, the question must be determined. Is this company, who are the persons, and is this property, which, under the Act of Parliament, is included in the same category as property actually in this country, are they or not, under the express terms of the statute, to be treated in the same way, with respect to the application of the principle of law, as if the property had been situated in an English county? It appears to me that the true principle of the law is that they are. Now, although it may seem to be an infringement of one of the principles upon which taxation is levied in any country that two-thirds of the earnings of this company made or arising from a business carried on out of England, and belonging to persons not resident in the United Kingdom, should be subject to taxation, yet the answer to that (and it is not for me to say whether or not it is a sufficient one) is that if a foreigner residing abroad, and having no property or interest in and no connection with this country, thinks fit to invest his money here, and so to obtain the broad shield and protection of English law for his property, he must take the benefit with the burdens belonging to it. It may seem to be hard upon a foreigner, who may be never in his life set his foot upon English ground, and never intends to do so, to tax him upon his whole income, but nevertheless the law is so, and he must submit to it. On these grounds, therefore, I think that this assessment was well made. I might deal with the latter argument so ably urged by Mr. Matthews, which held that there may be cases in which persons in this country may be taxed in relation to property abroad, and that therefore there is something like a reciprocity of injustice, if injustice it be. I will not, however, dwell upon those cases, or upon that argument, because it is founded upon clauses in the Act which have no relation to the matter now before the court, which is as to the property and the gains or income of a joint-stock company. If the words "joint-stock company" had been introduced into those clauses which Mr. Matthews lastly referred to, his argument would have been entitled to much consideration; but I find nothing in the Act of Parliament, or in any one of the numerous authorities which have been cited, which interferes with the plain and direct operation of the clause to which I have called attention, and under which I hold that this company is liable to be assessed in respect of the whole amount of its annual profits. I will now proceed to deal with the other case of the Cesena Sulphur Company. It is not necessary to repeat the observations which I have already made as to the general principles of the law and their operation upon the cases now before the court. Like the Calcutta Jute Company, this company also was brought into existence under the Joint-stock Companies Acts. It appears that certain persons being possessed of some sulphur mines and plant and other property of considerable value at Cesena, in Italy, which they were desirous of parting with, sold the whole of it to a body of persons, seven in number, who were the first subscribers, and through whom the company was constituted and came into existence under the Joint Stock Companies Acts. They became the purchasers of the whole of this property and, like the company in the previous case, they were stationed (I will not use the word "resided") in England, where they had an office, their whole property being within the kingdom of Italy. Again, upon looking at their articles of association, we find that the company was "formed for the purpose of developing and working the mines of sulphur at Cesena, and carrying on the business mentioned or included in the memorandum of association." Then comes a description of the business, as follows: "The business of the company shall include all the business mentioned in the memorandum of association, and all incidental matters; and the working of the mines will be commenced as soon as the board shall think fit, after the 1st Jan. 1872, and whether a part only or the whole of the capital of the company is subscribed." The very origin and commencement, and the first step taken in the creation of this business, which is clearly the act of the company, is "the working of the mines as soon as the board shall think fit." Then, "the working of the company's mines, the mode of the disposal thereof, and the general business of the company shall be wholly under the order, direction, and management of the directors." Everything that is done, whether in England, in France, or in Italy, at Cesena itself, is to be done wholly under the order and management of the directors, subject only to the control of general meetings, as thereafter provided for. The general meetings are in England; the location or residence, as I may now call it, is in England, and the directors exercise their powers and authorities at their office in this country; and, except under their order, control, and management, not a single act of any kind whatever, in relation to the business or proceedings of the company, is or can be done. Again, "the company may undertake any operation or business mentioned or included in the memorandum of association, either singly or in connection with any other firm, corporation, or company in England or Italy, upon such terms as the directors may think fit. The directors shall have full power to register the company in Italy as a 'Société Anonyme,' and to do all necessary acts for that purpose." Now, although it is a registered company in Italy, that does not in the least degree injure its power, character, or nature in this country. And, as in the present case, "the directors may from time to time appoint and send any number, not exceeding three, of their board, to superintend or examine into the working and state of the company's mines and business at Cesena, and to remain there or in that locality for any period of time not exceeding one calendar month, and shall defray, out of the funds of the company, the travelling and hotel expenses of the director or directors who shall undertake such superintendence or examination;" and such director or directors shall make a written report of their proceedings and the state of the mines, their produce and prospects, with remarks and suggestions relative to the company's business as they shall consider proper. Then comes a provision that "no person except the directors shall have any authority to make, accept, or indorse any promissory note or bill of exchange on behalf of the company or otherwise to pledge the credit of the company. No person, except the directors and persons thereunto expressly mentioned by the board, and acting within the limits of the authority conferred on them by the board, shall have any authority to enter into any contract or engagement so as to impose thereby any liability on the company." And then comes a very important article (the 12th), which seems to me alone sufficient to dispose of this case in substance. It is as follows:—"All moneys payable to the company shall be received by the directors, or the bankers, or by some person authorised by the board, and shall be paid to the account of the company with the bankers." When, therefore, the money constituting the annual profits or gains of the company, and in respect of which the present assessment was made, comes to be received, whose was that money, and to whom did it come? It came to the company, it was received by the directors, or the general body of the company, and came into their hands as constituting the profits of the company, and they, and they alone, have the power to dispose of it; and they alone are liable to the assessment. I have disposed of the question of residence, and therefore only refer to the 14th article because it is very short. It may not be immaterial, and it is as follows:—"The office shall be at such place in London as the Board shall from time to time appoint."

[EX. DIV.]

THE CALCUTTA JUTE MILLS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON.

[EX. DIV.]

Then the first officers are mentioned, and there are also many clauses relating to the capital and its disposition; but in every case it is to be the capital of the company, and not a fraction of it can be touched or dealt with except under the company's authority. It is identical in that respect with the previous case. It is, indeed, open to the same complaint, and perhaps in a stronger form, because in the Calcutta case the shareholders in India are subjects of the Queen, and India itself is subject to the exercise of the legislative powers of this country. But that cannot be said of these Italian shareholders, whose case, therefore, if it be a hard one at all, is harder than that of the Indian shareholders. But it is open, as that case was, to the same observation, that if Italian investors think fit for any reason to come to this country, or by their agents who represent them, to become shareholders in a joint-stock company here, and receive a considerable income under the protection of English laws, I do not know why they should not be subject to the obligation of paying a tax upon the incomes so received by them. Howsoever that may be, as a matter of opinion, it is clear that these gains are the gains of the company. A company cannot, as Mr. Matthews suggested might be done, be divided into two or three portions as a partnership consisting of two or three individuals can; and it cannot be said that "so much of this money belongs to the Italian, so much to the French, and so much to the English shareholders; let them therefore only be assessed in respect of the portion belonging to the English shareholders." That cannot be done, and there is no instance of such a thing being attempted. The result consequently is that the whole of these gains, being the property of the company, and coming into the hands of the company, have to be divided in certain proportions amongst all the shareholders, both English and foreign; but until they are so divided they are the property of the company, and only pass into the hands of the shareholders when the dividends have been declared by and under the company's authority and according to the articles of their constitution. Under these circumstances I think that, in both these cases, our judgment must be for the Crown.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question turns, as has been agreed on all sides, upon the interpretation of the word "residence," as applicable to a company. The income tax is only imposed upon a "person who is resident in the United Kingdom," in respect of property which he has there, or which he receives from foreign sources. A corporation, for the purpose of paying income tax, is a "person," and then we have to see what interpretation we should give to the word "residence," as applied to a corporation. Now the definition of the word "residence" is founded upon the habits and relations of a natural man, and is, therefore, inapplicable to the artificial and legal "person" which we call a "corporation." But for the purpose of giving effect to the words of the Legislature, an artificial "residence" must be assigned to this artificial "person," and one formed on the analogy of natural "persons." No great difficulty is found in defining what is the "residence" of an individual. It is where he sleeps and lives. What is the residence of a natural person we understand perfectly well.

Then what is the "residence" of this artificial "person?" All the learned counsel I think agreed here, the residence of an artificial person, such as a trading corporation, must be taken to be where his real trade and business is carried on. I adopt the powerful suggestion of Mr. Matthews, that the Income Tax Act of 15 & 16 Vict., when it speaks of a "residence" does not mean an artificial residence; and Mr. Matthews argued, therefore, that when dealing with a corporation the Act did not mean the place where they carry on the form or shadow of business, but the place where they really carry it on; and that seems to be a definition almost conceded by all the learned counsel. It is one perfectly understood by foreign jurists. There is a German word which is applicable to it, which means "the middle point" of the business carried on. The French term, adopted from Savigny, is "le centre de l'entreprise," the central point of the business, that is to say, the real place where it is carried on. Now all the cases which have been cited support that view. In The Keynsham Blue Lias Company v. Baker although the court held that Keynsham was the place of business, they did so because the real substantial business was carried on there, although the company had no office in London. In the case of Taylor v. The Crowland Gas Company the judgment of the court was put upon the question of the place where the corporation carried on its business. In Adams v. The Great Western Railway Company, for a similar reason it was held that the place where the company carried on its business was Paddington, and in Brown v. London and North-Western Railway Company that it was in London, and not in Chester. The same rule is applied in Shiels v. The Great Northern Railway Company. Then there is a very strong authority, namely, the case of The Aberystwith Promenade Pier Company v. Cooper, in which the place of the company's business was held to be in London, although the pier was built in Wales, and the tolls were there taken. Mr. Matthews, I think, satisfactorily distinguished the case of The Kilkenny and Great Southern and Western Railway Company v. Fielden (ubi sup.), which was cited by Sir H. James. The decision in the case of Sully v. The Attorney-General was to the same effect. And in the last case in this court, The Attorney-General v. Alexander and others the judgment of two at least of the learned judges (the Lord Chief Baron and Baron Amphlett) pointed out that Constantinople, where the company was incorporated (there being no charter of incorporation in England in that case) was the seat of business, that is to say, the place where it was carried on. The learned Attorney-General put a proposition which, with deference, I for one cannot assent to. He suggested that the registration of a company was conclusive of its "residence," and if a company were registered in England that it must be held to reside there. I think Sir Henry James gave a good answer to that when he said that "registration," like the birth of an individual, is a fact to be taken into consideration upon the question of "residence," because, if we find that a man was born in a place, and eats and drinks and lives in that place, it is a strong circumstance to show that it is his place of "residence;" but it is only a circumstance. The birth is not conclusive of "residence." Taking the analogy between a natural and an artificial person, in the case of a corporation we would say that its place of registration is its place of birth, but it is not because it is the place of its birth that its "residence" must be there. It is a fact to be taken into consideration with all the other facts, and if it be found to be registered in a particular country, and acting and having its office and receiving dividends in that country, those are all acts, coupled with the registration, leading to the conclusion that that country is the seat of its business. Mr. Matthews, on a former occasion, I believe, in this court, quoted many American authorities as applicable to the individual States; and yesterday he mentioned a case in Brockenbrough's Reports, The Bank of the United States v. Maclema, as to the difference between a corporation created merely by the act of a State and one created by an act of Congress. He pointed out also that it is not at all consistent with the English view of the subject, that a corporation cannot be a corporation except in a particular State, and he founded that on the authority of the case of Newby v. Van Oppen and Others (The Colt's Patent Firearms Company). The principle of law, therefore, is not, I think, in dispute, and we may take it for granted that the place of business is the sort of artificial residence which one would give to this artificial person to make him a "person resident" in this country, within the meaning of the Income Tax Act. And now comes the great difficulty which I have felt all along, and that is, in applying the facts of each individual case to the principle. I quite agree that the onus of proving the "residence" lies upon the Crown, as put by Cleasby B., in his judgment in The Attorney General v. Alexander, and that if the Crown fails to satisfy the court that the place of residence is within the jurisdiction, or within the area of taxation, it cannot be said that the company should be taxed. Admitting that, I have to ask myself where, in both these cases, was really the centre of the operations, the substantial and real place of business, "le centre de l'entreprise," or the middle point? I am afraid that I must answer that question, looking at the facts in both these cases, by saying that it was in England. It is not necessary to go at any length into the facts, because they have in both cases been so minutely and elaborately examined and commented on by my Lord, but Sir H. James's argument with reference to the Cesena Company, was put in so captivating a form that until my attention had been carefully called by the Attorney-General to the articles of association, I confess I was, if I may use the expression, caught by it. I am not going through the various clauses of the case, but in substance, as was said by Sir H. James, they amount to this: the trading of the company is in Italy, their unrealized and their fixed property is in that country, and everything that is sold is sold there; no goods are ever sent to England, the majority of the shareholders are in either Italy or France and the small minority of them only in England, the original books are kept in Italy, the managing director is in Italy, where he resides; and therefore, said the learned counsel, we have almost everything—books, profits, manufactures, &c., in Italy. At first I thought it appeared that the centre of business was in Italy, but when I looked at the articles of association, and found that the object of the memorandum was no doubt to purchase sulphur from a company or firm established at Cesena, but that they contemplated "taking concessions of any lands wherever sulphur is likely to be obtained," and that it is not confined to Italy, and that the general powers of the company are for "the selling, leasing, letting and disposing of any of the lands, mines, and property acquired by the company," it seemed clear, by the memorandum, at all events, that the operations of the company were not to be confined to Italy. Now, the very first article of association is that "the company is formed for the purpose of developing and working the mines of sulphur at Cesena aforesaid, and carrying on the business mentioned or included in the memorandum of association;" that is, carrying on the business of a sulphur company wherever sulphur may be found. Then, on looking to see where the power is which is exercised by the directors, by the office in London, we find that the "board" is "a meeting of the directors duly called and constituted," and that "the working of the company's mines, the mode of disposal, working, and the general business of the company shall be wholly under the order, direction and management of the directors, subject only to such control of general meetings as is hereafter provided for." Then the directors have power (which they have exercised) to register the company in Italy, and to make promissory notes, and so on. "The office shall be at such place in London as the board shall from time to time appoint." A London bank is to be their "first and present bankers." True it is that they had a banker at Turin and one at Paris. They may invest their money in a reserve fund. General meetings are to be held, and those meetings which are described as ordinary or extraordinary, are to be held in London. There is the power given of adjourning from place to place no doubt. It is true that it is not said anywhere that the board meetings must be held in London; but it is obvious from the facts in the case, and from all the requirements of the articles of association, that the books must be kept at the office, and the office, according to the articles of association, must be in London, and thus, inferentially, we arrive at the conclusion, from the facts, and from the case, that the directors are to meet in London. Without going through the other different clauses of the articles, it appears that almost every act of the Cesena company connected with the administrative part of its business is to be done in London. No doubt the manufacturing part may be and was done in Italy; and so, supposing they found sulphur in some other part of the world, and carried on their business there, the manufacturing part of it would be carried on in that other place; but the administrative part of the business would be carried on at the place from which all the orders came, all the directions flowed, and where the appointments of the various officers were made and revoked, where the money was received and dividends were declared and were payable. We find all these acts performed in London, and I cannot help thinking that the main place of the company's business is in England, and that at Cesena is merely an agency as it were of the principal house, that agency being confined to the manufacture and sale of sulphur, but under the direction of the principal house. With regard to the other case of the Calcutta jute mills, which also has been so fully and elaborately gone into by my Lord, I am bound to say that at one time I thought this case also a strong one in favour of the appellants. The learned counsel put it very strongly, and summed up his arguments as to the result of the case in very clear and terse language. He said in fact this: The only transactions in England are the receipts of the amount transmitted for the payment of the English expenses and dividends, and the declaration of their amount and its division amongst the English shareholders. Again, I look at the articles of association and the case. The office was no doubt lent to the company, or allowed to be used by them for the purpose; from that office would issue all the orders to the managing director in Calcutta, and no doubt until he received orders to the contrary he would have full power and discretion to do what he liked there; but at any moment they might from their head office have revoked his authority or altered any arrangement which he had made connected with the working of the company. The meetings were held in London. The operation of the company in London was, not to divide the money sent among the shareholders, but it was to "declare the dividend." And I apprehend that within the meaning of that clause the directors in London, who had full power, might disapprove of the system upon which the division had been made, and require a different dividend for the future, thus showing that they exercise the authority and are the principal body, while the Calcutta director is only their agent for the purpose of the manufacture and sale of the jute, as the Cesena Company is the agent of the London company for the purpose of the manufacture of the sulphur. Mr. Matthews argued with great ingenuity that, assuming the place of business to be in England, still the only division of the profits here is to be a division of the profits earned by the English shareholders; and he argued that if this were a partnership, then, on the authority of Sully's case, the English portion of the partnership only would be liable to pay on the profits received by them, whereas the Indian portion would not have to pay on their profits. If this artificial being, a corporation, could be made a partnership, and every shareholder a partner, that argument would be in accordance with, as he said, natural justice, and would be very striking. But I fear the simple answer is this, that a corporation is not a partnership, and the shareholders are not partners. For these reasons I cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that the place of business of both these companies is in London, and that, therefore, they are within the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

THE CALCUTTA JUTE MILLS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON.

[Ex. Div.]

COLLIER v. NORTH.

KELLY, C.B.—This is, I think, the first time this question has been raised, and, looking to the peculiar circumstances of the case, I do not think that we ought to give costs to the Crown. Each party, therefore, will pay its own costs.

DIVISIONAL COURT FOR APPEALS FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, J. M. LELY, and R. H. AMFLETT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 19 and 20, 1876.

(Before CLEASBY, B., and GROVE, J.)

COLLIER v. NORTH.

Statute 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, s. 42—Meaning of the word "town."

By 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, s. 42, any person who sells fish within the town of Rochdale, except in the market place (unless such sale take place from a shop or dwelling house), is liable to a penalty not exceeding 5l.

The respondent sold four herrings in an open-street, not in the market place. The street was a main thoroughfare with houses on both sides, in a populous part of the ancient municipal borough of Rochdale, and there was a continuous line of buildings from the market place to the street where the sale took place. When the Act was passed the street in question was not made, and the site of it was in fact green fields. There was no definition in the Act of the meaning of the expression "town of Rochdale." The justices refused to convict, being of opinion that the words "town of Rochdale" were limited to the town as it then existed, but stated a case for the opinion of the court.

Held, that the justices were wrong in refusing to convict, inasmuch as the section was intended to apply to all parts of what might be fairly termed the town of Rochdale, whether in existence at the time of the passing of the Act or not.

This was a case stated under the statute 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43.

At a petty session of the justices holden on the 22nd March 1876, at the Town Hall in Rochdale, Charles Collier, hereinafter called "the appellant," appeared before us in support of a summons issued on an information preferred by him against Bridget North, hereinafter called "the respondent," charging: "That she, on the 4th March 1876, at Molesworth-street, in the said borough, not then and there being in the old or new market place in the said borough, but within the town of Rochdale aforesaid, unlawfully did sell certain fish, to wit four herrings, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided."

And the said information was heard and determined by us at the said petty sessions, and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information.

And whereas the appellant, being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf, now we do hereby accordingly state and sign the following case:—

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were either proved before us or admitted by both parties:

1. The appellant is the inspector and superintendent of the Rochdale New Market Place, established by the Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, intituled

COLLIER v. NORTH.

[Div. App.]

"An Act for providing an additional market place in and for the town of Rochdale, in the County Palatine of Lancaster."

2. In sect. 42 of the said Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, it is enacted "that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to kill, slaughter, or dress, or cause to be killed, slaughtered, or dressed, any beast, swine, calf, sheep, or any other cattle, in any shop, standing, or other place in the said new market, except in such buildings or places as may be erected or set apart for that purpose, nor shall any person or persons, from and after the space of eighteen calendar months from the passing of this Act, put, place, or set up, or cause to be put, placed, or set up, in any shop, stall, show, or standing, or any basket, or stool, table, or board, for the purpose of showing or selling or exposing to sale, any corn, grain, butchers' meat, fish, poultry, butter, eggs, cheese, vegetables, fruit, or other marketable commodities, matters, or things, on any of the public footpaths or highways in the said town of Rochdale, other than within the limits of the said Old Market Place and the said New Market Place, nor shall any person or persons hereafter, on any market day or days or on any other day, sell or expose to sale within the said New Market Place, any meat, butter, poultry, eggs, garden stuff, potatoes, roots, or vegetables, or any fish, at any time within the said town, except as hereinafter mentioned; and if any person or persons shall offend in any of the cases aforesaid, such person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for every such offence, on conviction before one or more justices of the peace for the county, any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, to be recovered and applied as hereinafter directed. Provided, nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend, to prevent or hinder any person from selling or exposing to sale any marketable commodities, matters, or things whatsoever, in his or her own private dwelling house, or in his or her own shop, in any part of the said town of Rochdale."

3. The respondent did on the 4th March 1876, expose for sale, and actually sell, to one Elizabeth Holt, in a certain street in Rochdale, called Molesworth-street, in the present municipal and parliamentary borough of Rochdale, four herrings at the price of 2*d.*

4. Such sale was made in the open street, from a basket carried by the respondent from door to door, and was not sold in the private dwelling house or shop of the respondent.

5. Molesworth-street aforesaid is not in the said Old Market Place or the said New Market Place of Rochdale.

6. There is no definition in the said Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, of the limits of "the town of Rochdale," nor has any subsequent Act local to Rochdale defined what shall be the meaning of the expression "of the town of Rochdale," as used in the said Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, for the purpose of the said Act.

7. At the time of the passing of the Act (3 Geo. 4, c. 58), the said street, called Molesworth-street, was not then made, and the site of it was in fact green fields. The said street is now a main thoroughfare, with houses on both sides thereof, in a populous part of the present municipal borough of Rochdale, and there is a continuous line of building from the Rochdale Market Place to Molesworth-street aforesaid, and such line of building extends beyond the said street to points much further distant from the said Rochdale Market Place.

It is contended, on the part of the appellant, that the expression, "the town of Rochdale," used in the Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, must be taken to mean the aggregation of buildings erected at the time of the passing of the said Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, and of those erected since that time.

It is contended in reply, on the part of the respondent, that the expression, "the town of Rochdale," as used in the Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, has reference only to the aggregation of continuous buildings forming the town of Rochdale at the time of the passing of the said Act.

We were of opinion that the meaning of the said expression, "the town of Rochdale," as used in the said Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, was the aggregation of buildings erected and in existence at the passing of the said Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, and that Molesworth-street aforesaid, being then fields un-built upon, was not within the town of Rochdale, as intended to be defined by that Act. We, accordingly, dismissed the information against the respondent.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the said court, therefore, is, what is the present meaning of the expression, "the town of Rochdale," as used in the Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58. The court is to make such order in relation to the matters aforesaid as to the court may seem fit.

Manisty, Q.C. and E. A. Owen, for the appellant.—The justices were clearly wrong in refusing to convict. The place where this sale took place was within the town of Rochdale within the meaning of 3 Geo. 4, c. 58, s. 42. The spot where this sale took place is within the present limits of the town, and the Act was intended to apply to all parts of the said town then and thereafter to be laid out in streets. This case is concluded by authority. In Elliot v. The South Devon Railway (2 Ex. 725; 17 L. J. 262, Ex.), the question was raised as to the meaning of the word "town" in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 11), and it was held that it meant a collection of inhabited houses so near to each other that they may reasonably be said to be continuous, and that the term will include a space of open ground surrounded by continuous houses. The case of Reg. v. Cottle (16 Q. B. 412; 10 B. & S. 548; 20 L. J. 162, M. C.) is a strong authority in favour of the appellant's contention. That was an indictment against certain trustees appointed under a local and personal Act, which was to be in operation for thirty-one years. The trustees were not to continue or erect any turnpike or tollgate across roads in the towns of Taunton or Wellington, or in any other town through or into which the roads might pass or be made, and the indictment charged the trustees with erecting and continuing a turnpike-gate within the town of Taunton. It was admitted that the gate was not, when first erected, within the town of Taunton, as the town then stood. Two questions therefore arose, first, as to the meaning of the word "town;" secondly, whether the operation of the Act was intended to apply merely to the town as existing at the time of passing the Act, or to whatever should become the town from time to time during the thirty-one years for which the Act was to be in force. At the trial, the learned judge told the jury that the word "town" in the Act was to be used in a popular sense as a congregation of houses, and they were to consider whether the spot where the gate stood was surrounded by houses so reasonably near that the inhabitants might fairly be said to dwell together. As regards the second point, leave was reserved to move to enter a verdict for the defendants. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained to enter a verdict for the defendants on the point reserved, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. Lord Campbell, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, expressed his approbation of the direction to the jury respecting what ought to be considered the limits of a town, and that the enactment was not confined to the town as constituted at the time when the Act passed. The case of The Commissioners for Paving, &c., the Town of Milton v. The Faversham District Highway Board (10 B. & S. 548), is to the same effect, and Cockburn, C.J., approve of the decision in Reg. v. Cottle (ubi sup.).

COOPER (app.) v. OSBORNE (resp.).

[Div. App.]

No counsel appeared to argue on behalf of the respondent.

CLEASBY, B.—The question reserved to us is as to the meaning of the expression "the town of Rochdale" in the Act 3 Geo. 4, c. 58. I confess it appeared to me at first that the Act had reference to an existing state of things, and in some sense that is correct. But the town of Rochdale manifestly does not remain the same, but is of a varying nature from generation to generation. At the time of the passing of the Act the town was a growing one, and the Legislature intended that the Act should have reference to a thing not always remaining the same. The Act itself commences by saying, "Whereas the town or parish of Rochdale hath of late years greatly increased in population and building," &c., showing that the town was an increasing one so far as regards its population. It appears to me, on consideration, therefore, that it would be unreasonable to hold that the words "town of Rochdale" only referred to the town as it existed when the Act was passed. If there had been two separate towns which by continual extension had become joined together, different considerations would have arisen. But when it is manifest that a growth was contemplated, the word "town" should be applied to the old town, together with its natural growth. Therefore I come to the conclusion that this sale took place within "the town of Rochdale," and that the justices ought to have convicted the respondent; the case must, therefore, be remitted to them for that purpose.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. When we look at the object of the Act, and the state of things intended to be remedied, it is clear that the word "town" did not mean town as limited at any particular time, but was intended to include what was commonly called the town of Rochdale. The preamble is as follows: "Whereas the town or parish of Rochdale, in the County Palatine of Lancaster, hath of late years greatly increased in population and buildings, and the present market place, &c., has become so inadequate, that the passages along the public streets within the said town are greatly obstructed, and rendered dangerous to the inhabitants of the said town, and also to travellers by reason of the number of stalls and standings placed therein; and whereas it would be a great convenience to the inhabitants of the said town, and the persons frequenting the said town on market and other days, and would tend to remove nuisances and obstructions if a new or additional market place was provided and established," &c., which clearly shows that the very object of the Act is, as the town of Rochdale was increasing, to confine parties to selling in the market place, and that as the then existing market was inadequate, to provide a new market place for the town. It is worth while observing, however, that sect. 33 provides for the widening of the streets, and for certain buildings being taken down if necessary. Therefore we find direct provisions in the Act having reference to the increasing town of Rochdale, beyond what it was in 1822, when this Act came into operation. If we were to hold that the operation of the Act was confined to the then existing town, then any portions of a street which had been widened would not be within the Act, while the remaining portion which originally formed the street would be within the Act. So that in such a case a sale of fish would be permitted in one portion of a street and not in another portion of the same street. This certainly would be a great absurdity, but, as it seems to me, it would be the necessary consequence of holding that the "town of Rochdale" in the Act intended to include only the then existing town. For if you so limited the word "town," if some of the streets were elongated, on the part so elongated a sale could be legally effected, while on the other part a sale would render the seller liable to a penalty. Therefore the definition of the "said town of Rochdale" ought not to be so limited; and the word "said" merely has reference to the town to which the Act applies, and the expression was intended to include what might fairly be called the town. A row of cottages might be a mere suburb of the town, and not within the town; but that would depend on circumstances. The only other argument that could be raised for the respondent is, that the town may become so extended as to make the market place quite insufficient to meet the requirements of some of its inhabitants. The answer is, that if such a state of things should arise, another application must be made to Parliament for still further accommodation. For the reasons I have given, I think the justices were wrong in refusing to convict the respondent.

Case remitted to Justices.

COOPER (app.) v. OSBORNE (resp.).

Licensed premises—Private friends—Gaming— 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, ss. 17 and 25—37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 30.

The appellant, a private friend of a licensed person, bonâ fide entertained by him after the hours of closing at his own expense within the Licensing Act 1874, s. 30, was playing cards for money on the licensed premises, and was convicted under the Licensing Act 1872, s. 25, of being on the said premises during the period they were required to be closed.

Held, upon a case stated that the appellant was not on the premises in contravention of the provisions of the Licensing Acts with respect to the closing of licensed premises, and that the conviction must be quashed.

COOPER (app.) v. OSBORNE (resp.).

This was a case stated by two justices of the peace acting for the Newark Division of the county of Nottingham under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Newark-on-Trent, in the said county of Nottingham, on the 5th Jan. inst., Charles Cooper, of Spalford, in the county of Nottingham, farmer (called the appellant), was charged before the said justices on the information of John Osborne, of Newark-on-Trent, police superintendent (called the respondent), for that he, on the 29th Dec. 1875, at the parish of South Clifton, in the said county of Nottingham, was on certain licensed premises (to wit), the Red Lion Inn, there situate, during the period during which the said premises were required under the provisions of the Licensing Act 1872 to be closed contrary to the statute in such case made and provided.

Henry Derbyshire, a police constable, stationed at Clifton, proved that on the 29th Dec. last he was passing the Red Lion Inn at South Clifton about eleven o'clock at night, when he heard voices within and distinguished that persons were playing cards for money. He subsequently obtained admission to the premises, and then found several persons present, including the appellant in the present case. The landlord stated that they were his private friends, and he considered that he had a right to entertain them as such.

The said justices' attention was drawn to the case of Patten v. Rhymmer (29 L.J., 189 M.C.). The appellant's advocate admitted the persons in the inn were playing at cards for money, but contended that the Legislature, when inserting clause 30 in the Licensing Amendment Act of 1874, whereby a licensed persons was authorised to entertain and supply liquors after the hours of closing to his private friends at his own expense, intended that the licensed person should have the same rights as any private person to entertain his friends in any manner he pleases, and that, therefore, neither the landlord nor his friends were liable to any penalties under the Licensing Acts.

The said justices were of opinion that notwithstanding the persons on the licensed premises were, as they had no reason to doubt, and found as a fact that they were, private friends to whom the landlord might after hours give at his own expense intoxicating liquors under sect. 30 of the Licensing Act 1874; yet he was not thereby justified in allowing them to play for money; the said justices, therefore considered they were there in contravention of the Licensing Act, as to the closing of licensed premises (sect. 25 of the Licensing Act 1872), and they therefore convicted the appellant.

The appellant being dissatisfied with their decision, as being erroneous in point of law, requested a case to be stated for the opinion of the court.

Should the court be of opinion that the appellant, being a private friend of the licensed person, was upon the premises in contravention of the Licensing Acts, then the conviction is to stand; otherwise it is to be quashed.

The court having remitted this case to the said justices, who stated and signed the same to be restated by pointing out how the defendant had contravened the Licensing Acts, they hereby stated as follows:—

"The reasons for our decision were: By sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1874, it is provided that all premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail, shall be closed at the hours in such sect. named, unless extended by the licensing justices, which had not been done. The appellant was found upon the licensed premises after closing time. He gave no evidence that he was an inmate, servant, or lodger, or bona fide traveller, and only contended that his presence on the premises was not in contravention of the Licensing Acts, but that he was a private friend of the landlord. As he was not there for the purpose only of being entertained by the landlord as a private friend with intoxicating liquors, as allowed by sect. 30 of the Act of 1874, but (though still a private friend of the landlord) it appearing to us that he was there for an unlawful purpose (to wit), gaming for money, we considered he was aiding and abetting the landlord (as the licensed person named in sect. 17 of the Act of 1872), in suffering unlawful games to be carried on on the premises; and therefore that he was on such premises in contravention of the Licensing Acts, and in consequence liable to the penalty in which we convicted him."

The case came on to be argued first at the same time with Hare, appellant, v. Osborne, respondent, on the 17th Feb. 1876, reported 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 294; that was a case stated at the request of the landlord, who was convicted for suffering gaming on the occasion when the appellant was charged in this case. The court affirmed that conviction, but remitted the case of the charge against the appellant as stated by the justices.

Rolland now argued for the appellant on the amended case.—The charge against the appellant, as it appears by the information, is not one of aiding and abetting the landlord in suffering gaming, as suggested by the justices in the reasons for their conviction, but for being on licensed premises after closing time, which is provided for by sect. 25 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94); by that section, "If, during any period during which any premises are required under the provisions of this Act to be closed any person is found on such premises, he shall, unless he satisfies the court that he was an inmate, servant, or a lodger on such premises, or a bona fide traveller, or that otherwise his presence on such premises was not in contravention of the provisions of this Act with respect to the closing of licensed premises, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s." Although under that Act, taken by itself, the appellant might have been liable to conviction, he is by implication now clearly exempt, in consequence of sect. 30 of the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), by which "No person keeping a house licensed under this or the principal Act shall be liable to any penalty for supplying intoxicating liquors after the hours of closing, to private friends bona fide entertained by him at his own expense. Sect. 17 of the Act of 1872 imposes a penalty upon the licensed persons only, and not upon his guests, if the former suffers gaming or any unlawful game to be carried on on his premises; there is, therefore, no such offence as that suggested by the justices, even if the appellant were charged with it.

The respondent did not appear.

CLEASBY, B.—I believe we are all agreed. My opinion is that the conviction cannot stand, because the appellant was not guilty of the offence charged against him. The 25th section of the Licensing Act 1872, which imposes a penalty upon any person found upon licensed premises during the period the premises are required to be closed, must now be read with the 30th section of the Licensing Act 1874, which exempts licensed persons who supply intoxicating liquors after the hours of closing to private friends bond fide entertained by him at his own expense. That section of the later Act must also exempt such private friends so entertained, for their presence on such premises is no longer, to use the limiting words of sect. 25 of the first Act, in contravention of the provisions of the licensing Acts, with respect to the closing of the licensed premises. There is no provision for the conviction of a guest in a licensed house, whether during the hours of closing or not, for gaming or any unlawful game; but the magistrates have somehow introduced section 17 of the Act of 1872, which imposes a penalty on a licensed person for such an offence, into the subsequent sect. 25, so as to make the guest liable for his presence at the time of the landlord's contravention of the Act, although exempted by the second Act. The reasons given by the justices are in this case certainly erroneous, and it cannot be said that the appellant's presence on the premises was under the circumstances in contravention of the provisions of the Acts. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The magistrates find as a fact that the appellant was, within the words of sect. 30 of the Act of 1874, a private friend of the landlord, and being entertained by him at his own expense. The landlord, therefore, was justified in allowing the appellant to be on the premises after the time of closing, and the appellant has not thereby contravened the Act. There was nothing illegal in what the appellant did, at all events until the playing at cards for money commenced. Although the landlord may be convicted for suffering such a proceeding, it seems that there is no penalty upon the persons playing cards either during the open or close hours. More might, perhaps, be said in support of a conviction if the appellant had been charged with aiding and abetting the landlord in a breach of the 17th section, but there seems to be no summary remedy for such an offence. At all events, there is nothing here to support the charge under the 25th section, which is made against the appellant, and the conviction must be quashed.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WILLIS v. MACLACHLAN.

Registration court—Qualification of voter—Power of revising barrister to remove from court—Interruption of business—Stat. 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 16.

By 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 16, a revising barrister may order the removal of any person who interrupts the business of the court, or refuses to obey lawful orders in respect of the same.

At a court held in 1874, by the defendant, who was a revising barrister, the vote of W., plaintiff's brother, was objected to, on the ground that he claimed as a freeholder, but was only a copyholder. In 1875 W. claimed to be put on the list as a copyholder. The plaintiff then produced certain deeds to show that W. was a freeholder, and, in answer to the defendant, admitted that he was present in court in 1874, when W.'s right to have his name on the list as a freeholder was objected to, and had the deeds in his pocket, though he did not produce them. Thereupon the defendant, after censuring him, ordered him to leave the court, and gave instructions to the police to remove him if necessary. The plaintiff then left the court, and afterwards commenced an action in the County Court for false imprisonment. The defence was that the plaintiff was interrupting the business of the court. The judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that the act complained of was done in the exercise of a judicial discretion.

Held (reversing the decision of the County Court Judge), that the nonsuit was wrong, inasmuch as the plaintiff was guilty of no interruption of the business of the court, as alleged by the defendant in his plea.

This was an action for false imprisonment, tried in the County Court of Sunderland.

The following were the material facts, as proved by the plaintiff: In Oct. 1875 the defendant, who was the revising barrister for the district at North Shields, held his court at that place for the purpose of revising the list of voters. Among others Robert Willis, brother to the plaintiff, claimed to have his name put on the list as a copyholder. The plaintiff then produced certain deeds which proved that Robert Willis was a freeholder. It appeared that at a court held in the previous year Robert Willis's name had been inserted in the list as a freeholder; but it was then objected that his claim could not be allowed, inasmuch as he was a copyholder and not a freeholder. Plaintiff admitted, in answer to questions put to him by the defendant, that he was present at the court held in 1874, when his brother's claim to a vote as a freeholder was disposed of, and that the deeds were at that time in his pocket, though he had not produced them. The defendant then severely censured the plaintiff for his conduct, ordered him at once to leave the court, and gave instructions to the police to remove him if necessary. The plaintiff then left the court, and brought his action for false imprisonment.

The notice of defence was that the defendant was a revising barrister holding his court, and that the plaintiff was interrupting the business of the court.

The learned County Court judge held that the act complained of was done by Mr. MacLachlan in the exercise of a judicial discretion, and that he was not liable; accordingly he nonsuited the plaintiff. A rule nisi was afterwards granted to set aside the nonsuit; against which Butt, Q.O. and John Edye, showed cause.—The defendant has done nothing to render himself liable to an action for false imprisonment. By 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 16, it is enacted that "it shall be lawful for any revising barrister, whether revising the lists of a county, city, or borough, to order any person to be removed from his court who shall interrupt the business of the court, or refuse to obey his lawful orders in respect of the same." The conduct of the plaintiff was an abuse of the process of the court. Moreover, it is clear that the judge of any court doing an act within his jurisdiction, and having exercised his discretion, and ascertained facts, however wrong he may be, is not liable because that discretion is erroneously exercised. In Garnett v. Ferrand (6 B. & C. 626), Lord Tenterden, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "Even inferior justices, and those not of record, cannot be called in question for an error in judgment, so long as they act within the bounds of their jurisdiction. [BRAMWELL, B.—Your argument comes to this—that a revising-barrister, having power to turn a man out of court for one reason, if he turns him out for another he is nevertheless not responsible. GROVE, J.—The ratio decidendi here was clearly not an interruption.] If the defendant had authority his decision cannot be challenged. [GROVE, J.—Not even if there was an admitted mala fides?] No; the cases go to that extent. In Scott v. Stansfield (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 220; 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 572; 37 L. J. 155, Ex.) the defendant was a County Court judge, and the action was for slander in his capacity as such judge, and it was held that the action was not maintainable, though the words were spoken falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and without any foundation whatever, and not bona fide in the discharge of the defendant's duty as judge. All the cases on the subject are collected in Kemp v. Neville (10 C. B. N. S. 523; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 640; 31 L. J. 158, C.P.). Erle, C.J., says (p. 551): "Throughout these cases, and many others, the vital importance of securing independence for every judicial mind is earnestly recognised. . . . As the defendant had jurisdiction in respect of the matter, and the person, and the place, it does not appear to us to be essential to rely on his being a judge of a court of record." They likewise cited

Broom's Legal Maxims, 5th edit. p. 87.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard) and Gainsford Bruce, for the plaintiff, in support of the rule.—A great deal of the argument on the other side has turned on the question of jurisdiction, and might be applicable here if what was done had anything to do with the decision of votes. If the contention put forward on behalf of the plaintiff be correct, no action could be maintained against justices under Jervis's Act, because they believed they had authority to do something, although it turns out they had no authority. A man cannot find a fact without at least some evidence to give jurisdiction. The jurisdiction here depends on interruption to the process of the court. [BRAMWELL, B.—Can you say whether, if the defendant has a right, you will inquire how it is exercised, that being the sole question here?] In order to have such a right the defendant must have before him something which he believes to be an interruption of the business of his court, and if there is any evidence to support such a belief he may perhaps then not be responsible. Jurisdiction to strike out the names of voters is one thing, to give into custody is another, though no doubt the one is sometimes incidental to the other. In Houlden v. Smith (14 Q. B. 841; 19 L. J. 170, Q. B.) it was expressly decided that a judge of record is answerable in an action for an act done by his command when he has no jurisdiction and is not misinformed as to the facts on which jurisdiction depends. In Garnett v. Ferrand (ubi sup.) the action was against a tenant for turning a person out of a room where he was about to take an inquisition, and the point taken was that the court of a coroner is a secret court. Our. adv. vult.

The following written judgments were delivered on June 15:—

BRAMWELL, B.—I have no doubt that the learned defendant thought he had power to deal with the plaintiff as he did, and that in so doing he was making a proper use of that power. But whether he had or had not power to do what he did, in the sense of not being liable to be made responsible for it, there can be no doubt that he had no right to, and, in my judgment, was very wrong to do as he did, for the plaintiff was absolutely free from all blame on the occasion in question. I say nothing—I am incapable of forming any opinion—as to whether the plaintiff had on a former occasion done anything that deserved censure. But on the occasion in question he certainly had not. He had answered certain questions of the defendant—by what authority, I know not—and he answered them truthfully, and was turned out of court, not for his then conduct, but for that of a year back. No doubt there are cases in which it is desirable that judges and persons in the position of the defendant should express disapprobation of improper conduct, that it may not be supposed that silence gives consent; and I doubt not, as I have said, that the defendant thought he ought to do so on this occasion; but he could have no right to punish the plaintiff for former conduct by turning him out of court; and in this sense it cannot be denied that the defendant's act was wrong and unlawful. But it was urged before the able judge of the County Court, and repeated before us, that the defendant having power to turn the plaintiff out of court for some cause, must be deemed to have done so for such cause on the present occasion, that otherwise it would be impossible for the judges to do their duty with safety, as they would be subject to actions, the decision of which would rest with a jury, as to whether they acted under an authority they possessed, or on some other ground, and whether they were acting bona fide. The result of this argument would be, that because a revising barrister could properly turn a person out of court for one reason—viz., when he was disturbing the business—he could do so with impunity for any or no reason when he was not, on the pretence that he was. This is somewhat startling, but the arguments in support of it are strong, and what was said by Lord Tenterden in Garnett v. Ferrand (ubi sup.) undoubtedly favours the contention. But I think the question does not arise. The defendant did not profess to turn the plaintiff out of court on the ground that he was disturbing the business. I do not say that any judgment should have been pronounced or minute of proceedings kept that the plaintiff was turned out of court for such a reason. What I do say is that that was not, and was not professed or stated to be, the reason for his expulsion. He was expelled as a punishment, or because he was unfit to be in court. It may be that a Revising Barrister has authority to expel others than those who are disturbing the business of the court. If the defendant here had pleaded that he deemed it right for the due conduct of the business of the court that the plaintiff should be expelled, the question of his right to do so would have arisen. But he has not so pleaded. He has pleaded that he expelled him because he was disturbing the court. That was not so, and the plea is not true. I do not mean that it is dishonestly untrue—no doubt it is supposed to be the true way of stating the defence; but it is, in fact, untrue. I think, therefore, there must be a new trial. It may be said that this will give rise to the same questions, which it is not desirable a judge should be subject to. But it does not. A judge has only to say that he adjudged it was desirable the party should be removed, if that is a defence. Besides, this argument must not be pressed too far. For, suppose the court was held at an inn, and about the time it was over the Revising Barrister ordered a guest to be turned out of a room. It cannot be doubted that an action would lie if the court was over, but in such action a question for a jury would arise, viz., whether the court was over. Anyhow, there can be no law which compels us to affirm what we know to be untrue, and say that the defendant expelled the plaintiff because he was disturbing the court. I repeat, I think there must be a new trial, no damages having been assessed. I say nothing about an amendment, setting up such a defence as I have supposed possible, except that I should regret to see it pleaded, as I feel sure that, in truth, the learned defendant did not turn the plaintiff out of court for any such reason, but to punish him. The defendant has very handsomely admitted that the act of turning the plaintiff out of court was his, and I should be glad if he would further admit that it was wrongful.

GROVE, J.—I agree, and will only add that, as for the purpose of this motion we are to take the newspaper report to be correct, it is clear the plaintiff was turned out of court, not for any disturbance, misconduct, or contempt, or for any reason which rendered his expulsion necessary for due decorum in the proceedings of the court, but for alleged past misconduct with reference to a voter, not with reference to the court; and the expulsion was in the nature of a sentence awarding punishment, and not in the nature of a summary committal essential to the maintenance of order in judicial proceedings. It was the exercise of a jurisdiction which the defendant did not possess, and not an erroneous action or an excessive exercise of a jurisdiction which he did possess. Although nothing wrong was intended by the defendant, yet it seems to me that if his act were sanctioned by law, which I am of opinion it is not, the law would sanction an arbitrary usurpation of jurisdiction where there is none, and a defence of such usurpation which would not be true in fact, viz., that which states as the ground of the expulsion the exercise of a jurisdiction which the defendant rightly had and an act within it, as a justification for an act in the exercise of a jurisdiction which he clearly had not.

Judgment for the appellant. Nonsuit set aside, and new trial ordered.

REG. v. FOX.

Turnpike trustees—Sale of toll-house—Improvement of road—Discretion—The Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict., c. 105), s. 2.

Defendant was indicted for obstructing a highway, having purchased and kept standing a toll-house, not required for the purposes of the road, from the trustees of the turnpike, under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 105, s. 2.

This toll-house was situated in the middle of a wide part of the road at the junction with another road. The addition of the site would have been a slight improvement to the road for the purpose of persons driving a particular way, but it would have been of no material benefit or advantage for the chief part of the traffic; and the price paid for the house was 120l.

Held, upon a special verdict, that assuming the court to have jurisdiction to review the propriety of the sale, the trustees must have a practical discretion under the said section; and that, the price of the house being far beyond the value of the improvement, the trustees were justified in selling the house instead of adding the site to the road.

THIS was an indictment preferred against the defendants for the obstruction of a highway. The defendants pleaded that they were not guilty.

The indictment came on to be tried before Blackburn, J., at the Summer Assizes of 1872, held at Leeds, in and for the West Riding of the County of York, when a verdict was taken for the Crown, subject to the opinion of the court on the following case: This indictment was preferred by the Local Board of Health for the Borough of Wakefield, as and being surveyors of highways within the said borough for an alleged obstruction to the highway, which runs from Leeds to Wakefield, and which was formerly the Wakefield and Leeds turnpike road.

The obstruction consisted in the maintenance by the defendants of a house which had formerly been used as a toll-house under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned.

Mr. Fox, one of the defendants, is a gentleman of property in the neighbourhood, and the other defendant is his tenant, occupying the said house. Before, and in the year, 1758, there was an ancient Queen's highway for all purposes, leading from Leeds through Newton to Wakefield. The course of this highway between Newton and Wakefield was shown upon a plan which accompanied and formed part of this case. There was also before and in the same year another ancient Queen's highway for all purposes leading from Bradford to Wakefield, which last mentioned highway joined the first mentioned highway between Newton and Wakefield. The course of this highway, where it joined the highway from Leeds to Wakefield, was also shown upon the said plan. The road running from Wakefield branched off at the particular spot in question into these two ancient highways leading to Leeds and Bradford respectively. In the 31st section of Geo. 2 1758, an Act was passed entitled "An Act for Repairing the Road from

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. FOX.

Leeds to Sheffield, in the County of York." By that Act, after reciting that the road leading from Leeds through Wakefield and Barnsley to Sheffield (of which the said ancient highway from Leeds to Wakefield formed part) had become deep and ruinous, trustees were appointed for enlarging, amending, and repairing the said road and keeping the same in repair, and were authorised to erect turnpikes, toll gates, and toll houses in, upon, or across the said road, and to take tolls thereat. By the said Act the right and property of the said turnpikes and toll houses were vested in the trustees, who were thereby authorised and empowered to dispose thereof as they should think proper. By the said Act the trustees were also authorized and empowered to widen any of the narrow parts of the said highway or road by opening, clearing, and laying into the said highway or road any grounds of any persons lying contiguous thereto, making reasonable satisfaction to the owners or occupiers of such ground; and it was enacted that such grounds, so as to be taken in, when the same should be ditched and fenced, should to all intents and purposes whatsoever from henceforth become and be and should be deemed and taken to be a public and common highway, and be from thenceforth a part of the said road, not only during the continuance of that Act but for every after. By another Act passed in the 10th Geo 3 (1770), the term of the former Act was enlarged and the trustees were thereby authorised and empowered to continue, remove, take down, erect, and set up such gates, turnpikes and toll houses respectively in, across, or on the side of any part of the said road, and the sole right and property of, in, and to all and every the turnpikes toll gate and toll houses erected, built, or continued by virtue of that or the former Act were vested in the trustees, who were thereby empowered to dispose thereof respectively as they should think proper and requisite.

By other Acts passed in the 32nd and 43rd of Geo. 3, the term of the two above-mentioned Acts was further enlarged.

Immediately after the passing of the first-mentioned Act the trustees had erected a tollgate and tollhouse at the point in the said plan marked "Old Toll Bar," and the same was continued down to the year 1804.

In 1804 that part of the road which lay between Newton and Wakefield was widened by the trustees by certain parts of the ground adjoining thereto being taken into the said road.

Some time before 1804 the highway from Bradford to Wakefield had been constituted a turnpike road, and the trustees thereof under the powers of their Acts had altered the direction of the said road, and in 1808 the said alterations had been completed, and were ready to be open to the public.

In 1808 the trustees of the Wakefield and Leeds turnpike road resolved to remove the old toll-house and gate hereinbefore referred to and to erect a new tollgate and tollhouse; and in pursuance of their local Acts and of the public Acts then in force they duly, in 1808, erected a new tollgate and tollhouse. The site of such new tollhouse was denoted in the said plan by the words "present toll bar;" and, as there appears, it was in fact built upon the site of the ancient highway from Leeds to Wakefield. Its position was at the junction of these two highways mentioned, and at a part of the road about 80ft. wide, the road immediately becoming much narrower both nearer to and further from Wakefield. When the new tollhouse had been completed the old tollhouse was removed, and the new tollhouse, which is the subject of the present indictment, was thenceforward and until the year 1870 used as the tollhouse for collecting the tolls on the said Wakefield and Leeds turnpike road by the trustees of that road, and was known as the Newton tollhouse.

Until the sale of the said last-mentioned tollhouse as hereinafter-mentioned the said tollhouse continued to be the property of the said last-mentioned trustees; and no alteration has been made in the road since the said tollhouse was so built as aforesaid.

In the year 1821 an Act of 2 Geo. 4 was passed by which the earlier Acts of the Wakefield and Leeds turnpike hereinafter referred to were repealed and other provisions substituted. By this Act the right and property of, in, and to all the tollgates, turnpikes, and tollhouses then being upon the said road were vested in the trustees thereby appointed. This and the earlier Acts are to be taken to form part of this case.

The trusts of the said Wakefield and Leeds turnpike road expired on the 30th June 1870, in which year and shortly before which date the trustees of that road, for the sum of 120l., sold and conveyed the said toll house, and the site on which it stood, to the defendant George Lane Fox, who then was, and still is, the owner of the adjoining land, from which the land on which the said toll-house was built is separated by an ancient fence.

If on the facts herein stated, the court should be of opinion that the question can be raised whether in point of fact the Wakefield and Leeds road would have been improved by the addition thereto of any part of the site of the said tollhouse under the provisions of sect. 2 of The Annual Turnpike Act Continuance Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 105), the following statement contained in this paragraph is to be taken as part of the case. For carriages using the Wakefield and Leeds road without turning when going from the direction of Leeds off the Wakefield and Leeds road on to the branch which connects that road with the Bradford and Wakefield road, or without turning when going in the direction of Leeds from the said branch on to the Wakefield and Leeds road, the removal of the said toll-house and the addition of the site thereof to the Wakefield and Leeds road would not have been of any material benefit or advantage. But for carriages passing when going in the direction of Leeds from the said branch on to the Wakefield and Leeds road, or passing when going from the direction of Leeds from the Wakefield and Leeds road on to the said branch, the removal of the said tollhouse and the addition of the site thereof to the Wakefield and Leeds road would have been a material benefit and advantage.

Since the aforesaid sale to Mr. Fox, the said tollhouse has been maintained by the defendants, and they still maintain it upon the site upon which it was originally built; but it has not been used for any purposes connected with any of the said roads or for the benefit thereof.

It was contended, on the part of the prosecution, that the trustees of the said Wakefield and Leeds turnpike road had no power to sell the said tollhouse or the site thereof to the defendant, George Lane Fox, and that the said tollhouse, not being required for the purposes for which it was originally built, is an obstruction to the highway of which the old road, on part of which the said tollhouse was built, as hereinbefore stated, now forms a part.

The court is to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact which in the opinion of the court a jury ought to have drawn.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendants are guilty of obstructing the said highway by maintaining the said tollhouse; and if the court should be of opinion that the defendants are so guilty, then the verdict for the Crown is to stand; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then a verdict of not guilty is to be entered.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6.—BLACKBURN, J.—It appears that about 1808, a branch from the Bradford and Wakefield road, made to open into the Leeds and Wakefield road, was constituted a turnpike, and at the point of junction the two roads together covered a space between the hedges of some 70ft. or 80ft. wide. Except at this spot, in the middle of which was built the tollhouse now alleged to be an obstruction, the road was much narrower in all the three directions. There is a clear passage on each side of the house for vehicles going from Wakefield on one side to Leeds, and on the other into the branch road leading to the Bradford road; and similarly for traffic in the opposite directions. For neither of these purposes would the road be improved by the addition of the site of this tollhouse, but persons have the right to turn into this branch road to Bradford when driving from the Leeds direction towards Wakefield, and so in the opposite way towards Leeds from the branch road; in so doing they have to make a further curve round the toll house than they would have to do if the house were not there; but no one could thereby be put to great inconvenience, and the improvement to the road by pulling it down would be very slight. At all events, in 1870, when the trust came to an end, in which the toll house was included, the trustees sold this toll house and the site on which it stood to the defendant Mr. Fox. Under the old statute (4 Geo. 4 c. 95 s. 57), when a toll house became useless and was no longer required for the purposes of such road, the trustees or commissioners could not sell or dispose of the house, but they could only cause the house to be pulled down; and the site of such house, together with the garden and appurtenances thereunto belonging, might be sold in the same manner as land or ground not wanted for the purposes of the road might be sold under the regulations of a previous Act. Then followed on this subject the Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 105) which in the second section recited the above provision of 4 Geo. 4 c. 95, and enacted as follows in two sub-divisions of the section:

(1) If the road would be improved by the addition thereto of the whole or any part of the site of the toll house or of any garden or land belonging thereto, then the trustees or commissioners of the road shall, instead of selling the whole or such part (as the case may require) cause the same to be added to the road, and shall cause any building standing on the ground so added to be pulled down and the materials thereof to be sold and removed: (2) Where the trustees or commissioners of a turnpike road are authorised to sell the site of a toll house they may, notwithstanding anything contained in the last mentioned Act, sell the toll house and other buildings standing on such site, unless required to pull them down by the person to whom a right of pre-emption is given by any Acts relating to turnpike roads. Subject, as aforesaid, the provisions of the said Act relating to the selling of toll houses shall be of the same force as if this Act had not passed.

In this case the right of pre-emption belonged to the defendant Mr. Fox, and the trustees sold him this toll-house standing for 120l. The question raised is whether under the circumstances the trustees of the turnpikes were entitled to sell as they did, or whether they were not compelled by this first sub-section to cause the site of the toll-house to be added to the road. It has been assumed on the argument that this is a right means of raising the question of the propriety of the sale, and without expressing any opinion as to our jurisdiction to decide the other way, we have come to the conclusion that it is a matter within the reasonable discretion of the trustees whether the addition of such a site will improve a turnpike road. It cannot be intended by sub-section 1 of this enactment to render the destruction of a toll-house absolutely necessary, when only a very slight improvement to the road can be derived from the addition of the site. The provision must be applied practically; and when a substantial value can be obtained for such a house, a real improvement should be secured before it is required to be pulled down. The proper tribunal to review the matter, whatever it may be, ought to give a wide discretion to trustees; here the price of the house was 120l., and although its destruction might have produced some slight improvement to the road, that improvement would have been very dearly purchased at that price. The trustees in our opinion were certainly not bound to do otherwise than they did, and our judgment will therefore be entered for the defendants.

GRIFFIN (app.) v. DRAYTON-IN-HALES HIGHWAY BOARD (resps.)

Exhausted parcels of land—Adjoining owner—Fair and reasonable value—Appeal—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 48.

The respondents sold and conveyed to the appellant, the person whose lands adjoined thereto, an exhausted gravel pit in pursuance of sect. 48 of the Highway Act 1835. The pit was valued by a land surveyor at 155l. 6s. 6d., but a person not an adjoining owner was willing to give 450l. for it. The justices at special sessions fixed the latter amount as the fair and reasonable value under the circumstances. Upon appeal, the quarter sessions fixed the lower amount as fair and reasonable between the respondents and the appellant.

Held, upon a case stated, that the quarter sessions had jurisdiction to hear the appeal, and were right in fixing the value with reference to the interests of both parties.

Q.B. Div.]

GRIFFIN (app.) v. DRAYTON-IN-HALES HIGHWAY BOARD (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

This was an appeal against an order of determination of justices made at a special sessions for highways, authorising the sale of an exhausted gravel pit at a price thereby fixed by the said justices under the 48th section of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50. The appellant is a gentleman owning the land adjoining the said gravel pit.

The respondents are justices who made the said order, and the Highway Board of Drayton-in-Hales, on whose application the said order was made.

The appellant appealed to the General Quarter Sessions of and for the county of Stafford, held on the 2nd Jan. 1875, when the appeal was respited. And the court of quarter sessions on the 20th Oct. 1875, after hearing evidence and by consent of the above mentioned highway board respondents, the justices not appearing, gave judgment that the said order should be quashed, subject to the following case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

By an inclosure award made in the year 1773, under an Act of Parliament passed in the 13th year of King George III., two gravel pits, one of which is the gravel pit referred to in the order of justices above mentioned, were allotted to the highway surveyor for the time being of the Staffordshire part of the parish of Drayton-in-Hales for the repairs of the highways within that part of the parish.

This gravel pit became exhausted many years ago.

The highway board for the district of Drayton-in-Hales have, under the provisions of the 43rd section of the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, become the successors of the surveyors of the highways for the said parish.

The appellant is the owner of a house and grounds abutting on the site of this exhausted gravel pit, and is the only person whose lands adjoin thereto.

Owing to the fact that this site adjoins his house and garden, and to the annoyance which might be caused to him by any other person into whose hands the land might fall, it has a special accommodation value to him far beyond the intrinsic value of the land.

At a meeting of the highway board held in the month of May 1873, it was resolved that Mr. Bright, a land surveyor, should be instructed to report on the condition and value of certain gravel pits, one of which was that adjoining the appellant's lands, with regard to which the present question arises.

Mr. Bright accordingly valued and reported to the board. He reported that the gravel pit adjoining the appellant's land was exhausted, and he valued it at 155*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*

In due course the waywardens were authorised to apply to the justices in special sessions to fix a reasonable price for the gravel pit in question, and to give their consent to its sale.

On the 26th Oct. 1874, at a special session held at Newcastle-under-Lyme, application was made to the justices there assembled, in accordance with the resolution just mentioned.

The justices thereupon made the order or determination now appealed against, whereby they consented to the sale of the gravel pit to the appellant, and fixed the price at 450*l.*; which sum, under special circumstances which do not affect the points of law to be submitted to the court, a gentleman, who is an owner of property in the parish, but who has no land adjoining or abutting upon the exhausted gravel pit, was willing to give.

The appellant gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions against this order, and entered into recognisances to prosecute such appeal. And it is admitted that he complied with all necessary formalities, provided any right of appeal existed.

The appeal came on to be heard at the quarter sessions for the county of Stafford, in Oct. 1875, and the court found as a fact that the sum of 450*l.* was not a fair and reasonable price as between the parish or highway board and the appellant, but that such fair and reasonable price was 155*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*

The court found that, looking at the interest of the parish only, the sum of 450*l.* was a fair and reasonable price for the highway board to obtain for the interest in the site of the gravel pit.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, Had the appellant a right of appeal to the quarter sessions against the aforesaid order of justices in special sessions made on the 26th Oct. 1874? Secondly, Was it the duty of the justices in special sessions to regard the interests of the adjoining proprietor, and to fix a fair and reasonable price as between vendor and purchaser, in relation to ordinary market value of the site of the exhausted gravel pit; or was it their duty to regard the interests of the parish or highway board only, and to fix a price higher than the ordinary market value, but which could be obtained under special circumstances from a purchaser other than an ordinary proprietor?

If the court shall be of opinion in favour of the appellant on both points, the order of justices in special sessions is to be quashed.

If the court shall be of opinion in favour of the respondents on either point, the order of the justices in special sessions is to be confirmed.

Holl (with him Bosanquet) argued on behalf of the appellant, in support of the judgment of Quarter Sessions.—The 48th section of the Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) upon which this question arises, is as follows: "And whereas under Acts of Parliament heretofore made and which may hereafter be made for the enclosing of waste land, parcels of land have been and may be expressly allotted to parishes, or to the surveyor of the highways for the purpose of obtaining materials for the repairs of the highways in such parish, and the materials in such parcels of land have been and may be exhausted. Be it therefore enacted that in such cases it shall and may be lawful for the surveyor of such parish for the time being, by and with the consent of the vestry, and he is hereby authorised and required, with the consent in writing of the justices of the peace at a special sessions for the highways, to sell and convey to some persons whose lands adjoin thereto, or if he refuses to purchase, to any other person, the said parcels of land from which the said materials have been so exhausted as aforesaid, at and for such price as the said justices may deem fair and reasonable, and with the money arising therefrom, and with such consent as aforesaid, to purchase other lands in lieu thereof." By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 44, sub-sect. 3, "The highway board shall, for all the purposes of the principal Act, except that of levying highway rates, be deemed to be the successor in office of the surveyor of every parish within the district." The special sessions deemed 450*l.* the fair and reasonable price for the disused gravel pit, but the Quarter Sessions have fixed the price at 155*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*; the latter must be the binding value between the parties provided the Quarter Sessions had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. The right to appeal upon this order of the special sessions depends upon section 105 of the Highway Act 1835, which provides, "That if any person shall think himself aggrieved by any rate made under or in pursuance of this Act, or by any order, conviction, judgment, or determination made, or by any matter or thing done by any justice or other person in pursuance of this Act, and for which no particular method of relief hath been already appointed, such person may appeal to the justices at the next general or quarter session of the peace to be held for the county, division, riding, or place, where the cause of such complaint shall arise." . . . "And their determination in or concerning the premises shall be conclusive and binding on all parties to all intents and purposes whatsoever." The words giving the right of appeal are wide enough to embrace the order of special sessions by which the appellant was here aggrieved.

Lawrence for the respondents.—This is not, within the words of the appeal section, "an order, conviction, judgment, and determination made," or a "matter or thing done by any justice or other person in pursuance of this Act:" the sale and conveyance are directed by the 48th section to be carried out by the surveyor, with the consent of the justices, at a price which the justices may deem fair and reasonable. If the justices come to a determination at all in the matter, they do so as arbitrators between the parish and the purchaser, and their conclusion must be final; this, by analogy with the fuller provision concerning pieces of land not required by Turnpike Trusts, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 89, seems to be the proper interpretation of this enactment. The other question is, whether even if the quarter sessions had jurisdiction, the higher amount is not the fair and reasonable price under the circumstances. The enactment is for the benefit of the parish, and the parish is not compelled to sell at a price of which it does not approve. The respondents are in the position of trustees, and if they took a less value for the land in their charge than they can obtain, they would be guilty of a breach of trust. If too low an amount were fixed by the surveyor, it might be open to the ratepayers to call upon the justices to fix a fair and reasonable price; but the person who consents to purchase cannot possibly object to the fairness of the price he undertakes to give.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think we must say that the quarter sessions have in this case decided rightly. Two questions are raised upon the facts stated; first, whether this was such a determination by justices as to give a right of appeal, of which I have no doubt; the second and more important question is which of the two decisions of the justices, that of the special, or that of the quarter sessions, is right in point of law. They both turn upon sect. 43 of the Highway Act 1835 the recital of which admittedly applies to this exhausted gravel pit. The surveyor, with consent of vestry and justices is authorised and required to sell and convey to some person whose lands adjoin thereto such exhausted parcels of land, at and for such price as the justices may deem fair and reasonable. It does not appear that the appellant, who is the only person whose lands adjoin thereto, refused to purchase, as he might have done, and the only difficulty is the price. I think the enactment means that when these exhausted pits become useless to the parish, the parish must not act like the dog in the manger, but must allow the adjoining owners to have them for a fair and reasonable price. I do not think it is a provision solely for the benefit of the parish, but it is intended to give advantage to the adjoining owners. Their interests are considered by the directions for fixing the price. The pits are not to be sold by auction or at the highest price at which personal motives might prompt any purchaser to buy, but at a fair and reasonable price, as it may be so deemed by the justices who are to deal impartially with the interests both of the parish and the adjoining owners. The right of pre-emption given to the adjoining owners would be illusory if the section were interpreted to require the parties to fix the highest price obtainable from somebody else. Here it is stated that a gentleman, not an adjoining owner, was willing to give 450*l.* for this pit. His reasons do not appear, but we must assume he had some personal motive which did not affect the fair value of the piece of land. This of course would be the fair and reasonable value, if those words meant the best value obtainable by the parish, and in that case the Special Sessions were right in so fixing the amount. But if, as I consider, the fairness and reasonableness ought to apply equally to the adjoining owner as to the parish, the lower amount estimated by the land surveyor, 155*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, was rightly determined by the Quarter Sessions to be the amount payable by the appellant for his purchase. The Quarter Sessions, in my opinion, had jurisdiction and full power to reconsider the amount fixed at Special Sessions, and by their decision they showed that they rightly understood the objects of the enactment.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I also think the Quarter Sessions have shown a proper understanding of the objects of this 48th section. As soon as the vestry consented to sell, the surveyor was bound to carry out the conveyance to the adjoining owner, if he was willing to take it. The justices then became a kind of arbitrator between the parish and the purchaser, subject however to appeal to Quarter Sessions; and they ought to fix a fair and reasonable price in the interests of both the parties before them. There is nothing to justify them in fixing the fancy price of some other person.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY
(apps.) v. CHURCHWARDENS OF IRETHLINGBOROUGH

*Rateable value of railway — Competing lines —
Enhanced value by traffic on other part of line.*

Q.B. Div.]

L. AND N.W. RAILWAY CO. v. CHURCHWARDENS OF IRTHLINGBOROUGH.

[Q.B. Div.]

Part of the appellants' line of railway passes through a district where there are two other competing lines for the carriage of passengers and goods. The appellants' gross earnings in the respondents' parish, a part of this district, were more than absorbed by the expenses chargeable for the working thereof, plus the deduction allowed by the Parochial Assessment Act; but on the basis of the receipts derived from the enhancement of the traffic on the other parts of the system, the rateable value of the appellants' line in the parish was equal to 45 per cent. of the gross receipts.

Held, upon a case reserved by quarter sessions, that the appellants were rightly rated at this amount.

This was an appeal against a rate for the relief of the poor made by the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Irthlingborough, allowed according to law on the 9th Oct. 1874, whereby the appellants were rated for their railway in the said parish on the gross estimated rental of 1278*l.*, and of the rateable value of 1150*l.* The appeal was heard at the Epiphany Quarter Sessions, 1875, for the county of Northampton, when that court confirmed the rate, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the following case:

The said parish of Irthlingborough is situate on the Blisworth and Peterborough line of the appellants' system, and the line passes through the said parish for a distance of three miles, four furlongs, and 205 yards, or thereabouts.

The said line was made by the London and Birmingham Railway Company, under Parliamentary powers obtained in the year 1843, and formed part of the undertaking of that company.

In 1846 an Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 204), was passed to consolidate the London and Birmingham Railway Company (including the said line mentioned), the Grand Junction Railway Company, and the Manchester and Birmingham Railway Company, into one undertaking.

No separate account has been kept as to the said line, and it is in all respects dealt with as part of the company's system.

Since the construction of the said Blisworth and Peterborough line, the country through which it passes has been also occupied by the Midland Railway Company and the Great Northern Railway Company, and the said companies are in fact competing lines for the carriage of passengers and all kind of goods in this district with the London and North-Western Railway Company. The Great Northern Railway Company's main line intersects the Blisworth and Peterborough Railway at Peterborough, and the Midland Railway Company's main line intersects the Blisworth and Peterborough Railway at Wellingborough.

Upon the hearing of the appeal the court found: First, that if the appellants were willing to let the line, it might reasonably be expected to fetch a yearly rent equal to 45 per cent. of the gross receipts, the tenant paying all expenses of working and maintenance, as is customary in the cases of "working agreements" between railway companies. Secondly, that the said Blisworth and Peterborough line was constructed at a cost of 17,000*l.* per mile. Thirdly, that the gross earnings of the Blisworth and Peterborough line within the respondents' parish at the time of the making of the rate, the subject of this appeal, were more than absorbed by the expenses chargeable against the said line for the working thereof, plus the deduction allowed by the Parochial Assessment Act. But that if neither of the above contentions is right, the rateable value of the line within the respondents' parish as land is to be taken at 40*l.* per mile, by agreement between the parties.

The respondents contended: First, that the rateable value of the line in the respondents' parish is 45 per cent. of the gross earnings in accordance with the first finding of the court. Secondly, that where, as in this case, there are no direct rateable profits, the said line is liable to be rated upon its structural cost of 17,000*l.* per mile. Thirdly, that when, as in this case, there are no direct rateable profits, the said line is liable to be rated on the basis of the receipts derived from the enhancement of the traffic on the other parts of the system.

The court decided in favour of the respondents upon their first contention, and held that the rateable value of the line in the respondents' parish was 45 per cent. of the gross earnings of the line in the said parish.

The question for the opinion of the court is: Whether either of the three contentions of the respondents is right. If the court shall be of opinion that either of the above contentions is right, then the rate is to stand, and judgment upon this case is to be entered for the respondents. But, if the said court shall be of opinion that no one of the said contentions is right, then the rateable value of the line in the respondents' parish is to be taken at 40*l.* per mile, and the rate is to be reduced accordingly to the sum of 144*l.* 15*s.*, and judgment upon this case is to be entered for the appellants.

Slaveley Hill, Q.C. (with him Ewins Bennett), for the appellants.—The conclusion of the quarter sessions is at variance with all the principles of parochial rating. [BLACKBURN, J.—I suppose the respondents' second contention will scarcely be supported; but reading the first and third together, what objection can be made to them?] The respondents bring into the calculation of rates for this parish earnings of the company which have been made elsewhere. [BLACKBURN, J.—Surely we have decided this very point concerning this railway.] The case of Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 134), merely determined that the existence of competing lines might be taken as an element in ascertaining the rateable value of a line of railway. We admit this, but we say that when there are no rateable profits in a parish the profits outside cannot be made the basis of the rate. The judgment in that case goes no further than this: if the occupiers of a line are not getting the most they can out of it, the rating authorities may take into consideration the larger amount other persons might get out of it. In Reg. v. Llantrissant (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 354), it was held that a railway company was to be rated in a parish through which their branch passed only in respect of the profits which the branch earned within the parish; and that the value of the traffic contributed by the branch to the main line ought not to be taken into consideration. Mellor, J., in his judgment at p. 357, said: "It appears to me to be immaterial whether the line be a branch or a main line. The true principle on which that ought to be made is by ascertaining what is the rateable value in each particular parish through which the railway passes, and that is to be based on what a hypothetical tenant would give for the line in that particular parish." This, too, was the effect of the Haughley case (L. Rep. 1 Q.B. 668), which was cited and followed in Reg. v. Llantrissant.

Maule, Q.C. and Sills, appeared for the respondents, but were not heard.

BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think we can say upon the facts, as we find them in this badly stated case, that the quarter sessions have been wrong. In the previous appeal concerning this line, we determined that in consequence of the competition of other lines, one element for fixing the rateable value was the enhanced traffic which the tenant would enjoy elsewhere. Now the facts here are found according to the law as we there laid it down, and we can only say that the application to such a case as this is what we intended. There is still left the apportionment amongst the several parishes, about which our opinion is not asked. The second finding of the quarter sessions is, that this line was constructed at a cost of 17,000*l.* per mile; this, however, is quite irrelevant to the question of rating, which depends only upon what a hypothetical tenant would pay by the year. Then the quarter sessions find, thirdly, that the gross earnings of the line in this parish were less than the expenses; this may be right or wrong as a matter of fact, but no question is raised upon it for our consideration. In my opinion, the third contention of the respondents, taken with the first finding of the quarter sessions, is perfectly right. When there are no direct rateable profits, the line in a parish is liable to be rated on the basis of receipts derived from traffic on the other parts of the line; and this is the test of the hypothetical tenant's rent. The respondents' second contention is wrong, but the quarter sessions were right in finding upon their first and third contention that the appellants were properly rated for their occupation of land in the respondent parish in proportion to the profits calculated upon the whole Blisworth and Peterborough line. This was the principle we established in Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 9 Q.B. 134), and although this may be a stronger case, the principle has been here rightly applied.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The quarter sessions find that the line, if let, might reasonably be expected to fetch a yearly rent equal to 45 per cent. of the gross receipts. There is some difficulty in understanding the exact question left for our consideration, but I take it that this 45 per cent. is arrived at by a calculation of the value of the piece of line in this parish as enhanced by the more valuable traffic in other parishes. I agree with my brother Blackburn that the quarter sessions were right in adopting that calculation.

BLACKBURN, J.—I wish to guard our decision in this case from being misunderstood. We are not deciding how this enhancement of traffic should be apportioned between various parishes. We are not asked for any opinion on that point.

ST. LUKE'S VESTRY v. NORTH METROPOLITAN TRAMWAYS COMPANY (LIMITED).

Tramway repairs—Level—Repair of road—Superintendence of road authority—33 & 34 Vict. c. 78.

The plaintiffs, as the road authority under the Tramways Act 1870, claimed against the defendants the expenses of superintending their opening and breaking up of roads under sect. 26, for the maintenance and renewal of their tramway.

Held, that so far as the defendants merely raised the sleepers and rails to the level of the road, or raised the stone packing of the road to the level of the surface of the rails, they were maintaining and keeping the road in good condition and repair under sect. 28, and were not liable to the superintendence of the road authority under sect. 26.

THIS was an action brought to recover the amount of an award, and moneys alleged to be recoverable under the Tramways Act 1870, in respect of the superintendence by the plaintiffs of works in connection with the defendant's tramways. And upon demurrer in the action coming on for argument, it was, by consent of all parties, ordered by the court that the facts should be stated for the opinion of the court in the form of the following case:

1. The plaintiffs are the road authority for the parish of St. Luke, Middlesex, in the county of Middlesex.

2. The defendants were incorporated as a tramway company by the North Metropolitan Tramways Act 1869, and are subject to the regulations of part 2 of the Tramways Act 1870. A portion of their tramway made under the powers conferred on them by the North Metropolitan Tramways Companies Act 1870, and completed before Midsummer 1872, runs through the parish of St. Luke, Middlesex.

3. The mode in which the tramway is constructed and laid is as follows: The rails are laid on longitudinal timber sleepers, about 16ft. to 26ft. in length, connected together at intervals by transverse tyerods of iron. The sleepers rest in and upon a bed of concrete about 6in., in thickness, extending under the whole distance between the sleepers, and for a considerable distance on each side. Upon this concrete also rest, both between and on each side of the rails and sleepers, granite paving stones of about the same thickness as the concrete, and which also form the surface of the roadway for general traffic, the upper surface of the stones being level with the surface of the rails.

4. A tramway constructed as mentioned in the last preceding paragraph could be used for a few days, but would not be permanently stable or durable without there being for the whole distance between the sleepers and for a distance of about 18in. on each side either granite paving stones or some other solid packing.

5. During the year commencing at midsummer 1872, and ending at midsummer 1873, the defendants on some occasions lifted and relaid paving stones between and within 18in. on either side of their rails in the plaintiff's parish, sometimes one or two, sometimes more, sometimes as many as a dozen stones at a time, in order, by slightly lifting the sleepers with a lever and thrusting ballast or other material under it, to raise to a proper level a sleeper which had sunk, and so brought the surface of the rail below the level of the stones, or for some other purpose directly connected with the sleepers and rails themselves.

6. On many occasions during the same year the defendants in like manner lifted and relaid stones, because the stones had sunk below the level of the rails, and it was necessary to raise them by placing ballast or other material underneath them.

7. Where stones have sunk as mentioned in the last preceding paragraph, it would be a prudent thing for the security of the sleepers and rails, to make good the defects, because if such defect were to spread and become extensive, it might in time endanger the stability of the sleepers and rails; but the sinking of a few stones would cause no immediate danger to them. For the safety of the general traffic over the road it is necessary that any such sinking of the stones below the level of the rails, and any sinking of the rails below the level of the stones, should be immediately made good. It would not be possible consistently with the safety of the general traffic to wait for the expiration of a seven days' notice before doing so, and a gang of men is constantly, or almost constantly, employed by the defendants for this purpose up and down their tramway lines, under the superintendence of the defendants' engineers.

8. Unless the matters mentioned in paragraphs 5 and 6 amount to opening or breaking up of the road there was no opening or breaking up of any road by the defendants in the parish of St. Luke during the year from midsummer 1872 to midsummer 1873.

9. During that year Mr. Joseph Niblett was surveyor to the parish of St. Luke, and as such he was paid a salary by the plaintiffs; and it was his duty as such surveyor, among other things, to superintend, and he did superintend all the roads in the parish under the charge of the plaintiffs. Mr. Niblett, was frequently up and down the line of the defendants' tramway, and from time to time inspected the condition of the tramway and the road. He from time to time called the attention of the defendants to any defects which he thought existed in the tramway or the paving for which the defendants were responsible, and called upon them to make them good; and he from time to time inspected and examined the work being done by the defendants as mentioned in paragraphs 5 and 6.

10. No notice was ever given by the defendants to Mr. Niblett or to any other person on behalf of the plaintiffs of their intention to do any of the things mentioned in paragraphs 5 and 6, nor was any such notice ever demanded or any complaint made of its not being or having been given, nor, except as mentioned in the last preceding paragraph, was any notice ever given to the defendants that Mr. Niblett or any person on the part of the plaintiffs, was superintending or claimed to superintend any work done by the defendants.

11. The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants the sum of 25*l.*, alleging that they were entitled to recover that sum as the reasonable expense of superintendence for the year from midsummer 1872 to midsummer 1873, under part 2 of the Tramways Act 1870. This sum of 25*l.* was paid by the plaintiffs to Mr. Niblett before such claim was so made upon the defendants.

12. The defendants declined to pay the sum so claimed, and thereupon the plaintiffs, alleging that a difference had arisen between them and the defendants with reference to the said claim within the meaning of the 33rd section of the Tramways Act 1870, applied to the Board of Trade to appoint a referee to settle such matter in difference; and the Board of Trade appointed Mr. Gabriel Prior Goldney, barrister-at-law, as such referee.

13. The defendants protested to the Board of Trade against the appointment of the said referee, and against his proceeding to hear or determine the matters in difference. The defendants in like manner protested to the said referee against his so proceeding, and all the proceedings before him were subject to such protest.

14. The facts proved before the said referee were those hereinafter stated. And it was contended on the part of the plaintiffs, and denied on the part of the defendants, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants a sum of money as the reasonable expense of superintending the opening and breaking up of roads by the defendants within the meaning of the 26th section of the Tramways Act 1870.

15. The said referee made his award on the 14th July 1874, by which he awarded to the plaintiffs the sum of 15*l.* and the costs of the reference.

16. The court may draw inferences of fact.

17. It is agreed that the amount of costs, if any, recoverable under the said award, and the amount, if any, recoverable in respect of superintendence apart from that award, shall be ascertained, if necessary, by the arbitrator by whom this case is stated.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover upon the said award; secondly, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of superintendence of the matters mentioned in the fifth paragraph; and, thirdly, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of superintendence of the matters mentioned in the sixth paragraph.

If the court shall be of opinion in favour of the plaintiffs upon the first question, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 15*l.*, and a sum for costs of the said reference to be ascertained as hereinbefore proved, and costs of suit. If the court shall be of opinion against the plaintiffs upon the first question, and shall be of opinion in favour of the plaintiffs upon the second or third question, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for a sum to be ascertained in the manner hereinbefore provided. It is agreed that in such case the costs of this action, so far as relates to the last-mentioned claims, shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator by whom this case is stated. If the court shall be of opinion in favour of the defendants upon all the questions, judgment is to be entered for the defendants for their costs.

Finlay (with him Day, Q.C.), argued for the plaintiffs.—The three questions in the case may be considered as two only: First, whether the award is final; secondly, whether any of the matters in respect of which the plaintiffs' superintendence is charged can be subject to the provisions of the Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78). [BLACKBURN, J.—You had better first satisfy us that the Act applies to these matters.] Paragraph 3 shows that the granite paving stones and the concrete, together with the rails and sleepers, all form parts of the tramway. By sect. 25, "Every tramway shall be laid and maintained in such manner that the uppermost surface of the rail shall be on a level with the surface of the road, and shall not be opened for public traffic until the same has been inspected and certified to be fit for such traffic, in the prescribed manner." By sect. 26, "The promoters from time to time, for the purpose of making, forming, laying down, maintaining, and renewing any tramway duly authorised, or any part or parts thereof respectively, may open and break up any road, subject to the following regulations: (1) They shall give to the road authority notice of their intention, specifying the time at which they will begin to do so, and the portion of road proposed to be opened or broken up, such notice to be given seven days at least before the commencement of the work. (2) They shall not open or break up or alter the level of any road, except under the superintendence and to the reasonable satisfaction of the road authority, unless that authority refuses or neglects to give such superintendence at the time specified in the notice, or discontinues the same during the work. (3) They shall pay all reasonable expenses to which the road authority is put on account of such superintendence. (4) They shall not, without the consent of the road authority, open or break up at any one time, a greater length than 100 yards of any road which does not exceed a quarter of a mile in length, and in case of any road exceeding a quarter of a mile in length, the promoters shall leave an interval of at least a quarter of a mile between any two places at which they may open or break up the road, and they shall not open or break up at any such place a greater length than 100 yards." It is for the superintendence charged under the 3rd sub-section that this award was made and this action brought.

Beresford (with him Benjamin, Q.C.), for the defendants.—At the rate charged for this superintendence, it would cost the defendants about 750*l.* a year if they were liable under the circumstances stated in paragraphs 5 and 6. It is clear from sub-sect. 1 of sect. 26, that if the contention of the plaintiffs be correct, the defendants would be subject to indictment for every stone lifted and relaid without seven days' notice to the road authority. But it is not only by reason of its inconvenience that such an interpretation of the Act is improbable, it is at least consistent with all its provisions to limit the superintendence of the road authority to those occasions of opening and breaking up the road which interfere with the general traffic. The 4th sub-section of sect. 26, by requiring the consent of the road authority to the opening or breaking up of a greater length than 100 yards, evidently contemplates the independent action of the company in repairs of a smaller description. The provisions of sect. 27 are not applicable to such matters as those described in paragraphs 5 and 6; the words of the section are, "When the promoters have opened or broken up any portion of any road, they shall be under the following further obligations, namely: (1) They shall with all convenient speed, and in all cases, within four weeks at the most (unless the road authority otherwise consents in writing), complete the work on account of which they opened or broke up the same, and (subject to the formation, maintenance, or renewal of the tramway) fill in the ground and make good the surface, and to the satisfaction of the road authority restore the portion of the road to as good condition as that in which it was before it was opened or broken up, and clear away all surplus paving or metalling material or rubbish occasioned thereby. (2) They shall in the meantime cause the place where the road is opened or broken up to be fenced or watched, and to be properly lighted at night. (3) They shall bear or pay all reasonable expenses of the repairs of the road for six months after the same is restored, as far as those expenses are increased by the opening or breaking up." Sect. 28, however, which omits any mention of superintendence by the road authority, and, therefore, intends that no charge shall be made for it in respect of the matters therein provided for, deals with all the proceedings of the defendants described in this case: "The promoters shall, at their own expense, at all times, maintain and keep in good condition and repair, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct, and to their satisfaction, so much of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid as lies between the rails of the tramway, and (where two tramways are laid by the same promoters in any road at a distance of not more than 4 feet from each other) the portion of the road between the tramways, and in every case so much of the road as extends 18 inches beyond the rails of and on each side of any such tramway. [BLACKBURN, J.—What do you say to the plaintiffs' contention that this award is final under sect. 33?] That section is only in respect of any tramway or work, "or with respect to any other subject or thing regulated by or comprised in this Act;" and the appointment of the referee is with respect to the claim of the plaintiffs for one year's superintendence by their surveyor "of the taking up and laying down the tramways of the said company;" if, therefore, these are not matters for which the plaintiffs have any claim, the award is not valid.

Finlay, in reply.—Sect. 28 provides for the repair of the road between the rails and 18in. beyond. Paragraph 5 does not relate to any such repair. The defendants' object in doing what is there described was to raise the sleepers to the level of the road, "or for some other purpose directly connected with the sleepers and rails themselves. Sect. 28 excludes from its application the rails and the sleepers, which form part of the tramway. [BLACKBURN, J.—I do not agree with you on that point, although language more definitely including them might certainly have been used.] Sect. 25 distinguishes between the rail and the road, and provides that they shall be on the same level. I admit that the matters described in paragraph 6 are within the application of sect. 28, but I contend that the whole of that section is governed by sects. 26 and 27. [BLACKBURN, J.—What is the meaning of the last line of paragraph 5, "some other purpose directly connected with the sleepers and the rails themselves?"] That is not explained, but if the award can be justified as to any part of the plaintiffs' claim, the amount fixed by it must be final.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think we must say that the plaintiffs cannot recover on this award, but they may possibly have a valid claim against the defendants for superintendence of some of the matters mentioned in paragraph 5 of the case. First, as to the award being final if any part of the amount determined by it be within the jurisdiction of the referee. We must take it upon the statement of this case that the amount awarded relates partly to the 5th paragraph and partly to the 6th; and unless all the matters described in those two paragraphs are subject to the provisions of the 26th section of the Tramways Act 1870, the award cannot in our opinion be binding on the defendants. We have therefore next to consider how the provisions of that Act of Parliament are to be applied to the repairs described in the case. Sect. 25 requires the uppermost surface of the rail to be on a level with the surface of the road, and I can only construe that to mean that the road must be so kept in repair as to preserve that level. Sect. 26 relates, not to any repair of the road, but to the maintaining and renewing of the tramway; for this purpose the company may open and break up any road, subject to regulations which create the plaintiffs' claim in this case. Among the regulations there is one requiring seven days' notice to the road authority before the commencement of the work; another forbids the opening, breaking up, or altering the level of any road, except under the superintendence and to the reasonable satisfaction of the road authority; whilst another directs the expenses of such superintendence to be paid by the company. Now when the defendants or any tramway company do anything treated of by this section, I think the road authority is entitled to be paid for superintendence, even if the company should find it necessary or expedient, as is stated in paragraph 7, to make the repairs without seven days' notice. Afterwards, the 28th section provides for the repair of the road whereon a tramway is laid, and I have already said that must include the level of rails. This section requires no superintendence by the road authority. I am of opinion that no superintendence can be charged nor recovered for repairs done by the defendants which come only under this section. The matters mentioned in paragraph 6 of the case are clearly within this section; they are merely the raising of stones forming part of the road to the level of the rails. This indeed is admitted by the plaintiffs, the contention on this paragraph being that sect. 28 is governed by sect. 26. Paragraph 5 raises a more difficult question; so far as the acts described in that paragraph relate to the mere preservation of the level of the surface of the rail and the surface of the road, I think they were repairs of the road within sect. 28, and did not justify the superintendence of the road authority. But it is found that these acts were done either for this purpose "or for some other purpose directly connected with the sleepers and rails themselves." What this alternative purpose may be is I think important, and the case must be sent back to the arbitrator who stated it in order that he may determine how much of what is described in the 5th paragraph was done by the defendants "for the purpose of making, forming, laying down, maintaining, and renewing" the tramway as provided for in sect. 26. The plaintiffs may or may not be entitled to recover a part of the amount charged by them for superintendence in accordance with these principles which we lay down; and the arbitrator can fix the amount, if any, to which they are entitled.

ROGERS (app.) v. ST. GERMAN'S UNION (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

QUAIN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

I think the whole of the matters in paragraph 6, and also, with the exception of those done for the other purpose connected with the sleepers and rails which is not sufficiently described, the matters in paragraph 5, are within sect. 28 of the Act, and need not be superintended by the plaintiffs.

Per CURIAM.—The first and third questions answered in the negative. Case sent back to arbitrator to ascertain if under second question anything is due for superintendence of lifting sleepers for some other purpose directly connected with the sleepers and rails themselves.

ROGERS (app.) v. ST. GERMAN'S UNION (resps.).

Poor rate—Right of sporting—Severed from occupation—Reservation of right—37 & 38 Vict., c. 54, ss. 2 and 6.

The appellant was owner of a tenement with dwelling house and other buildings, containing about 19 acres, which he had leased to a person occupying the same, excepting plantations and all timber, and all mines, &c., "and also excepting all manner of game, hares, rabbits, and wildfowl, with liberty of hunting, fowling, and fishing, over and through the said premises at all times during the said term."

Held, upon a case stated by quarter sessions, that this lease reserved to the appellant a right of sporting which was severed from the occupation of the land, and therefore rateable within the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict., c. 54), ss. 2 and 6.

At the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions for the county of Cornwall, held at Bodmin, on the 19th Oct. 1875, an appeal by the appellant against a certain poor rate or assessment made or appearing to be made by the assessment committee of the St. Germans Union and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of St. Stevens, by Saltash, in the county of Cornwall, bearing date the 12th June 1875, in and by which the game and sporting rights on certain hereditaments at Moditon Mill Tenement, in the said parish of St. Stephens by Saltash, in the occupation of Wm. Walters, and of which the said Henry Rogers is owner, were rated and assessed, was heard, and judgment thereon was given for the appellant, subject to the opinion of this court upon the following case:

The said Henry Rogers, the appellant, is the owner of a certain tenement, called the Moditon, otherwise Mutton Mill, in the parish of St. Stephen, by Saltash, within the said union, which tenement is occupied by one Wm. Walters as lessee thereof, under an indenture of lease, under seal granted to him by the appellant, and duly executed by both the lessor and lessee, and dated 15th Aug. 1864, a copy of the lease accompanies and forms part of this case.

So much of the said lease as is material to this case is here set forth:

He, the said Henry Rogers, doth grant, demise, and lease unto the said Wm. Walters all that tenement, together with the dwelling house and other buildings thereon, commonly called or known by the name of Mutton Mill, containing in the whole about 19a. 1r. 36p., situate in the parishes of St. Stephens by Saltash and

[Q.B. Div.]

Botusfleming, in the said county of Cornwall, and now in the occupation of the said Wm. Walters, excepting unto the said Henry Rogers, his heirs and assigns, the plantation recently made by the said Henry Rogers on part of the said tenement, and all timber and other trees growing or to grow on the said premises, with liberty to fell, root, work up, or bark the same respectively at will. And all mines, minerals, and quarries, clay, slate, stone, and marble, on or upon the said premises, with liberty to search for, open, and work the same respectively; and also liberty to plant young trees in the waste places, in the roads, or any of the hedges of the said premises, and to fence out and preserve the same without making any satisfaction or compensation for the same. And also liberty of destroying and altering any roads and paths, or making any new ones, or carrying or altering streams of water on, over, or through the said premises, without making any compensation for the same; and also excepting all manner of game, hares, rabbits, and wildfowl, with liberty of hunting, fowling, and fishing, over and through the said premises at all times during the said term.

The entry in the rate book and valuation list of the parish relating to the said tenement stands as follows:

No. 156. Occupier, Wm. Walters; owner, Hy. Rogers; description, land, game and sporting rights; name of property, Mutton Tenement; estimated extent, 15a. 1r. 17p.; gross rental, 27l.; rateable value, 25l.

No. 157. Occupier, Wm. Walters; owner, Hy. Rogers; description, land, game and sporting right; name of property, Mutton Tenement; gross rental, 7s. 6d.; rateable value, 7s. 6d.

The following were the grounds of appeal available to the said appellant:

Because there is no game on the said farm or tenement called Moditon Mill, and the sporting rights thereon, if any, are of no value. Because of their being no game on the said farm or tenement, no injury is done to the crops thereon, and the said farm is let at its full value. Because of there being no value in the said sporting rights, there cannot in justice be any rate levied on what has no value.

At the hearing of the appeal the court ordered that the appeal be allowed, the court being of opinion that the said game and sporting rights were not severed from the occupation of the land, and that the said game and sporting rights had not been exclusively reserved by the said Henry Rogers in the lease granted by him of the said tenement to William Walters, the occupier thereof. And the court further ordered, on the application of the respondents, that they be at liberty to state a special case for the opinion of the court above as to the validity of the said rate, so far as relates to the aforesaid rating, on the point that the game and sporting rights are not severed from the occupation of the land, and that the said game and sporting rights have not been exclusively reserved by the appellant in the said lease granted by him.

The questions for the court are whether upon the true construction of the said lease, and the clause of the same set forth, the said game and sporting rights are severed from the occupation of the land, and whether the said game and sporting rights have been exclusively reserved by the said Henry Rogers in the lease granted by him of the said tenement to the said William Walters.

If the court should be of opinion that the said game and sporting rights are severed from the occupation of the land, and exclusively reserved by the appellant, the order of the court of quarter sessions is to be quashed, and the valuation list and rate are to stand, but if the court should be of opinion that the said game and sporting rights are not severed from the occupation of the land or exclusively reserved by the said lease, the order of the court is to be confirmed, and the valuation list and rate to be amended by striking out the said rate or assessment so appealed against.

Cole, Q.C. and Charles showed cause for the appellant against the rule nisi to quash the decision of the quarter sessions.—Amongst the exemptions from rating abolished by the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54) sect. 3, appear (sub-sect. 2) "rights of fowling, of shooting, of taking or killing game or rabbits, and of fishing, when severed from the occupation of the land." By sect. 6 "(1) where any right of fowling or of shooting or of taking or killing game or rabbits, or of fishing (hereinafter referred to as a right of sporting) is severed from the occupation of the land and is not let, and the owner of such right receives rent for the land, the said right shall not be separately valued or rated, but the gross and rateable value of the land shall be estimated as if the said right were not severed; and in such case if the rateable value is increased by reason of its being so estimated, but not otherwise, the occupier of the land may (unless he has specifically contracted to pay such rate in the event of an increase) deduct from his rent such portion of any poor or other local rate as is paid by him in respect of such increase, and every assessment committee, on the application of the occupier, shall certify in the valuation list or otherwise the fact and amount of such increase. (2) Where any right of sporting, when severed from the occupation of the land, is let, either the owner or the lessee thereof, according as the persons making the rate determine, may be rated as the occupier thereof. (3) Subject to the foregoing provisions of this section the owner of any right of sporting when severed from the occupation of the land, may be rated as the occupier thereof. (4) For the purposes of this section, the person who, if the right of sporting is not let, is entitled to exercise the right, or who, if the right is let, is entitled to receive the rent for the same, shall be deemed to be the owner of the right." Even if this right of sporting be severed from the occupation, the appellant, who is the owner, ought not to be separately rated. [MELLOR, J.—That question is not reserved for our consideration, indeed no question under the Rating Act 1874 seems to be raised at all.] But in no case can the appellant, under the circumstances stated, be rated as occupier of the sporting rights. This appears on the face of the special case, and an amendment of the rate would not cure its invalidity. [MELLOR, J.—They seem to have confused sub-sections 1 and 3, but the appellant may have had some technical difficulty in raising a question on that point, at all events it is not reserved for us.] But the case should be sent back to be re-stated, as to whether these rights are severed from the occupation of the land. It has been held in Wickham v. Hawker (7 M. & W. 63) that such words as those of the lease in this case do not create a reservation properly so called, but a new grant by the lessee of rights of sporting to the lessor. That is consistent with a joint right continuing in the lessee, and unless the appellant have the exclusive right it cannot be said to be severed from the occupation of the land, within the meaning of the 3rd section of the Rating Act. Parke, B. in delivering the judgment of the court at page 76, cites Doe and Douglas v. Lock (2 A. & E. 705), in which Lord Denman says at p. 743 "that the privilege of hawking, hunting, fishing, and fowling is not either a reservation or an exception in point of law: it is only a privilege or right granted to the lessor, though words of reservation and exception are used." In this manner sporting rights are distinguished from all other exceptions or reservations in a grant. To be severed from the occupation under the Rating Act, the word "exclusive" should be applied in the lease to the right reserved. [QUAIN, J.—That word was not considered necessary for the reservation of exclusive rights in Graham v. Ewart (11 Ex. 326.) The two deeds in that case reserve and grant respectively the liberty and privilege of sporting in very wide terms; Martin, B., in his judgment at p. 347, says "in the conveyance of it (the Woodside allotment) by the father of the plaintiff, the right of shooting, &c., not a right of shooting, &c., is reserved to him and his heirs, and in the conveyance by John Ewart the same right is expressly granted to them in the largest and most express terms, and considering the covenant in regard to trespassers we think it was the intention of the parties, as shown by these deeds, to rest in the plaintiff and his father, and their heirs the exclusive right of shooting," &c. No such intention is to be gleaned from the words of this lease, "and also excepting all manner of game, hares, rabbits, and wildfowl, with liberty of hunting, fowling, and fishing, over and through the said premises during the said term;" they merely reserve for the lessor the right to kill all manner of game in any part of the premises jointly with the lessee.

HOLDSWORTH v. DAVENPORT.

Lopes, Q.C. and Francois, for the respondents.—The justices at quarter sessions have stated the grounds of appeal upon which only their decision is to be discussed, and have clearly manifested their intention to raise no other point than that mentioned in the question reserved. No doubt the form of the rate is not accurate, and in future the 1st sub-section of section 6 will be more strictly adhered to, but that does not affect the question for the court. The quarter sessions considered that, to be rated under this Act, the sporting rights must belong exclusively to some person other than the occupier of the land; and they also considered that the appellant's sporting rights were not exclusively reserved by this lease. On both points they were wrong.

MELLOR, J.—I do not think any good or useful result would be obtained by our sending this case back for the quarter sessions to consider whether they desire to alter the question reserved for us. They seem to have intentionally excluded from their reservation every point except the severance of these sporting rights; and upon that we can only say that by this lease the rights of sporting are severed from the occupation of the land, within the meaning of sections 2 and 6 of the Rating Act 1874. These rights are no doubt reserved only by way of regnant from the lessee, and we must construe them as if granted in a separate deed by the lessee to the lessor. This was so held in the case of Graham v. Ewart, but at the same time words thus reserving the rights were held to deprive the lessee of any joint enjoyment of those rights. I think the words here used are sufficient to show a similar intention in the parties, and we must hold that the appellant enjoyed the exclusive right of sporting over this land. He ought clearly to have been dealt with in the rate under sub-sect. 1 of the 6th section, and not under sub-sect. 3; but whether that matter was discussed or not before the quarter sessions, we have nothing to do with it; and the rule to quash the decision of the quarter sessions must be absolute.

QUAIN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think there can be no doubt that this lease severed the sporting rights from the occupation of this farm; and as I understand its effect it gives the appellant the exclusive right to kill all manner of game upon the premises occupied by his lessee. When we consider the small extent of the farm, and the form of words used in the lease, we can only conclude that it was the intention of both landlord and tenant that the landlord alone should have the right to shoot. In Graham v. Ewart the words of the reservation are stronger in favour of the exclusive rights of the lessor, but it is a very strong authority as to the present case.

HOLDSWORTH v. DAVENPORT.

*Charitable bequest—Pure or impure personality—Debt of waterworks company—9 Geo. 2,

Debt of a waterworks company held to be pure personality.

DANIEL HOLY made his will, dated the 23rd Sept. 1869, and thereby bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to the plaintiffs Albert Holdsworth and Walter Brown, upon trust to convert and get in the same, and the testator declared that his said trustees should hold the money arising from the conversion of such parts of his personal estate therein before bequeathed as might not by law be given by will for charitable purposes (subject as therein mentioned), upon trust thereout in exoneration of all his other property both real and personal, to pay the costs of and incident to the conversion into money of all his personal estate and his just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and subject thereto as aforesaid upon trust for his sister, Caroline Davenport absolutely, and the testator declared that his trustees should hold the moneys which should arise from the conversion into money of such parts of his personal estate as might by law be given by will for charitable purposes upon trust to invest the same as therein mentioned, and out of such investments to pay certain annuities therein mentioned, and subject thereto to pay and transfer the trust fund to the burgesses or free tenants and trustees of certain messuages and hereditaments vested in them for charitable and public purposes, within the town of Sheffield, commonly called the Sheffield Town Trustees, upon and for the trusts and purposes thereafter in the second part of his will expressed, contained, or referred to (the particulars of which it is not necessary to state.)

The testator died on the 31st Dec. 1870, and a suit was instituted by the trustees for the administration of the estate.

The decree for administration was made on the 22nd July 1871, and inquiries were directed as to the testator's personal estate which might not by law be given for charitable purposes.

By the chief clerk's certificate it appeared that part of the testator's residuary personal estate consisted of two sums of 2275*l.* and 200*l.* owing on two mortgage debentures of the Sheffield Waterworks Company.

The mortgage debentures were in the form following:

ACT OF 1864.

Company of proprietors of the Sheffield Waterworks. Debenture No. 69 under Act of 1864, 2275*l.* By virtue of the Sheffield Waterworks Act 1864, the Company of Proprietors of the Sheffield Waterworks, in consideration of the sum of 2275*l.* paid to us by Daniel Holy, of Newbould, near Chesterfield, in the county of Derby, gentleman; Francis Hobson, the elder, of Sheffield, in the county of York, merchant, Francis Hobson, the younger, of Sheffield, aforesaid, merchant; and William Fisher, of Sheffield, aforesaid, horn merchant, out of moneys belonging to them on a joint account, do assign unto the said Daniel Holy, Francis Hobson, the elder, Francis Hobson, the younger, and William Fisher, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the undertaking called the Sheffield Waterworks, and all future calls on shareholders, and all the rents, rates, and sums of money arising by virtue of the several Acts relating thereto, and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the said company in and to the same, to hold unto the said Daniel Holy, Francis Hobson, the elder, Francis Hobson, the younger, and William Fisher, their executors, administrators, and assigns, until the said sum of 2275*l.*, together with interest for the same at the rate of 5*l.* for every 100*l.* by the year shall be fully paid and satisfied. And it is hereby stipulated that the said principal sum of 2275*l.* shall be repayable and repaid on the 21st day of June, which will be in the year 1868, and that in the meantime the said company shall in respect of the interest on the said principal sum pay to the bearer of the coupons of interest warrants hereto annexed respectively, the several sums mentioned in such warrants respectively at the several times therein respectively specified.

Given under our common seal this 21st day of Dec. A.D. 1865. Sealed by order of the Board of Directors.

WILLIAM WATERFALL, (L. S.)

Registered this 22nd day of Dec. 1865.

ALBERT SMITH, Clerk.

The debenture fell due on the 21st June 1868, but by agreement the time for payment was extended to the 21st June 1871. It was paid off in August 1871.

The debenture for 200*l.* was paid off in June 1871.

On the hearing on further consideration the question to be determined was whether the two sums of 2275*l.* and 200*l.* were pure personalty which could be bequeathed by will for charitable purposes, or impure personalty, in which latter case they would become the property of the testator's sister, Caroline Davenport.

Miller, Q.C. and Chapman Barber, for the plaintiffs.—The debentures are a charge on the land of the waterworks company, and are, therefore, impure personalty, and could not be bequeathed for charitable purposes. They cited

Taylor v. Linley, 2 De G. F. & Jo. 84; 1 Giff. 67; 32 L. T. Rep. O. S. 232;

Thornton v. Kempson, 23 L. T. Rep. O. S. 185; Kay 592.

Cary, for an annuitant, supported the plaintiffs' view.

Glasse, Q.C. and Bunting, for the Sheffield Town Trustees.—The debentures are pure personal estate, and not within the Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. The instrument itself gives no right of entry on the land, but merely a right to have a receiver of the tolls appointed in case the company makes default.

Bunting v. Marriott, 19 Beav. 163;

Myers v. Perigal, 16 Sim. 533;

decided what is the true nature of these bonds. Ware v. Cumberlege (25 L. T. Rep. O. S. 138; 20 Beav. 503) was expressly overruled in Edwards v. Hall (26 L. T. Rep. O. S. 170; 6 De G. Mac. & Gor. 74). Debenture holders have only a right to a share in the profits after keeping down the expenses; their right is like that of the shareholders. The profits of the company which are the subject of the mortgage do not arise from land at all; they arise from the water which the company collect and sell at a certain place. They also cited

Walker v. Milne, 11 Beav. 507;

Jarm. on Wills, 3rd edit. 205.

Miller, Q.C. in reply.—Myers v. Perigal was heard on appeal before Lord St. Leonards (2 De G. M. & G. 599). The true test is there laid down at page 620. The whole corporation can do just what the Lord Chancellor there says an individual shareholder cannot do.

Hayter v. Tucker, 4 K. & J. 243.

The whole question is, can the debenture holder get a receiver appointed? If he can he differs from a shareholder, and must be held to have an interest in the land of the company.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—My own view is very clear, but I will look into the authorities before giving judgment.

June 27.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The question in this case is whether certain debentures of the Sheffield Waterworks Company are or are not within the operation of the Mortmain Acts? The testator in the suit by his will so bequeathed his residuary personal estate as to leave all of it which could not be lawfully given by will for charitable purposes to his sister, Caroline Davenport. Part of his estate consisted of a debenture of the company already mentioned for securing the sum of 2275*l.*, and also of a debenture to secure the sum of 200*l.* The debentures themselves are in the ordinary form. In the case of Sparling v. Parker (9 Bea. 450) shares in a gaslight and in a dock company, which possessed real estate for the purpose of their undertaking, were held by Lord Langdale not to be within the Statutes of Mortmain, and in the case of Tomlinson v. Tomlinson, decided in 1823, and of which a report is published in the same volume of Beavan, p. 458, canal shares, which by Act of Parliament were declared to be personal estate and transmissible as such, were held by Sir John Leach to be within the Mortmain Acts. The more recent authorities, however, have held that such shares as those are not within the Acts. In Walker v. Milne dock and canal shares and bonds secured by an assignment of the rates were held not to be an interest in land within the Statutes of Mortmain. The question arose also in Myers v. Perigal. There it was in the first instance held that a debenture of the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway Company was not within the Statutes of Mortmain, but shares in a joint-stock bank, the property of which consisted of freehold and copyhold estates and mortgages for terms of years, were held to be within the statutes; on appeal, however, Lord St. Leonards reversed the latter part of that decision, and held, in accordance with the certificate of the Court of Common Pleas, that the bequest of the shares to the charities in that case was a valid legal bequest within the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. Lord Truro took the same view of the law in that case. In Taylor v. Linley a bequest for charitable purposes of shares in a railway company, which at the testator's death had granted a lease of its railway property, and undertaking for 999 years to another railway company at a fixed rent and with an option of purchasing on notice, was held not to be void under the Statutes of Mortmain. Lord Campbell there thought that the shares retained their quality of pure personal estate, and so were not an interest in land under the statutes. The contrary view of the law, however, as taken by Lord Romilly in Ware v. Cumberlege, was reversed by Lord Cranworth in Edwards v. Hall. In Ashton v. Lord Langdale, Lord Justice Knight Bruce, when Vice-Chancellor, held that mortgages of turnpike tolls and of railway undertakings were interests in land within the Mortmain Acts, but that railway debentures (not being mortgages), shares in railway, canal, waterworks, and banking companies, and scrip shares in projected railway companies, were not within the Acts. So in Langham's trusts, a bequest of shares in a canal navigation company for charitable uses was held to be good, but a bequest of securities upon the tolls, rates, and duties, and upon the general estate of the company created by assignment thereof by way of mortgage, as being a charge upon land, was held to be void under the statutes. But, whatever might have been till recently the correct view of the law on this subject, the case of Gardiner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company decided these very important points, viz., that an ordinary debenture issued by a railway company in the form given in Schedule C of the Companies Consolidation Act 1845, gives the holder a charge upon the undertaking generally as a going concern, and the tolls and sums of money earned by the company, but does not give any specific charge upon the surplus lands or upon the rolling stock. The railway is to be considered to be mortgaged as a going concern not to be interfered with or broken up by the mortgagees, and the right of the mortgagees is to have a receiver of the earnings of the company only, and not to have a manager appointed by the court. That case is really conclusive on the subject, and as it appears from the decision there that the debenture holders have no charge upon the lands, the interest which a debenture holder has cannot be an interest in land within the Statutes of Mortmain. The result on the whole is that, as the testator here has only given his sister such of his personal estate as cannot by law be given by will for charitable purposes, and as I am clearly of opinion that these debentures can be so given, I must make a declaration that they pass to and are now the property of the Sheffield Town Trustees.

R. v. JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 343—Rate made by local board under repealed Act.

A local board of health gave notice of their intention to make a district rate under the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) and amending Acts. At the time the rate was made the Acts in question were repealed (though the local board were unaware of the fact) by the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), which, however, provided that the repeal should not affect anything "duly done" under any enactment thereby repealed. The new Act authorised the levying of a rate for substantially the same purposes as the repealed Acts upon giving similar notices.

Held, that the rate was good as a rate under the new Act, and that the notice given was a thing "duly done" under the saving clause.

RULE calling upon the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to enter continuances and hear an appeal, in which the Elland-cum-Greetland Gas company were the appellants, and the Elland Local Board of Health were the respondents.

The rate (the subject matter of the appeal) was a general district rate, made under the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63). On the 2nd August 1875, notice was duly given under sect. 99 by the respondents of their intention to make a general district rate on 11th Aug., and an estimate deposited for inspection, showing the sums of money which were required for the various purposes of the rate as required by sect. 98, and also the rateable value of the property assessed, and the amount of the rate. On 11th Aug. the Public Health Act 1875, came into operation. This Act, by Sect. 343, repealed the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) and amending Acts, but contained the following saving clause:

Provided always that this repeal shall not effect

(a) Anything duly done or suffered under any enactment hereby repealed; or

(b) Any right or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under any enactment hereby repealed; or

(c) Any security given under any enactment hereby repealed; or

(d) Any penalty or forfeiture or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment hereby repealed; or

(e) Any investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy in respect of any such right, liability, security, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment as aforesaid; and any such investigation, legal proceeding, and remedy may be carried on as if this Act had not been passed.

On the same day (viz., Aug. 11), the respondents, in conformity with the notices given on the 2nd Aug., proceeded to make the district rate "for defraying such expenses as are, by the Local Government Act 1858, charged upon the rate, and such other expenses of carrying into execution the said Acts in the said district as are not provided for by any other rate or chargeable upon the district fund." Notice of the making of the rate was published on the 12th Aug. The rate was made and published by the board, in ignorance of the Public Health Act 1875, having come into operation. On 24th Aug. payment of the rate was demanded of the appellants, who refused to pay. On the case coming on for hearing at the sessions at Leeds, the justices were of opinion that the rate was invalid in consequence of the Public Health Act 1848, and amending Acts having been repealed, when the rate was made, and accordingly declined to hear the appeal.

[Q.B. Div.]

Subsequently a rule for mandamus was granted, against which

Maule, Q.C. and Tennant showed cause on behalf of the respondents, and contended that the rate was a nullity, having been made without proper authority, and cited

Milward v. Ciffin, 2 W. Black, 1830;
R. v. Wavell, 1 Doug. 115.

M. W. Whittaker and Forbes, for the appellants, supported the rule, and contended that notwithstanding that the Act of 1875 came into operation before the rate was made, the rate which was for the usual purpose was good by virtue of the saving clause (sect. 343), which expressly excepted from the repeal anything "duly done."

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question here is whether the quarter sessions should entertain an appeal against a general district rate, made by the Local Board of Elland. The circumstances under which the rate was made are certainly very peculiar. The Local Board of Health, it appears, intended to make the rate under the Public Health Act 1848. That Act requires certain notices to be given; and the Local Board accordingly, in conformity with the Act, issued the necessary notices, while the Act of 1848 was still in force. But it so happened that, before the time for which the notices were given had expired, the Act of 1848 was repealed, and the Act of 1875 came into operation. Ignorant of this fact, and of the repeal, the Local Board proceeded to make the rate under the Act of 1848; and hence the question arises which we are now called upon to decide. Now it is clear that by the Act of 1875 they had power to make this rate, and the purposes of the rate are substantially the same under both Acts, as well as the notices which are required to be given. It has also not been disputed, and is indeed indisputable, that had the notices been given under the later Act they would have been binding. Can these notices, given under the Act of 1848, enure so as to make this a good rate? That is undoubtedly a question of some nicety, and I own my mind has fluctuated considerably during the argument. Still, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the rate in question was well made, and that the court of quarter sessions ought not to have refused to hear this appeal. If the Act of 1848 had been simply repealed, and there had been no saving clause, the case would then have been different, and I rather think my opinion would have been that the notices to be good must have been given under the second Act. But I find it expressly enacted that things "duly done" are excepted from the repeal by the saving clause. What was done here was done in exercise of the powers conferred on the Local Board by the Act of 1848, and in due form. I think it would, therefore, be unjust and mischievous if that which was properly done under the Act of 1848 were allowed to be treated as a nullity, and fresh notices had to be given. The Legislature intended to give effect to anything duly done. The case must, therefore, go back to the court of quarter sessions.

MELLOR, J.—I am glad to be able to come to the same conclusion, and on much the same grounds, as the Lord Chief Justice. It would be a strange construction of the Act if we were compelled to hold this rate invalid. The rate was made by the same persons who had authority to make it under the provisions of the Act of 1875, and the rate itself is valid unless it was precluded by the want of the requisite notices. Now sect. 210 of the Act of 1875 enacts that "public notice of intention to make any such rate, and of the time when it is intended to make the same, and of the place where a statement of the proposed rate is deposited for inspection, shall be given by the urban authority in the week immediately before the day on which the rate is intended to be made, and at least seven days previously thereto." Though I, too, have not been free from doubt during the argument, I have come to the conclusion that this rate is good. There is no doubt the purposes are the same, and there is nothing at all misleading. I think, therefore, we should act in contravention of the intention of the Legislature were we to hold this rate to be invalid.

FIELD, J.—I, too, have come to the same conclusion. The rate is made for purposes in accordance with the provisions of the 210th section of the Act of 1875, and admittedly made by persons who, on 11th Aug., had power to make it under that Act. The question is whether the rate is a nullity for any other reason? It is said to be so, because it was made under the Act of 1848. Now, if the object and purposes of the rate under those two Acts had been different, there would have been some force in the objection; but as the objects are identical, I confess I cannot see how the ratepayers can suffer inconvenience or injustice. I think the estimate was a thing "duly done" under the saving clause, and the same observation applies also to the notices. Is there anything in the rate then which shows it to be a nullity? I think not, and it would be very inconsistent to hold that this rate was bad. No doubt it is important that the object of the rate should be stated in the rate; and if, as in Reg. v. Wavell (ubi sup.), any of the objects were illegal, there would be a difficulty in supporting it. In the present case, however, all the objects are warranted by law, and the fact that per incuriam a mistake was made which could not mislead, ought not, I think, to be held a sufficient ground for upsetting this rate.

Rule absolute.

FINCH v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE YORK UNION.

Pauper lunatic—Order for maintenance—Action—Striking out defence—Statutes 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 12; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77.

An action was brought on an order made by justices under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 96, directing the guardians of a union to pay certain costs for the maintenance of a lunatic pauper in an asylum.

Q.B. Div.]

FINCH v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE YORK UNION.

[Q.B. Div.]

The guardians defended the action. An application was then made to have the statement of defence struck out under Order XXVII., rule 1.

Held (by Blackburn, J. and Lush, J.) that though the order itself could not be appealed against, yet where such order formed the subject-matter of an action a defendant was entitled to plead to such action, and if such plea affords no answer to the statement of claim the proper mode of objection is by demurrer.

This was a motion to strike out a defence under Order XXVII., rule 1.

The following was the plaintiffs' particulars of claim indorsed on the writ of summons:

"The plaintiffs' claim is for 102l. 14s., due to the plaintiffs under an order of two justices of the county of Wilts, dated the 23rd Oct. 1875, by virtue of powers conferred upon them by the Criminal Law Lunatics Act 1867, and the Lunatic Asylum Act 1853, and ordered to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs for the lodging, medicine, maintenance, clothing, and care of a certain lunatic, named James Powell, and a further sum of 11l. 18s., being the sum due to the plaintiffs at the rate of 17s. per week, from the 23rd Oct. 1875 to the 29th Jan. 1876, and ordered by the aforesaid order to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs."

The following was the statement of defence complained of:

"The defendants deny that the said sums of money set out in the plaintiffs' particulars of claim are due from them to the plaintiffs.

"The defendants say that the said order of the two justices of the county of Wilts, dated the 23rd Oct. 1875, mentioned in the writ, and referred to in the particulars of claim, is invalid, and is not conclusive upon them.

"It is contended by the defendants that the said justices had no such powers to make the said order conferred upon them by the Criminal Lunatic Act 1867, and the Lunatic Asylum Act 1853, or by any other Acts.

"It is further contended by the defendants that as the said order is for the payment of 102l. 14s. part of the money claimed in respect of the lodging, maintenance, clothing, medicine, and care of the said lunatic James Powell, for a period of four years and eight months prior to the date of the said order, the said order is bad and of no force whatever, because in the first place the justices had no power to make a retrospective order at all, and in the second place, that if they had such power, they were only entitled to make a retrospective order for the expenses incurred with reference to the said lunatic during the last preceding twelve months.

"Before the making of the said order no settlement of the said lunatic has been adjudged, and up to the present time there has been no adjudication whatever as to the settlement of the said lunatic. The plaintiffs have waited an unreasonable time before the obtaining of the said order, and up to that time no claim whatever was made by the plaintiffs upon the defendants for the maintenance, &c., of the said lunatic, nor did they in any way communicate to the defendants the fact of their having the said lunatic under their control.

"The books of the defendants were, according to the order of the Poor Law Board, closed on the 28th March 1875, and no proceeding was taken for the recovery of the said sums mentioned, or any part thereof, nor was any claim made on the defendants whatsoever within the half year ending the 25th March 1875, or within three months thereafter, so that the defendants, if they are compelled to pay the said sums of money, are precluded from reimbursing themselves for the payment thereof by levying a rate upon the ratepayers of the said union, as they would have been entitled to do if the proceedings or claim had been instituted and made earlier. The defendants have no other means of obtaining the money which will be required to satisfy the plaintiffs' demand, and will, therefore, if the verdict of the action is against them, have to pay the money and costs out of their own pocket.

"The defendants say that, assuming the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid anything in respect of the said lunatic, the amounts inserted in the said order are unreasonable and excessive."

It appeared that J. Powell was a criminal who was convicted at the York Assizes in 1869, and that he became a lunatic whilst undergoing his term of imprisonment. He was sent to Salisbury Asylum and was detained there beyond the term of his sentence, as he continued insane. During such imprisonment, and for a considerable time afterwards, the Guardians of the York Union paid a considerable sum for his maintenance, when they refused to continue it. An order was then obtained against the guardians under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 96, which enacts that "it shall be lawful for the justice by whom any pauper lunatic is sent to an asylum under the powers of this Act, or for any two justices of the county or borough in which the asylum in which any pauper lunatic is confined is situate, or from any part of which any pauper lunatic has been sent, or for any two justices, being visitors of such asylum, to make an order upon the guardians of the union or parish, or the overseers of the parish (if not in a union or under a Board of Guardians), from which, at the instance of any officer or officiating clergyman, such lunatic is or has been sent for confinement, for payment to the treasurer, officer, or proprietor of the asylum, of the reasonable charges of the lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care of such lunatic in such asylum, and such order may be retrospective or prospective, or partly retrospective and partly prospective; and the guardians or overseers, on whom such order shall be made, shall from time to time pay to the said treasurer, officer, or proprietor, the charges aforesaid."

Section 121 of the same statute enacts—

If any overseer, or any treasurer of any county, upon whom any order of justices for the payment of money under the provisions of this Act, or any Act hereby repealed, as such, shall refuse or neglect for the space of twenty days next after due notice of such order to pay the money so ordered to be paid, the said money, together with the expenses of making the same, shall be recovered by distress and sale of the goods of the overseer or treasurer so refusing or neglecting, by warrant under the hands and seals of any two justices hereby authorised to make the order for payment of the money aforesaid, or by an action at law, or by any other proceeding in any court of competent jurisdiction against such overseer or treasurer; and if the guardians upon whom any such order is made refuse or neglect for such time as aforesaid to pay the money so ordered to be paid, the same, together with the expenses of recovering the same, may be recovered by an action at law or by any other proceeding in any such court; and in case of any such action or proceeding no objection shall be taken to any default or want of form in any order of admission or maintenance, or in any certificate or adjudication under this Act, if such order or adjudication shall not have been appealed against, or, if appealed against, shall have been confirmed.

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 12, s. 6, sub-sect. 1: A criminal lunatic confined in any asylum to which lunatics may be sent under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, and whose sentence expires before such evidence of his sanity has been given as justified his being discharged, is to be "deemed a pauper lunatic, and shall be in the same position in all respects as if he were a lunatic who, immediately previous to the expiration of his term of punishment, has been found wandering at large within the parish or place where the offence was committed in respect of which he became a criminal lunatic."

Bromley, for the plaintiff.—The order made upon the defendants is in the nature of a judgment in rem, and cannot be questioned. At all events the only defence available would be to produce evidence showing that the justices have no jurisdiction to enter upon the inquiry. In Kettering v. Northampton (34 L. J. 198, M. C.) the majority of the court held that no appeal lay against an order made under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 96. He referred also to Reg. v. Seaton (7 Durn. & East, T. R. 373.)

Grain, for defendants, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—It by no means follows that because an order made under sect. 96 is final, an action such as this cannot be defended. Whether the defence is an answer or not is another question; but the proper way of raising the point would have been by demurrer. I am clearly of opinion it is not so frivolous as to justify us in setting it aside.

REG. v. ST. ALBANS SANITARY AUTHORITY, ON THE PROSECUTION OF THE SANITARY AUTHORITY OF BARNET.

Notice of appeal, time for—Whether time runs from date of order or service of order—"Cause of appeal"—Public Health Act 1875, s. 48.

The time for giving notice of appeal against an order of justices runs from the date of the making of the order appealed against, and not from the date of service of a written form of order upon the appellant.

By the Public Health Act 1875, s. 48, where any ditch lying near the boundary between the district of any local authority and any adjoining district is foul, a justice may, on the application of the local authority whose district is injuriously affected thereby, summon the local authority of the adjoining district to show cause why an order should not be made for cleansing the ditch; and the court, "after hearing the parties, or ex parte in case of the default of any of them to appear, may make such order," as to the cleansing of the ditch as may seem reasonable.

By sect. 269, a person deeming himself aggrieved by any rate, order, conviction, or thing done under the Act, may appeal, first, to the next sessions held not less than twenty-one days "after the demand of the rate or the decision of the court;"

and, secondly, on giving notice to the other party and the court within fourteen days "after the cause of appeal has arisen":

Held, that "cause of appeal" means the determination of the justices to make the order, and not the service of the order upon the appellant.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the court by the Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions. It appeared from the case that an order had been made upon the appellants by two justices of Hertfordshire, to cleanse a certain ditch. The order was made under the 48th section of the Public Health Act 1845, which section is as follows:

Where any watercourse or open ditch lying near to or forming the boundary between the district of any local authority and any adjoining district is foul and offensive, so as injuriously to affect the district of such local authority, any justice having jurisdiction in such adjoining district may, on the application of such local authority, summon the local authority of such adjoining district to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction, to show cause why an order should not be made by such court for cleansing such watercourse or open ditch, and for executing such permanent or other structural works as may appear to such court to be necessary; and such court after hearing the parties, or ex parte in case of the default of any of them to appear, may make such order with reference to the execution of the works, and the persons by whom the same shall be executed, and by whom and in what proportions the costs of such works shall be paid, and also as to the amount thereof, and the time and mode of payment, as to such court may seem reasonable.

The order was made on the 6th Sept., but was not served upon the appellants till the 24th of the same month. On the 2nd Oct. the appellants served notice of appeal to quarter sessions. It was contended at the hearing that the notice was too late, within the meaning of the 269th section of the Public Health Act 1875, the material portion of which is as follows:—

Where any person deems himself aggrieved by any rate made under the provisions of this Act, or by any order, conviction, judgment, or determination of or by any matter or thing done by any court of summary jurisdiction, such person may appeal therefrom, subject to the conditions and regulations following:—

(1) The appeal shall be made to the next court of quarter sessions for the county, division, or place in which the cause of appeal has arisen, holden not less than twenty-one days after the demand of the rate or the decision of the court from which the appeal is made.

(2) The appellant shall within fourteen days after the cause of appeal has arisen give notice to the other party, and to the authority or court of summary jurisdiction by whose act he deems himself aggrieved, of his intention to appeal, and of the ground thereof.

The quarter sessions overruled the objection, and quashed the order of the justices below (no evidence being offered on the part of the respondents), subject to the opinion of this court whether the notice of appeal given by the appellants was within the time limited by the 269th section of the Public Health Act 1875 or not.

Clarke (Croome with him), for the appellants, argued that the notice was in time. The time limited by the 2nd sub-section of sect. 269 of the Public Health Act 1875 begins to run from the service of the order. So it has already been decided upon the meaning of "cause of complaint" in various statutes:—

R. v. Devonshire JJ., 1 M. & S. 411;

R. v. Derbyshire JJ., 7 Q. B. 198;

R. v. Lancashire JJ., 8 B. & C. 593;

Leeming and Cross's Quarter Sessions, 2nd edit. p. 264.

In R. v. Derbyshire (ubi sup.) the statute 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, s. 1, empowered a party, upon whom an order for payment of money had been made by justices, to appeal "within six days after such order shall be made or given." It was held that the time ran from the making of the order, not from the date of service. But Lord Denman, C.J., observed: "The cause of complaint may well be taken to mean something directly affecting the party appealing, or at least brought to his knowledge; but the period fixed in the present Act is the making of the order." He also referred on this point to Ex parte Johnson (3 B. & S. 947; 32 L. J. Rep. M. C. 193) [MELLOR, J.—R. v. Lancashire (8 B. & C. 593) would seem to be an exception to the general rule.] The phraseology of the two sub-sections of sect. 269 of the Public Health Act 1875 was advisedly varied in order to meet cases like the present. In sub-section 1 "the decision of the court" is spoken of; in sub-section 2 the term "cause of appeal" is used. The use of a different term implies a different object. And "appeal to next sessions" has often been held to mean "next practicable sessions."

R. v. Southampton, 6 M. & S. 394.

Michael for the respondents.—All the cases in which it has been decided that "cause of complaint" or a similar term means service of an order appealed against, were decided upon statutes empowering the justices to make an order on the appellant ex parte. He cited Ex parte Simkin, 2 E. & E. 396, decided on the Nuisances Removal Act, 1858 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 40.

He was then stopped.

BLACKBURN, J.—One could perhaps wish that the terms of the enactment which we have to construe had been otherwise expressed, but I have no doubt as to their meaning. The 269th section contemplates in its opening clause three subjects of appeal—a rate, an order or conviction, and a "thing done" by the court of summary conviction. The first subject of appeal, the rate, would first come into existence behind the back of the party affected, and it is therefore from the demand of the rate that the time of appeal begins to run. The first sub-section accordingly provides that the appeal shall be to the next sessions, held not less than twenty-one days after the demand of the rate or the decision of the court. Then comes the second sub-section, which enacts that the appellant "shall within fourteen days after the cause of appeal has arisen give notice." For the sake of grace of style, or for some other object best known to themselves, the framers of the Act have varied the language, speaking of "rate or decision of the court" in the one case, and of "cause of appeal" in the other. But in my opinion these terms have precisely the same meaning. R. v. Lancashire (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, on the ground that there the judgment was behind the back of the appellant. Where there is a conviction or order it is different, for neither of them can take place without the appellant having notice of their effect at once. The notice, therefore, was given too late, and the appeal ought not to have been entertained.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellants had had an order made upon them under sect. 48 of the Public Health Act 1875, which enacts that a justice of the peace may, on the application of a local authority, summon the local authority of an adjoining district to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction, to show cause why an order should not be made for the purpose mentioned in the section. It appears that the order may be made ex parte in case of default of appearance, and this is very reasonable, for otherwise authorities which had brought themselves within the section might escape orders by merely not appearing. The hearing in default has all the incidents of a hearing in presence of the parties. As to the question in this case, where there is a party aggrieved by an order, it has been argued that the change of expression from "decision of the court" to "cause of appeal" shows that the meaning is different; but with this I cannot agree, although I fail to see the object of the change of expression. The appellants were present here. It has never been held that a formal order is necessary before the time for giving notice begins to run. The appellant knows that there is an order made against him as soon as the decision of the court is pronounced, and that is the "cause of appeal" within the meaning of the statute.

REG. ON THE PROSECUTION OF JOHN JOHNSON v. THE INHABITANTS OF GREENHOW.

Highway—Portion of road carried away by landslide—Liability to repair.

The inhabitants of the defendant parish were indicted for the non-repair of a highway. It appeared that a portion of the highway in question had been carried away by a landslide, and its place supplied and filled up with earth, stones, and other debris. No trace remained of the old metalled road, but the line of it was known and admitted. At the trial a verdict of guilty was entered, subject to the report of an engineer on certain points, leave being given to either party to state a special case on such report. The engineer found that the road was absolutely destroyed to an extent of 252 yards, but that it was practicable to form a permanent and passable road along the old track at a cost of 341l. A special case was afterwards stated. The court had power to draw inferences of fact.

Held (per Blackburn, and Quain, J.J.) that though the metalled portion of the road had been carried away, the line itself was still known, and that consequently there was no such total destruction of the road as would extinguish the liability which ordinarily attaches to a parish.

This was an indictment against the inhabitants of the township of Greenhow, in the North Riding of the county of York, for the non-repair of a highway, in the said township.

The indictment was removed by certiorari into this court, and came on to be tried before Amphlett, B. at the spring assize, 1875, held at York, when a verdict of guilty was found by consent, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following

CASE.

1. The prosecutors are John Johnson, Matthew Smith, and other inhabitants of Bilsdale, and the defendants are the inhabitants of the township of Greenhow, one of three townships in the parish of Ingleby Greenhow, which parish forms part of the highway district of Langbaugh West, in the North Riding of the county of York. And it is admitted for the purposes of this case, that the defendant township of Greenhow is liable to maintain its own highways.

2. The road is properly described in the indictment, copy of which is hereto annexed, to be a common Queen's highway, called or known by the name of Broughton Bank Top, leading from Stokesley towards and unto Bilsdale, in the North Riding of the county of York.

3. The indictment alleges that a certain part of the same road, situate, lying, and being in the said district or township called Greenhow, being in length divers, to wit 251, yards, and in breadth divers, to wit six, yards on the 1st July 1873, and from thence continually afterwards until the date of the said indictment, was very ruinous, miry, deep, broken, and in great decay, for want of due reparation and amendment.

4. The highway in question is an ordinary metalled road, and that portion of it mentioned in paragraph 3, and now in dispute, runs north and south along the slope of a hill several hundred feet above the level of the valley beneath the slope, being at right angles to the direction of the road, and very precipitous.

5. Up to the time of the landslip hereinafter mentioned, the said road was a highway repairable by the parish or township of Engleby Greenhow, and was, except as hereinafter mentioned, and now is in good and proper repair.

6. In April and June 1872, two landslips of great magnitude occurred on the said slope of the said hill, the second being a continuation of the first, the two landslips together comprising many acres of land, and extending from the top of the said slope to about 170 yards below the said highway.

7. The portion of the said highway now in dispute and out of repair was absolutely destroyed by the said landslip, that is to say was carried away into the valley below, and its place supplied and filled up with earth, stones, and other débris of landslip.

8. A large portion of the hillside was moved bodily downwards to the valley beneath, and the ground on which the old road stood was broken up and carried away as stated.

9. The depth and level of the débris along the line of the old road differs much. The débris is at one point 25ft. above and at another 2ft. below the level of the old road, and now occupies the line or track of the old highway.

10. This débris consists of loose soil, stone, and shale, and there is water coming from springs on the hillside which percolate through and over it, and from the time of the original landslips up to the present time in dry weather both horses and some carts and conveyances still continue to pass over it nearly in but higher up the hill than the line of the old road, and of course with great danger and difficulty. In wet weather the débris is at times so full of water as to be impassable, as there are no drains.

11. At the point where the débris is 25ft. above the level of the old road it has been ascertained by boring that for a depth of 31½ft. from the surface there is nothing but soil, shale, and stones, and that there is no trace of the old metalled road, but the line of it is known and admitted.

12. The metal, consisting of broken stones of the old road, was carried away at one point 55yds. down the hill into the valley from its original position, and a wall which ran along the east or lower side thereof as a fence or boundary on that side was carried downwards along with the road, and is visible among the débris for about 50yds. of its length.

13. At the north edge of the landslip, at the point where the same meets the uninjured portion of the said highway, the side of the old road is scooped out and lowered so that there is a fall of some few feet from the uninjured metalling to the débris on the line or track of the old road.

14. By an order at Nisi Prius a verdict of guilty was entered, subject to the finding of Mr. Richard Cail, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, engineer, on the following questions, namely:

First. What had become of the old road, and whether and to what extent had it been carried away from its former position?

Secondly. Whether and to what extent it had been absolutely destroyed?

Thirdly. Whether it was practicable and at what cost to make a permanent and passable road along the old track of a similar character to the adjoining parts of the old road? And it was ordered that upon such finding a special case might be stated at the request of either party.

15. Mr. Cail having viewed and inspected the locus in quo, and taken such evidence and obtained such information and assistance as he thought fit made his report on the 4th Nov. 1875, and found the facts as follows:—

First. The old road had been carried away and overlaid by a landslip at a point called Broughton Bank Top to an extent of 252 yards or thereabouts.

Secondly. The road is absolutely destroyed for the extent to which it is carried away and overlaid, amounting in the whole to the said length of 252 yards.

Thirdly. It is practicable to form a permanent and passable road along the old track of a similar character to the adjoining part of the old road, and the cost of doing so would be 341l.

16. The rateable value of the whole parish is 4756l., and a rate of 5d. in the pound on this amount produces 100l. or thereabouts.

17. There is in existence a good road from Bilsdale to Stokesley, which diverges from the destroyed road at a point on the Bilsdale side of the landslip, and reaches Stokesley by way of Engleby Greenhow, but by this road, from the point of divergence, the distance to and from Stokesley is increased by one mile and two-thirds of another mile, and persons using the same have also to pass through, open and close several gates.

18. On this road the defendant township has, since the said landslip, expended a considerable sum in improving it so as to render it more convenient.

19. There is also a road from Bilsdale to Stokesley by way of Carlton. The said roads are both of them longer in distance than the destroyed road, but the gradients are somewhat better.

20. The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

21. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether there exists a legal duty or obligation upon the defendants to make and maintain an available carriage road in the line or track of the old road, so as to form and continue a permanent and passable highway from Stokesley to Bilsdale at the part so destroyed, as aforesaid.

If the court shall be of opinion that such legal duty or obligation exists, then the verdict of Guilty is to stand.

If the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the verdict is to be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendants.

Wills, Q.C. and Forbes, for the prosecution.—The question that arises here is whether, under the circumstances, the parish are relieved of their liability to repair this road which attaches to them by the common law of England. We say that the obligation to repair the road still subsists. The line or trench of the old road exists, and is known, and it is found by the arbitrator that it is practicable to make and maintain a permanent and passable road along the same at a reasonable cost. The cases which at first blush appear to lean in favour of the defendants, are all distinguishable from the present one. In E. v. Paul (2 Moo. & B. 307) it was held that a parish could not be convicted for not rebuilding a sea wall washed away by the sea, over the top of which the alleged way used to pass. Maule, J., there said, "The interruption of the passage is not from the want of repair, but from the sea having washed away the wall or embankment, and there is no longer anything to repair. The parish cannot be liable to rebuild the wall." The facts in E. v. Bamber (5 Q. B. 279; 13 L. J. 13, M. C.) were very similar. There a portion of the highway was swept clean away by the sea, or, as Lord Denman, C.J., expressed it in his judgment, "All the materials of which a road could be made had been swept away by the act of God," and the parish were held not liable to make good the damage that was done. The last case on the subject is R. v. Hornsea (1 Dears. C. C. 291; 23 L. J. 59, M. C.), where the indictment charged that certain part of a highway was out of repair. It appeared that there, also, part of the road had at the time when the indictment was preferred, been destroyed by the encroachments of the sea, and that the surface of the existing road was in good repair up to the time when the same had been so destroyed, at which part the road was terminated by a perpendicular cliff caused by excessive encroachments. No part of the road was then out of repair. The slope on which the road was had there been washed away by the sea, and if anybody had stood on the top of the cliff he could not possibly have seen any subsisting road to the beach. Moreover, to have restored the road in that case would have been an engineering work of considerable difficulty and expense.

Cave, Q.C. for the defendants.—The road here would have to be re-made and not repaired, and, consequently, no obligation attaches to the defendants. No harm will happen if the defendants are held not liable. This highway is under the jurisdiction of a highway board, who are authorised under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101, s. 47, to make improvements in roads within their jurisdiction, one of which, by sect. 48, sub-sect. 3 is "the doing of any work in respect of highways beyond ordinary repairs executed to place any existing highway in a proper state of repair." [BLACKBURN, J.—Have the public any power to compel them to do these works?] No, it is a matter within their discretion. Here the road for 252 yards is absolutely destroyed

BLACKBURN, J.—There is great difficulty in laying down a principle generally applicable, but I think from the statement contained in this case there has not been so much done as would amount to a total destruction of the road so as to relieve the parish from liability. When a piece of ground is swept clean away into the sea common sense tells you that you cannot call on the inhabitants of a parish to repair the mischief. Again, in the case of the sea wall which is washed away by the sea over which the road passed, it is plain that the conclusion arrived at by Maule, J., was correct, and that you could not compel the parish to rebuild the wall. Landslips such as this may occur from floods, or by a convulsion of nature, or by the act of God. The metalled surface was ploughed up so that no trace of it remains; a large quantity of debris has been brought down and piled on the line of the road; still I can see here no such total destruction as would be sufficient to relieve the defendants. The facts here are not in dispute. There was a landslip, and a portion of the highway was carried away into the valley below, and its place supplied by stones and other debris; the depth and level of the debris along the line of the old road differs. At this spot there is no trace left of the metalled road, but it is stated that the line of it is known and admitted. Now the court has power to draw inferences of fact, but can we draw the inference that the road is totally destroyed? The engineer states that the old road at this point had been carried away, but that it is practicable to repair the road at a moderate cost. The metalled surface is undoubtedly gone, so that carts and conveyances cannot go along it as they should do. Bearing in mind that the expenses would not be heavy, and having a power to draw inferences of fact given us, I think there has been no such distinction here as ought to relieve the parish from further liability. Our judgment should therefore be for the Crown.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The difficulty in these cases is to say exactly when a road is so destroyed as to extinguish the liability which ordinarily attaches to a parish. The cases cited are all distinguishable from the present. What we have to ask ourselves is whether, as a jury, we can come to the conclusion that there has been here such a complete destruction as to bring it within the authorities? Now, the extent of the damage done here is set out in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the case which has been submitted to us. It appears the metalled part of the road has been carried away. The only destruction that I can see is that the place where the old metalled road was is filled up with stones and debris, but the line is still remaining. I confess I cannot see how this road was so destroyed as to relieve the inhabitants of the parish from all further liability with respect to it. I think, therefore, that judgment must go for the Crown.

HOLBORN GUARDIANS v. ST. LEONARD'S VESTRY, SHOREDITCH.

June 20 and Nov. 7, 1876.

HOLBORN GUARDIANS v. ST. LEONARD'S VESTRY,
SHOREDITCH.Duty of vestry—Want of consideration—Action for breach—Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 125.The plaintiff's workhouse had been built on land in the defendants' parish under 22 Geo. 3, c. 56, by which it was provided that the building should not be liable to be charged with any greater taxes or assessments than to such amount as the land and tenements were assessed before they became vested in the plaintiffs.By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 125, the vestry of each metropolitan district is required to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons, or to contract with any company or persons for collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth in or under houses and places within the parish.Upon defendants' refusal to collect or remove the dirt from the plaintiff's workhouse, the plaintiffs employed persons to do so, and brought this action for the amount charged by them.Held, that the plaintiffs' exemption from increased rates did not exempt the defendants from performing the same duties in respect of the plaintiffs' premises as of all other householders; that this duty was not that of a surveyor of highways, and therefore the defendants were liable for a non-feasance concerning it; and that the amount claimed by the plaintiffs was recoverable in this action.

THIS was a special case, stated in an action between the parties.

The plaintiffs, as such guardians, are and were, at the time of the occurrence of the defendants' acts and defaults, hereinafter complained of, the occupiers of, and entitled to certain lands, with a workhouse and other buildings thereon, known as the City-road Workhouse, and situated within the said parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and of a dust-hole within and under or connected with the said workhouse, also situated in the said parish.

The said workhouse was, under the provisions of the statutes 22 Geo. 3, c. 56, and 48 Geo. 3, c. 97, built for the parish of St. Luke, in the county of Middlesex, on land situated in the said parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch. By the said Act of 22 Geo. 3, c. 56, intituled "An Act more effectually to enable the inhabitants of the parish of St. Luke, in the county of Middlesex, to purchase, hire, or erect a workhouse within or near the said parish, for the better reception and employment of the poor of the said parish," it was among other things enacted, by sect. 1, that the rector, churchwardens, and overseers of the poor for the time being, and the vestrymen of the said parish, and their successors for ever, should be appointed trustees for the purposes of the said Act; and, by sect. 11, that it should be lawful to and for them, or any seven or more of them, after the time therein mentioned, to treat and agree with the owners and occupiers of all and every other person and persons interested in any freehold, leasehold, or copyhold grounds, tenements, or hereditaments within the said parish of St. Luke, or within the said parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, for the purchase or hire of such lands, grounds, tenements, and hereditaments; and they were thereby enabled to take a conveyance thereof to them and their successors, upon lease or for ever, for the purposes in the said Act mentioned; and in the said sect. 11 it was further enacted that the said lands or grounds, tenements, or hereditaments, so to be leased or purchased from and immediately after the same should be conveyed or leased to the said rector and churchwardens, and their successors, or any workhouse or other buildings which should be erected or built thereon for the reception and employment of the poor of the said parish of St. Luke should not be liable to or be charged with any greater parochial or Parliamentary taxes, rates, or assessments (during such time and as long as the same shall be used and occupied for those purposes) than to such amount as such lands and grounds, tenements, or hereditaments were assessed before the same became vested in the said rector and churchwardens as aforesaid.

The aforesaid Act of 48 Geo. 3, c. 97, entitled "An Act for making more effectual provision for maintaining, regulating, and employing the poor of the parish of St. Luke, in the county of Middlesex," repealed the said Act of 22 Geo. 3, c. 56, and by ss. 10, 11, and 12, provisions were made for the election of forty-eight vestrymen, to be with the rector, churchwardens, and overseers of the poor of the said parish for the time being, guardians of the poor of the parish.

Sect. 74 enacted that all and every the messuages or tenements, poorhouses, workhouses, edifices, buildings, lands, hereditaments, moneys, and securities for moneys, rates, assessments, and arrears of rates and assessments, goods, chattels, and effects which by virtue of the said recited Acts, or one of them, the persons acting in the execution thereof, and their successors, or any other person or persons whomsoever were entitled unto or possessed of, in trust for the parishioners or vestrymen of the said parish, or which were vested in such persons and their successors, or other person or persons whomsoever for and towards the relief, maintenance, use, and benefit of the poor of the parish, or for any other purpose whatsoever in which the said parish is interested, shall from and immediately after the passing thereof be vested in, possessed by, paid, delivered, and belong to the guardians of the poor, acting in the execution of this Act, and their successors, as fully, effectually, and beneficially, and in as large and ample a manner and form, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as they the said persons acting in execution of the said recited Acts or any of them, and their successors or other person or persons, were entitled to be possessed of such messuages or tenements, poor houses, workhouses, edifices, buildings, lands, hereditaments, moneys, and securities for moneys, rates, assessments, and arrears of rates and assessments, goods, chattels, and effects, or as the same respectively were vested in such persons acting in execution of the said recited Acts or any of them, and their successors or other person or persons, but subject, nevertheless, to be used, possessed, applied, and disposed of only upon the trusts and for the uses and purposes and in the manner by and in this Act directed, declared, and appointed.

The effect of this section was to preserve the exemption from increased rating given by sect. 11 of 22 Geo. 3, c. 56, notwithstanding the repeal of that statute: (Reg. v. St. Leonard Shoreditch, 13 Q. B. 964.)

In the year 1836 part of the parish of St. Andrew's, Holborn, the parish of St. George-the-Martyr, and the liberty of Saffron-hill, Hatton-garden, Ely kents, and Ely-place, were united under the name of the Holborn Union, for the administration of the poor laws. Afterwards part of the parish of St. Sepulchre, Furnival's Inn, and Staple Inn, were added to the union; and, finally, in 1869, the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, and the parish of St. Luke, were by order of the Poor Law Commissioners also added to the said union.

Upon such union the said workhouse and the workhouses of the other parishes comprised in the union, became and still are for the common use of the union; and the Poor Law Commissioners under the powers of the Poor Law Amendment Act (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 26), issued rules, orders, and regulations, for the classification of the poor of the united parishes, and for their reception, maintenance, and employment in the various workhouses of the united parishes, without reference to the particular parishes in the union to which the poor may belong.

On the 25th Jan. 1873, the Court of Queen's Bench decided on a special case that notwithstanding the incorporation of the said parish of St. Luke into and with the Holborn Union, the exemption from increased rating given by sect. 11 of 22 Geo. 3, c. 56, was still preserved to the said workhouse.

By sect. 125 of an Act of Parliament passed in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, entitled an Act for the better Local Management of the Metropolis, the defendants were, as such vestry as aforesaid, required to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons, or to contract with any company or persons for, amongst other purposes, collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth, in or under houses and places within their parish; and it was thereby enacted that such company or persons, and who were thereafter referred to as scavengers should, on such days and at such hours and in such manner as the vestry should from time to time appoint, sufficiently execute and perform all such works and duties as they respectively should be employed, or contract to execute or perform, and if any such company or person should fail in any respect properly to execute and perform such works and duties, such company or person should for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l*.

On or about the 13th March 1875, the clerk of the defendants, with their authority, and at their desire, wrote and sent to the plaintiffs' clerk the following letter:

St. Leonard, Shoreditch, Vestry Offices,
Town Hall, Old-street, E.C.
March 13th 1875.

Dear Sir,—I have to inform the guardians of the Holborn Union that after Lady Day next it will be necessary for them to make their own arrangements for the removal of the dirt from St. Luke's Workhouse and Infirmary.—I am, yours truly,

G PARKER, Vestry Clerk.

The St. Luke's workhouse and infirmary referred to in the above letter is the said City-road Workhouse.

From and after the said Lady Day 1875 (viz., the 25th March 1875), the defendants have ceased and neglected to appoint and employ, or to contract with anyone to remove the dirt, ashes, rubbish, and filth from the said dusthole, within and under or connected with the City-road Workhouse.

On or about the 3rd May 1875, the solicitors of the plaintiffs, with their direction and authority, wrote and sent to the defendants' clerk a letter, of which the following is a copy:

23, Ely-place, London, E.C.
3rd May 1875.

Dear Sir,—We have been consulted by the guardians of the Holborn Union with reference to the neglect of the contractor employed by the vestry of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, to take away the dust, &c., from St. Luke's Workhouse. It would appear from your letter to Mr. Hill of 13th March last, that the contractor's neglect is consequent on the instructions given to him by the Shoreditch Vestry; but as the duty of the vestry under the 125th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act appears to be very clear, we are inclined to think the instructions in question have been given under some mistake. We, therefore, write on behalf of the guardians of the Holborn Union, to demand of the vestry of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, the performance of their duty under the 125th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act, in respect of the guardian's workhouse in the City-road, and within the said parish, by causing to be removed therefrom the dirt, ashes, rubbish, &c., in one of the ways directed by the said Act. Since your contractors ceased to remove the dust from the workhouse, our clients have had it removed at their own expense, and they will require the repayment of all such expenses from your vestry.—We are, dear Sir, yours truly,

JAMES, CURTIS, and JAMES.

To G. Walker, Esq., Vestry Clerk,
St. Leonard, Shoreditch.

On or about the 4th May 1875, the clerk of the defendants, with their direction and authority, wrote and sent to the plaintiffs' solicitors a letter, of which the following is a copy:

St. Leonard, Shoreditch, Vestry Offices,
Town Hall, Old-street, E.C.,
May 4, 1875.

St. Luke's Workhouse dust removal.

Gentlemen,—In reply to your note of yesterday, I may say that the vestry is quite aware of the obligation of the 125th section of the Act alluded to, but they consider that the workhouse of St. Luke is by the Local Act rendered extraparochial. You will see that the contractor has nothing to do with it. If, therefore, the guardians of the Holborn Union think that the ratepayers of Shoreditch ought to pay the cost of removing the refuse, the Holborn ratepayers not contributing one farthing towards the cost, the guardians must take such steps as they may be advised to compel this vestry to do so.

I am, Gentlemen, yours obediently,

G. WALKER, V.C.

Messrs. James, Curtis, and James.

By reason of the premises the plaintiffs were damaged and obliged to employ, and did employ, persons to remove the said dirt, ashes, rubbish, and filth, and became liable to pay, and paid them for so doing, and the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in removing the same, amounted to 50*l*. 1*s*.

The plaintiffs claim as damages that amount.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

First, whether the defendants are bound to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons, or to contract with any company or persons for the removal of the dirt, ashes, rubbish, and filth from the said dusthole within and under, or connected with the said City-road workhouse?

Secondly, whether the plaintiffs can recover from the defendants the damages sustained by them by reason of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in the removal of the said dirt, ashes, rubbish, and filth during such time as the defendants have neglected and refused to provide for the removal of the same?

In case the opinion of the court shall be in the affirmative of the above questions, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for damages to the amount of the said 50*l.* 1*s.*, and costs of suit.

In case the opinion of the court shall be in the negative, then judgment shall be entered for the defendants with costs of defence.

Murphy, Q.C. (with him Sutton) argued for the plaintiffs.—It cannot be contended that the exemption by statute from an increase of rates should deprive the plaintiff of their ordinary rights as shareholders. This is a breach of the defendants' duty as specifically defined in sect. 125 of the Metropolis Act 1855, and an action will lie for damage caused by their breach of it. In Couch v. Steele (3 E. & R. 402), the declaration alleged that the defendant neglected to supply and keep on board his vessel a proper supply of medicines, whereby plaintiff, who was a seaman engaged by him, suffered in his health. It was held on demurrer that, as 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 18 makes it the duty of the shipowner to have on board such medicines, although the Act imposes a penalty, recoverable by a common informer, as the specific punishment for the breach of that duty as to the public, yet sailors sustaining a private injury from the breach of that statutory duty are entitled to maintain an action to recover damages, and that the declaration was good. A similar conclusion was arrived at in Buck v. Williams (3 H. & N. 308). The following sections of the Metropolis Act 1855 tend to support this contention: for s. 126 provides a penalty for obstructing scavengers, and sect. 127 vests the refuse collected in the vestry or district board, [Lush, J.—At common law I suppose the action would lie for the removal of a nuisance caused by the defendants.] That is our point.

Lanyon (with him Lane) for the defendants.—The defendants are a vestry, which by sect. 96 of this Metropolis Act, is to exercise the office of and to be the surveyor of highways for the district, and they cannot be liable for anything from which such surveyor would have been exempt. It has been held that no surveyor nor vestry can be liable for non-feasance of any kind, and Parsons v. St. Mathew, Bethnal Green (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 56), is an authority on this very point that an action for the non-repair of a highway will not lie against a vestry appointed under this Act. Willes, J., is reported to have said, at p. 59, that the defendants must act in this respect either as officers of the parish, and then the parish must answer as principal for the neglect of their duties, and Young v. Davis (7 H. & N. 760; in error 2 H. & C. 197) is an express authority that the officers are not liable; or else they must act as representatives of the parish, and then their liability will be a reflection of the liability of the parish which they represent, and against the parish no such action as this could be brought. The case of Mackinnon v. Pearson (8 Ex. 319; in error 9 Ex. 609), would, then, be in point. On either supposition, then, no action will lie against them for mere non-feasance, such as is the ground of the present action." And further on, "I cannot bring myself to think that it was the intention of the Legislature in transferring to the vestry the duties of the surveyor of highways, to give to everyone who may meet with any accident from an imperfection in the road a right of action which he never previously possessed, and thus open a wide door to continual litigation." It was conceded in a recent case in the Court of Appeal (Pendlebury v. Greenhalgh, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 32), that no action for non-feasance would be against a surveyor of highways. [Lush, J.—Here the action is brought against the vestry upon their obligations created by the statute, not upon the duties of the surveyor of highways.] The work required to be done here by the plaintiffs was the duty either of the parish or surveyor. [Lush, J.—I think not. This was an especial duty of metropolitan districts. No parish could be indicted for not sweeping up ashes, &c.] To keep streets clean is part of the duty to repair a highway. Sect. 125 is merely a detailed description of the duties which the vestry is to perform as the surveyor of highways. The cases cited on the other side are applicable only when the statute is for the benefit of individuals, and not when for the benefit of the public generally. In such a case as this no action will lie at the suit of an individual:

Gorris v. Scott, L. Rep. 9 Ex. 125;

Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Company, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 404.

Murphy, Q.C. in reply.

Mellor, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in this action. The defendants are incorporated by the 42nd section of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), and are empowered to sue and be sued in the name thereby given them. This does not rest upon their authority to execute the office of surveyor of highways given them by sect. 96 of the same Act, and there is nothing in the Act to limit their duties and position to those pertaining to that office. I think, therefore, this case is not analogous to those cited by Mr. Lanyon, which relate only to the inhabitants of a parish or the surveyor of highways. The duties which the defendants have to fulfil are given at length in the 125th section of the Metropolis Act of 1855, and are beyond those which were ever undertaken by a surveyor of highways; every vestry and district board are required "to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons, or to contract with any company or persons for the sweeping or cleansing of the several streets within their parish or district, and for collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth," &c.; and such scavengers or their servants shall sufficiently execute and perform their duties or incur a penalty. The next section, the 126th, provides a penalty for obstructing scavengers in the performance of their duty; and the 127th vests all the refuse collected in the vestry or district board, who may dispose of the same towards defraying their expenses. With respect to these duties, I do not think the defendants can claim the exemptions applicable only to those of a surveyor of highways. It appears to me also that the defendants have misunderstood their obligation with respect to the plaintiffs' buildings, which are situated within their district. The old Act of 1782 provided that the plaintiffs should never be liable for any rates beyond those at that time payable, and this exemption from increased rates has been preserved by subsequent legislation, but the duties imposed upon vestries and district boards by the Metropolitan Management Acts have no regard to that limitation of rates. Whatever rates the plaintiffs pay, there is nothing to interfere with the rights which they enjoy as owners or occupiers of premises in the defendants' district. The plaintiffs have a sufficient interest in the district to claim the performance of the duties imposed upon the defendants, and they cannot be met by the answer that they do not pay enough rates. I think that under the circumstances, the plaintiffs' remedy is not by indictment only, but that the amount expended by them in performing the defendants' duties may well be recovered in this action.

Div. App.]

BIRNIE (app.) v. MARSHALL (resp.).

[Div. App.]

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I see no analogy here with the case of Parsons v. The Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green. That decision is clear, upon the effect of the 96th section of the Metropolis Act of 1855, that there can be no liability for nonfeasance upon a vestry when acting as a surveyor of highways. But this action is founded upon a breach of the specific duty imposed upon vestries and district boards by section 125, quite apart from the duty of a surveyor. This is a duty towards the householders of the district and not merely a duty to the public, which is the limit of the liability of the inhabitants of a parish or the surveyor of highways. The plaintiffs are entitled to the same rights as any other householders in the district, although they are by express statutory enactment exempted from the payment of the full rates for which other householders are liable. There is a specific duty upon the defendants to do this work by the 125th section, and other sections of the Act have the effect of depriving the occupiers of any right to interfere with the defendants' duties. This being so why should not an action lie for damage caused by the breach of this duty? The case finds that "by reason of the premises the plaintiffs were damaged and obliged to employ and did employ persons to remove the said dirt, ashes, rubbish, and filth, and became liable to pay and paid them for so doing; and the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in removing the same amounted to 50l. 1s." The defendants are not a fluctuating body, but are liable to be sued, and the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to the ordinary remedy by action for the damage so caused by breach of the defendants' statutory duty.

Trespass in pursuit of game—Bond fide claim of right—Identity of land—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30.

The appellant was charged with trespass in pursuit of game, under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, and was proved to have shot game on glebe land over which the rector of the parish had always exercised the privilege of sporting. The appellant's defence was that he was game watcher, employed by three gentlemen who were proved to rent shooting from the lord of the manor, and that the lord claimed the shooting over part of the glebe under an Inclosure Act. He proved that his employers ordered him to go upon this land, but he produced no evidence, although an adjournment was offered for that purpose, that the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed was included in the lands over which his employers' shooting extended, nor in the disputed part of the glebe. The magistrate decided that the appellant had no bond fide claim of right to shoot on this particular land, and convicted him of the trespass.

Held, upon a case stated (Field, J. dissenting), that under the circumstances, the magistrate was justified in convicting.

This was a case stated by a justice of the peace in and for the county of Cumberland, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before him, as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions, holden at the public office in Workington, in and for the division of Workington, in the county of Cumberland, on the 1st Dec. 1875, and by adjournment on the 9th Feb. 1876, an information preferred by Joseph Marshall (hereinafter called the respondent), against Robert Birnie (hereinafter called the appellant), under the Act 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, charging that he, the said Robert Birnie, did, within three calendar months then last past (to wit) on the 13th Nov. 1875, at the parish of Workington, in the said county, unlawfully commit a certain trespass, by entering and being, in the daytime of the same day, upon a certain close of land, in the possession and occupation of Jacob Waugh and James Armstrong, in pursuit of game, without the license or consent of the owner of the land so trespassed upon, or of any person having the right of killing the game upon such land, or of any other person having any right to authorise the said Robert Birnie to enter or be upon the said land for the purpose aforesaid, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined by the said justice, the said parties respectively, or their respective attorneys, being then present; and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before the said justice of the said offence, and he adjudged him for his said offence to forfeit and pay the penalty or sum of 1s., to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the respondent the sum of 3l. 14s. 6d. for his costs; and if the said several sums were not paid forthwith he adjudged the appellant to be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Carlisle, in the said county, for the space of seven days, unless the said several sums, and all costs and charges of the commitment and conveying of the appellant to the said house of correction should be sooner paid.

Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the respondent and found as a fact that on the 13th Nov. last (the day named in the information) the appellant was upon certain inclosed land in the parish of Workington aforesaid, in the occupation of Jacob Waugh and James Armstrong, with a gun in his possession, with which he there shot a partridge and a hare. And it was further proved on the part of the respondent and not denied by the appellant that the land where the game was shot formed part of the glebe land belonging to the rectory of Workington.

BIRNIE (app.) v. MARSHALL (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

On the first day of hearing it was alleged on behalf of the respondent, and not denied, that the rector of Workington or his licensee had always exercised the privilege of sporting over the land in question; but it was contended on behalf of the appellant that he (the appellant) was the game watcher for Messrs. Peter Iredale, Thomas Harrison, and William Carruthers, three gentlemen who claimed to be the lessees of the right of sporting upon the land in question under Henry Fraser Curwen, Esq., the lord of the manor of Workington, who it was alleged by the appellant was entitled to exercise sporting privileges over the land by virtue of a certain Inclosure Act passed in 49 Geo. 3, intituled "An Act for Inclosing Lands in the Townships of Workington and Winscales and manor of Workington, in the parish of Workington, in the County of Cumberland;" but as the appellant was not then prepared with any evidence in support of his allegation, the said justice did upon the application of the appellant's attorney adjourn the hearing of the said information; and the same information next (by virtue of successive adjournments) came on for hearing on the 9th Feb. last, and it was incumbent on the appellant to prove his right to go on this land. The first witness called by the appellant's solicitor was Mr. Tom Milburn, the clerk of the magistrates, and the solicitor to Henry Fraser Curwen, Esq., who deposed that Mr. Curwen was the lord of the manor of Workington, and as such lord claimed the right of shooting over those lands in the parish of Workington which were within the manor of Workington, and also that Mr. Curwen had let all the rights of shooting within a certain defined area which was outlined blue on a plan then produced to witness. Witness also produced a draft lease which had been prepared and agreed to between the appellant's employers and Mr. Curwen, in which the parcels were described as follows: "Secondly, all that the right and liberty of shooting, hawking, fowling, coursing, hunting, and sporting over all and singular that portion of the Curwen estates and manor of Workington, situate in the parishes of Workington, Distington, and Dean, in the county aforesaid, which are particularly specified, delineated, and described in the plan drawn upon the front skin of these presents, and therein outlined with a blue colour, now belonging to or vested in the lessors, or which they have any right or title to use or enjoy." No questions were asked this witness as to whether the land trespassed upon was within the manor or Workington. Another witness was then called by the appellant, who stated that he had lived almost all his lifetime in the neighbourhood of Winscales, and had farmed land there under the lord of the manor. That he remembered the commons before they were inclosed, and knew the land occupied by the respondent. That some of it belonged to the Rector of Workington and some of it to Mr. Henry Fraser Curwen, but that he thought that the rector would claim the common. That witness did not know where the trespass had been committed. Mr. Thos. Harrison, one of the appellant's employers was then examined, and deposed that he was one of the parties to the agreement for taking the game on Workington and Winscales Commons. That the appellant was their gamekeeper, and they authorised him to go upon that land; it was not Marshall's (the respondent's) land, but land in the occupation of Messrs. Waugh and Armstrong.

The portion of land in question was in the township of Workington. The respondent's attorney objected to this evidence, as Mr. Harrison did not see the trespass committed, but he ordered the man to go on the land.

It was contended by the appellant's attorney that the said justice had no jurisdiction in the matter, as a bonâ fide question of title was raised by the proceedings, and that the appellant had a bonâ fide right to shoot over the land under the agreement with Mr. Curwen, who, it was alleged, was entitled to the game by virtue of the provisions in the above-mentioned Inclosure Act. The respondent's attorney thereupon proceeded to address the said justice in reply, and in the first place, referring to the draft lease, he contended that when persons other than the lessees sported upon the land included in the lease, such persons must be accompanied by the lessees. But the said justice stopped him, and he then contended that no evidence had been produced by the appellant to show that the land upon which the trespass was alleged to have been committed was included in the draft lease, or was within the manor of Workington; and the said justice being of opinion that no evidence had been produced by the appellant to show the connection of the land trespassed upon with that referred to in the draft lease, or that the land trespassed upon was within the manor of Workington, did intimate such opinion to the appellant's attorney, and did offer to adjourn the case again to enable the appellant to produce such evidence; but the appellant's attorney declined to accept a further adjournment of the case, insisting that he had set up a bonâ fide claim of title; whereupon the said justice convicted the appellant in manner before stated, being satisfied that no bonâ fide claim of title had been set up by the appellant.

The question of law arising on the above statements for the opinion of this honourable court, therefore, is, whether the said conviction was legally and properly made. If this honourable court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made then it is to stand; but, if otherwise, it is to be quashed.

Bompas argued for the appellant.—It is to be observed that the magistrate, in referring to the adjournment until the 9th Feb., says, in the case, that "it was incumbent on the appellant to prove his right to go on this land." That statement, upon which only can this conviction be justified, is contrary to law. There was no dispute as to the bonâ fide nature of the appellant's claim, and that being so, the magistrate's jurisdiction was thereby ousted. The question which the magistrate further considered, and which was beyond his jurisdiction, was whether the appellant showed any primâ facie evidence of the right which he admittedly claimed in good faith. [Grove, J.—Was it not a question of fact for him to decide whether the place of the alleged question was within the bounds of the right he claimed?] R. v. Cridland (7 E. & B. 853) was decided upon another point, but the opinions expressed concerning this one have since been approved and acted upon; the general rule was there said to be that in case of summary convictions justices have jurisdiction to determine whether the claim of title to real property is set up bonâ fide; but if it is bonâ fide set up, they have no jurisdiction to proceed further in the matter and that the tro-viseo in statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, viz., "that any person charged with any such trespass shall be at liberty to prove by way of defence any matter which would have been a defence to an action at law for such trespass," does not give justices jurisdiction upon a charge of trespass in pursuit of game, to determine a claim of title to land against the wish of the defendants. The jurisdiction of justices under this statute has been recently considered in the Court of Common Pleas; although the conviction was affirmed, the question was admitted to be only whether a reasonable and honest claim of right was involved: (Watkins v. Major, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 352; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 662). That the claim of right to shoot under this Inclosure Act was a reasonable question appears from the similar question raised before the Exchequer Chamber in Sowerby v. Smith (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 309; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 524).

Henry, for the respondent.—The magistrate was right in demanding some proof of a bonâ fide claim to the particular land over which the appellant was shooting. A man claiming to shoot over the land belonging to another ought to do more than produce a lease of the shooting over some lands therein described—he should give some evidence at least of the identity of the land described with the place in which he was alleged to be trespassing. An opinion was expressed by Williams, J. in Morden v. Porter (7 C. B., N. S., 641), that the party trespassing is not the less guilty of the offence under this Act because he bonâ fide believes that he has the licence of the occupier to shoot over the land. And this was the conclusion of the Court of Queen's Bench in Cornwell v. Sanders (3 B. & S. 206).

Bompas, in reply.—It sufficiently appears that a bonâ fide claim on the appellant's part existed, and the magistrate had no right to consider its nature or its limit: (Reg. v. Justices of Derbyshire, 11 W. R. 780). Justices are judges only of whether the claim is bonâ fide and reasonable: (Leatt v. Vine, 30 L. J. 207, M. C.; Legg v. Pardoe, 9 C. B., N. S., 289) and this was admitted by everybody.

CLEASBY, B.—The question for us is whether this conviction was legally and properly made. It appears to me that it was, for I think the facts as they are stated justify the magistrate's conclusion that his jurisdiction was not ousted by any bonâ fide claim of title. It is not sufficient for a person charged under this Act to say, I claim title to this land. Neither the claim is to be allowed, nor the magistrate's decision is to be supported without some substantial foundation, and I conclude from the facts stated, that the materials upon which the magistrate was justified in exercising his discretion by finding no bonâ fide claim, were sufficient. No doubt this gentleman, the rector, had always enjoyed the right of shooting over this ground; but it was contended that the appellant, being the game watcher of three gentlemen who leased some shooting from the lord of the manor, was exercising the lord's right under an Inclosure Act to shoot over the same; on the first day, the appellant being unprepared with his evidence, the magistrate adjourned the further hearing of the information, and, as he states, when it came on again, it was incumbent on the appellant to prove his right to go on this land; in this the magistrate was quite right, at least, to the extent that the appellant had to show a bonâ fide claim to shoot upon the particular land on which he was alleged to be trespassing. A plan and a draft lease were produced as evidence on his behalf, and we must take it that at this period of the case before the magistrate the onus of proof rested upon the appellant. No question, however, was asked by him as to whether the land on which he was shooting was included in the demise of which the document produced was a draft. It did not appear, indeed, that any of the appellant's witnesses knew where the alleged trespass had taken place. The magistrate intimated to the appellant's solicitor his opinion of this deficiency in the defence, and offered an adjournment to supply it; but the appellant declined the offer, and elected to stand upon what he had proved. The magistrate may fairly have presumed that his inability to establish this identity of the land was the cause of his refusal to accept another adjournment. He at all events held that the appellant's omission to prove what, if possible, must have been very easy, was sufficient to throw doubt upon the good faith of his claim of right. The magistrate, concluding that the appellant had no bonâ fide excuse for the trespass, exercised his jurisdiction and convicted him; and I think, under the circumstances, he was justified in doing so.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am not prepared to say this case might not be read in a different way, but I think it is capable of being interpreted so as to justify the conclusion of the magistrate. It seems to me, we may fairly take it that at the first hearing the rector was proved to have always exercised the right of shooting over this ground; and it became then the duty of the appellant to show a bonâ fide claim of right to shoot at the same place. This I assume is all the magistrate meant when he said, "it was incumbent on the appellant to prove his right to go on this land." Instead of showing a bonâ fide claim which would answer the charge against him, the appellant called a witness who gave some evidence of his right to shoot over some land not identified with the locus in quo of the alleged trespass, but he never asked him a question about that particular spot; and his other two witnesses carried his case no further. The magistrate, upon this, and upon the appellant's refusal of another adjournment, not unreasonably, I think, concluded that the appellant's claim of right was not bonâ fide, and that he was trespassing upon the particular land concerning which he was charged, although he might have some claim to shoot elsewhere. I regret that the case is not stated more clearly and decidedly; it certainly is not free from ambiguity, but reading it as I do, I think there is enough in it to show that the magistrate might have been right.

FIELD, J.—I am not able to come to the same conclusion. There is no distinction in the principles of law upon which we base the inferences we draw from the case, but the statements are so ambiguous that we differ as to their effect. Lord Campbell said in Reg. v. Oridland (at p. 867), "Though no evidence of title was actually offered, it was quite clear that a bonâ fide claim of title was set up; and when such a claim is so set up, it seems to me that justices have no longer jurisdiction to proceed to a summary conviction." And in White v. Feast (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 353),

BURY (app.) v. CHERRYBOHN (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

Blackburn, J., said, at page 360, with respect to a fair and reasonable supposition of right, "I am far from saying that there may not be many cases where orders of a superior might well afford fair and reasonable ground," and he held the justices were right in their conviction there, because, on the evidence, there was no fair or reasonable ground shown for the appellant's supposition. I think, upon the strength of those authorities, that when the bona fides of a defendant's claim of title is ignored by a magistrate, he is bound to state clearly his grounds for arriving at such a conclusion. I doubt, upon the statements in this case, whether the magistrate understood what was sufficient for the appellant to prove, or even what a bona fide claim of right means. I can well imagine a claim of this kind being raised upon a good foundation, even although the rector has long enjoyed the shooting. It was proved that the appellant was authorised to go upon this land by the people who rented the shooting from the lord of the manor, and who seemed to have a bona fide claim to it. Considering the terms of the lease, and all the circumstances, I do not think the magistrate was justified in drawing the inference that an omission to put a particular question was proof of the appellant's bad faith with respect to his defence. This summary jurisdiction in such cases ought not, in my opinion, to be extended, and the exercise of it in this matter ought not, I think, to be affirmed.

School board byelaw—Attendance at school—Workshops—30 & 31 Vict. c. 146, s. 14; 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, s. 74.

A byelaw made by a school board, with the approval of the Education Department, under the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), s. 74, provided that all children in the district subject to the Act should attend school for thirty hours a week.

The justices refused to convict the respondent for neglecting to cause his son, between five and thirteen years of age, to attend school as required by that byelaw, because the son was employed in a boot manufactory, and attending school more than ten hours a week, pursuant to the Workshops Regulation Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 146), s. 14.

Held, upon a case stated, that this byelaw was not contrary to the said section of the Workshops Act, which requires every child who is employed in a workshop to attend school for at least ten hours a week; and that the respondent ought to have been convicted.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of this court by two justices of the peace in and for the West Riding of the County of York under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the said Reginald Bury, the appellant, who was dissatisfied with their determination, the appellant having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the appeal.

On the 19th Feb. 1876, the said Reginald Bury duly laid information in due form of law as follows:

To Joseph Cherrybohn, of Barnsley, in the County of York, shoemaker.

West Riding of Yorkshire.—Whereas information hath this day been laid by Reginald Bury on behalf of the School Board for the district of the Borough of Barnsley in the said Riding before one of the said justices acting in and for the West Riding of the County of York for that you the said Joseph Cherrybohn, residing within the said district of the said School Board, and within the said borough of Barnsley, being the parent of a certain child called John Cherrybohn, residing with you within the said district, and being not less than five nor more than thirteen years of age, did within six months last past, to wit on the 18th Feb. inst., unlawfully neglect and omit to cause the said child to attend school as required by the bye-laws of the said School Board, made and confirmed in pursuance of the Elementary Education Act 1870, there being no reasonable cause for such non-attendance, contrary to the said bye-laws.

On the 8th March 1876, the said information came on to be heard before the said justices at a petty sessions at Barnsley in the West Riding of the County of York, when the said Reginald Bury appeared before the said justices, and also the wife of the said Joseph Cherrybohn.

Upon the hearing of the information, Benjamin Clegg, school warden to the said board, proved the non-attendance of the child at school on the day named, and that the child was twelve years of age on the 11th May 1875, also the bye-laws of the said school board, and that the child was in the third standard of the Government code of February 1871.

It was proved by the wife of the said defendant, and admitted by the said informant Reginald Bury, that the said child was employed in the boot manufactory of Charles Rollinson, in Barnsley aforesaid, and attended school half time regularly, pursuant to the Workshops Regulation Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 146.)

On the part of the appellant it was contended that by virtue of the bye-laws of the said board made in pursuance of the 74th section of the Education Act 1870, the said board could, if they thought fit, compel children to attend school full time, notwithstanding that such children were working at a workshop and attending school in conformity with the provisions of the aforesaid Workshops Regulation Act. That there was nothing in the Workshops Regulation Act restraining the compulsory powers conferred on the board by the Education Act, as the former Act merely provided that children should not work except on certain conditions as to time and education. That there was nothing contrary in the said bye-laws to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour, and that the said Education Act overrode the said Workshops Act.

The said justices, after hearing the whole of the evidence, dismissed the information, they being of opinion that as the said child was fulfilling the conditions and provisions of the said Workshops Regulation Act, the School Board could not compel him to attend school full time under the said byelaws.

The question of law arising is, are the Barnsley School Board able to enforce their byelaws against children under thirteen years of age, who, although not obeying such byelaws, attend school and otherwise observe the conditions of the Workshops Regulation Act?

Div. App.]

BURY (app.) v. CHERRYBOHN (resp.).

[Div. App.]

Does the Education Act 1870 override this and other Acts regulating the education of children employed in labour?

The opinion of the court is therefore asked upon this point.

The bye-laws of the Barnsley School Board had been duly approved by the Education Department. By one of them the time required for the attendance at school of children, subject to the provisions of the Elementary Education Act 1870, was thirty hours a week. Another bye-law, the third, repeated the provisos contained in sub-sect. 2 of sect. 74 of that Act, the last being that nothing in the bye-laws was intended to be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour.

Hugh Shield argued for the appellant, the clerk of the School Board.—The question is whether the bye-law of this School Board, requiring the attendance of all children within the district for thirty hours a week, is contrary to the provisions of the Workshops Regulation Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 146), and therefore invalid. By sect. 14 of that Act "The following regulations shall be made (subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned) respecting the education of children employed in workshops: (1) Every child who is employed in a workshop shall attend school for at least ten hours in every week, during the whole of which he is so employed. (2) In computing for the purpose of this section the time during which a child has attended school there shall not be included any time during which such child has attended either (a) in excess of three hours at any one time, or in excess of five hours on any day; or (b) on Sundays; or (c) before eight o'clock in the morning, or after six o'clock in the evening: provided that the non-attendance of any child at school shall be excused—(1) For any time during which he is certified by the principal teacher of the school to have been prevented from attendance by sickness or other unavoidable cause; (2) for any time during which the school is closed for the customary holidays, or for some other temporary cause; (3) for any time during which there is no school which the child can attend within one mile (measured according to the nearest road) from the workshop or the residence of such child." The bye-laws are subject to sect. 74 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), by which "Every school board may from time to time, with the approval of the Education Department, make bye-laws for any of the following purposes: (1) Requiring the parents of children of such age, not less than five years nor more than thirteen years, as may be fixed by the bye-laws, to cause such children (unless there is some reasonable excuse) to attend school; (2) Determining the time during which children are so to attend school; provided that no such bye-law shall prevent the withdrawal of any child from any religious observance or instruction in religious subjects, or shall require any child to attend school on any day exclusively set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs, or shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour; thirdly, providing for the admission or payment of the whole or any part of the fees of any child, where the parent satisfies the school board that he is unable from poverty to pay the same; fourthly, imposing penalties for the breach of any bye-laws; fifthly, revoking or altering any bye-law previously made. Provided that any bye-law under this section requiring a child between ten and thirteen years of age to attend school shall provide for the total or partial exemption of such child from the obligation to attend school, if one of her Majesty's inspectors certifies that such child has reached a standard of education specified in such bye-law. Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse, viz.:—First, that the child is under efficient instruction in some other manner; secondly, that the child has been prevented from attending school by sickness or any unavoidable cause; thirdly, that there is no public elementary school open which the child can attend within such distance, not exceeding three miles, measured according to the nearest road from the residence of such child, as the bye-laws may prescribe. The School Board, not less than one month before submitting any bye-law under this section for the approval of the Education Department, shall deposit a printed copy of the proposed bye-laws at their office for inspection by any ratepayer, and supply a printed copy thereof gratis to any ratepayer, and shall publish a notice of such deposit. The Education Department before approving of any bye laws, shall be satisfied that such deposit has been made, and notice published, and shall cause such inquiry to be made in the school district as they think requisite. Any proceeding to enforce any bye law may be taken, and any penalty for the breach of any bye law may be recovered in a summary manner, but no penalty imposed for the breach of any bye law shall exceed such amount as, with the costs, will amount to 5s. for each offence, and such bye laws shall not come into operation until they have been sanctioned by her Majesty in Council. It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by order in council, to sanction the said bye laws, and thereupon the same shall have effect as if they were enacted in this Act." With respect to this particular point, the Workshops Act merely limits the common law right of parents to employ their children in the various kinds of labour there mentioned. They are bound, at the same time, to make their children attend school for ten hours a week at least, or are otherwise liable to a penalty. The whole statute is a restraining, not an enabling piece of legislation; the preamble says, "Whereas by the Factory Acts Extension Act 1867, provision is made, amongst other things, for regulating the hours during which children, young persons, and women are permitted to labour in any manufacturing process conducted in an establishment where fifty or more persons are employed. And whereas it is expedient to extend protection so far as respects the regulation of the hours of labour to children, young persons, and women working in smaller establishments."

The respondent did not appear.

BRAMWELL, B.—I certainly wish we could have heard what arguments might have been advanced on the respondent's side; but I hope another appeal may be brought upon a similar case, and in that hope I am prepared to give my judgment now upon the best consideration we have been able to give to the matter. It seems to me our judgment should be for the appellant. I think Mr. Shield took an accurate view of the Workshops Regulation Act 1867, when he contended that it was not an enabling, but only a restraining statute. It provides that a parent shall not work his children at a certain age except upon certain terms. Amongst other restrictions no child under thirteen is to work unless he attends school for ten hours a week. The object of the statute is to regulate the labour of children, and incidentally it provides them with a certain amount of education. The Elementary Education Act 1870, was passed with an entirely different object. It aims at and provides for education only, and applies not only to children employed in labour but to all children. Unless there were an express limitation, this Act would govern all previous Acts relating in any way to the same subject; and it is perfectly clear that this byelaw would be justified, except for certain words in the Act itself. Let us consider what it is that limits the effect of the Act. The question turns more upon the provision in the Act than the restriction in the byelaws. The 3rd byelaw has not so much effect upon the question as the proviso in the 74th section, being merely a precautionary limitation. They may, therefore, be both of them interpreted together by the meaning of the words in the section providing that no byelaw "shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour." In one sense, it is impossible to say that this does not introduce a state of things contrary to that which existed before; it is, at all events, different, but to my mind it is not contrary in the sense intended by the Act. I think, with respect to the hours for attendance at school, the effect is that a school board may determine the required number of hours per week, provided that in the case of children employed in workshops those hours are not less than ten hours a week. If the time fixed for all children were less than ten hours, that would have been "contrary" to something contained in the Workshops Regulation Act 1867. This interpretation, no doubt, gives rise to a difficulty; for under the Workshops Act, a child employed in labour must attend school ten hours a week until he is thirteen, without qualification, but under the Education Act he is exempt from that duty after ten years of age, if he attains to a particular standard, and receives a certificate. It certainly seems, looking at the two Acts together, that even with such certificate a child employed under the Workshops Act must attend ten hours a week at school until he is thirteen, although not required to do so by the School Board. Notwithstanding this possibly unintended consequence of the combined working of the two Acts, I can entertain no doubt that these provisions ought to be read together. Is it conceivable that a school board should be compelled to limit the better education to children not employed in certain particular kinds of labour, when the education of those children has hitherto been better provided for than that now subject to its control? When one looks at the objects of both statutes, it cannot be supposed that the children brought up to certain named trades should be worse off in the way of education than those employed in trades not mentioned in the Workshops Regulation Act. Looking at the words of the two enactments, these bye-laws are not contrary to, although making some alteration in, the previous legislation concerning children employed in labour. In no sense can they be said to repeal or to oppose the provisions of the Workshops Act, and therefore they are valid. I think the appeal must be allowed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It strikes me that this Elementary Education Act 1870, was intended to increase the amount of education which had been required by preceding legislation, and we have merely to see whether these bye-laws are in excess of the power conferred upon school boards by sect. 74. The principal object of the Workshops Regulation Act 1867, was to limit the hours of children's work, parents and employers being made liable to carry out that object. Incidentally, as I understand, some provision was made for children engaged in the work concerning which this enactment was passed, the penalty for breach of this provision being imposed upon the parents only and not upon the employers. The statute, however, only applied to handicrafts, and contained no enactments for the education of children otherwise employed. The Elementary Education Act, on the other hand, applies to all children, and there is nothing contrary to any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour in enabling school boards to compel such children to attend school for longer periods than those required by such Acts. It would be monstrous to hold that, because children are employed in handicrafts, their parents are to be absolved from affording them so good an education as if they had adopted other kinds of labour, or were not at work at all. We should circumscribe the effect of the Education Act in a manner which I think was never intended if we were to hold that because the labour laws required of these children ten hours' attendance at school a week, therefore they should be excused from the thirty hours' attendance demanded of all children by the bye-laws under the Education Act. I think there is nothing in these bye-laws contrary to the Workshop Act, and I arrive at the same conclusion as my brother Bramwell that the refusal of the justices to convict the respondent was wrong. I should have been glad to hear argument of counsel on the other side, but I entertain no doubt at all on the subject.

DENMAN, J.—I quite agree that it is unfortunate we have had no argument for the respondent, but I feel no doubt about the matter, and I fully concur in allowing this appeal. The magistrates have decided on the ground that this bye-law was bad in that by its general words it required children employed in workshops to attend school thirty hours a week instead of the ten hours necessary under the Workshops Regulation Act. The magistrates consider that this bye-law is contrary to the ten hours' provision of the statute; but in order to adopt that view we should have to read the words "ten hours at least" to mean "ten hours and no more." That difficulty is a sufficient reason for me, but I agree also on the other grounds given by my brothers Bramwell and Mellor.

REG. v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF WIGAN AND OTHERS.

[H. OF L.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 30 and July 3, 1876.

(Before Lords CHELMSFORD, HATHERLEY and O'HAGAN.)

REG. v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF WIGAN AND OTHERS.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER IN ENGLAND.

Loan for repairing church—Assignment of rates—Rate after lapse of twenty years—5 Geo. 4, c. 36, s. 1—Mandamus.

By 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, s. 1, the churchwardens of any parish are empowered to borrow money of the Public Works Loan Commissioners for specified purposes, and from time to time to make such annual or half-yearly rates for the repayment of the loan, in such proportions and at such times as shall be directed by the commissioners, and to assign the rates so to be made as a security for the repayment of the loan in such manner as the commissioners shall appoint, and so as to secure the repayment of the principal with interest at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum, by annual or half-yearly instalments within the period of twenty years at farthest from the advancing of the loan.

In 1849 the churchwardens of W. duly borrowed 4540l., and by indenture, reciting that the commissioners had directed them to make annual or other rates to secure the repayment, they assigned to the commissioners all the rates from time to time to be made pursuant to such directions or otherwise, under the provisions of the Act, with a proviso that on the repayment of the principal sum by twenty yearly instalments of 227l., together with interest, then the assignment should be void. Four instalments were paid, but after 1853 no payment was made, and in 1871 the commissioners obtained leave to issue a mandamus to the churchwardens to make a rate to pay the instalment and interest due in 1854.

On a return to the mandamus setting out the facts and dates:

Held, on demurrer (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the return was a good answer to the writ, for the statute expressly and implicitly forbade the making of a rate after the lapse of twenty years from the advance of the loan.

A peremptory writ of mandamus issued by the Queen's Bench being, in effect, a decision upon the merits of the case, is subject to review by a Court of Appeal.

THIS was a proceeding in error from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (Lord Coleridge C.J., Bramwell, Cleasby, and Pollock, BB., Keating, Grove, and Denman, JJ.), reported ante, vol. 9, p. 53; L. Rep. 9 Q.B., 317; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569, reversing a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench upon a demurrer to returns to a writ of mandamus.

The facts appear briefly in the headnote above, and the writ and returns are fully set out in the reports in the court below.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.) and Cowie appeared for the appellants.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the determination of the question upon this appeal depends entirely upon the powers of the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and the obligations of the churchwardens of Wigan under the 5th Geo. 4, c. 36. These powers and obligations are clearly explained and limited by the first section of that Act. "It shall and may be lawful for the churchwardens and overseers of the poor in any parish," with certain consents, "to make application to the commissioners authorised and empowered to make advances for public works, for any loan or advance under the powers, authorities, provisions, and regulations of the said Acts, and this Act, of such sum or sums as shall be necessary for defraying the expense, or any part of the expense, of rebuilding, repairing, enlarging, or otherwise extending the accommodation in any church or chapel of any such parish; and if such commissioners shall think fit to entertain such application, and shall be satisfied that such consent as required by this Act has been given and obtained, it shall and may be lawful for such commissioners, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to make and grant any such loan or advance for the purposes aforesaid, in such manner as such commissioners are empowered to make any loan or advance under the authority of the said recited Acts, or any of them, and it shall be lawful for such churchwardens, together with the overseers of the poor of or for any such parish, with respect to which such application shall be made and granted to receive the sum or sums so advanced, and to apply the same for the purposes mentioned in such application; and from and after the grant of any such loan or advance it shall be lawful for the churchwardens and the overseers of the poor of the parish, in respect of which such loan or loans shall be advanced as aforesaid, and their successors from time to time, for the time being, and they are hereby authorised and required to make such annual or half yearly rates for the repayment of the sums so advanced in such proportions and at such times as shall be directed and appointed by the said commissioners in that behalf, and to assign the rates so to be made as aforesaid as a security for the repayment of the sums so advanced, in such manner and form as the said commissioners shall direct and appoint, and so as to secure the repayment of all sums so advanced, with interest hereon at and after the rate of 4l. per centum per annum, by annual or half-yearly instalments, on the amount of the principal money advanced, within twenty years at farthest from the advancing of any such sums respectively." It was argued, for the commissioners, that these provisions are merely directory. It is difficult to understand in what sense this is meant, for nothing can be clearer to my mind than the imperative character of the Act to prevent the commissioners making a loan on any other terms than the securing the repayment of it by annual or half-yearly instalments within the period of twenty years. It is said that the commissioners might have directed the rates to be made in different proportions, and also at different times in each year. It is true they might, but it certainly would not have been so convenient as what they have done in fixing the annual payment at a certain amount, and in requiring, in general terms, yearly or half-yearly rates to be made. But it is useless to consider what might have been done. The question is, whether the parties have acted in obedience to the Act. The churchwardens, by the indenture of 17th Sept. 1849, assigned to the commissioners the annual or other rates which should from time to time be made under or in pursuance of the direction and appointment of the commissioners, by virtue of the provisions of the 5th Geo. 4, c. 36, with a proviso making void the assignment on payment of the 4540*l.* borrowed by annual instalments of 227*l.*, which would amount to that sum in twenty years. It was argued that by the terms of this proviso the commissioners might accept, and the churchwardens might pay, the 4540*l.* in any other manner than by these annual instalments. That proviso provides for the payment first of all of the interest on the amount borrowed; "and the further sum of 227*l.* in or towards the discharge of the said principal sum of 4540*l.*, until the whole of the said principal sum of 4540*l.*, and the interest thereof, shall be discharged; then, and in that case, or on any other acceptance of the said sum of 4540*l.*, and the interest thereof, by or under the order or direction of the said Public Works Loan Commissioners, the assignment hereby made as aforesaid shall become absolutely void." Now, it appears to me perfectly clear that any stipulation for the payment of the loan otherwise than is prescribed by the Act, cannot possibly have any effect. The rates having been thus assigned to the commissioners, rates were duly made for four years, and the annual sum of 227*l.*, amounting together to 908*l.*, was paid to the commissioners, the last instalment being paid on the 13th Dec. 1853. It is hardly necessary to advert to the creation of new parishes out of the parish of Wigan, as by sect. 15 of the 5 Geo. 4, this makes no difference in the question. It is stated in the special case that the commissioners applied from time to time for payment of the instalments subsequently due. The nature of those applications is not stated, nor down to what time they were continued. Nor does it appear that the commissioners took any action upon them. The discontinuance of the payment of the instalments was occasioned by the refusal of the vestry in 1854 to levy a church-rate, and no church-rate has been raised in the parish of Wigan since. No proceeding on the part of the commissioners took place until the year 1867, when the Court of Queen's Bench, upon their application, granted a rule calling on the churchwardens to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to make a rate or rates for payment of 4841*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, interest and instalments due of the principal moneys secured by the indenture of the 17th Sept. 1849. This rule was enlarged in order that a special case might be stated for the opinion of the court. Upon the argument of the case the court ordered a mandamus to issue commanding the churchwardens to make, levy, and collect a rate for payment of the sum of 227*l.*, one year's instalment of the loan of 4540*l.* due on the 17th Sept.

1854, and interest on the balance of the principal sum. Returns were made to the mandamus which were demurred to. The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the prosecutors on the demurrer, and ordered the peremptory mandamus to issue, which is the subject of our consideration. It is unfortunate that there is not the slightest report of any of these proceedings in the Queen's Bench, so that we are deprived of the advantage of knowing the reasons which led the court to the conclusion that the peremptory mandamus ought to be issued. The Court of Exchequer Chamber has decided unanimously that it ought not to have issued. In considering the case, it is necessary to clear the way of a difficulty which has been raised as to the power of any other court to question the issuing of a writ of mandamus by the Queen's Bench, which it is said is a matter entirely of discretion. The Chief Justice of the Common Pleas appears to me to give some countenance to this suggestion. His Lordship says (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 325; 30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 574), "There is nothing shown save that the money has not been paid, and this, it may be, by consent of the commissioners; though, indeed, some years ago they appeared to have asked for it, but to have made no attempt to enforce compliance with their request by any legal measure. Had this been shown, and if there was a question whether they had come in a reasonable time, calling on the parish, the same persons as near as might be, to make good their default, then if the right is discretionary the judgment of the Queen's Bench on the motion for the mandamus would be final. But no question of discretion of this nature arises in this case." And in another part of his judgment his Lordship says (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 325; 30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 573), "The Court of Queen's Bench, supposing it to be a matter of discretion, do not state that they have in fact exercised that discretion upon the particular circumstances of this case, or whether they were of opinion that the commissioners were entitled to the writ ex debito justitiæ, and that no question of discretion arose." Now there appears to me to have been some little confusion upon this subject, which can easily be removed. A writ of mandamus is a prerogative writ, and not a writ of right, and it is in this sense in the discretion of the court whether it shall be granted or not. The court may refuse to grant the writ not only upon the merits, but upon some delay, or other matter personal to the party applying for it; in this they exercise a discretion which cannot be questioned. So in cases where the right in respect of which a rule for a mandamus is granted upon showing cause appears to be doubtful, the court frequently grants a mandamus in order that the right may be tried upon the return, this also is a matter of discretion. But where the court grants a peremptory mandamus, which is a determination of the right, and not a mere dealing with the writ, they decide according to the merits of the case, and not upon their own discretion, and their judgment must be subject to review, as in every other decision in actions before them. Now ought this mandamus to have issued? That question depends entirely, as I have already said, upon the Act of Parliament. The commissioners could only make loans upon certain conditions. The churchwardens could only borrow upon certain conditions. The condition upon the commissioners is that they must lend on security of rates for the repayment of annual or half-yearly instalments within twenty years at the farthest. They have no power to lend on any other terms. The condition on the churchwardens is that they must borrow on the terms of repaying the loan by annual or half-yearly rates within twenty years. They can borrow upon no other terms. The intention of the Act with respect to these loans appears to be that the ratepayers in the parish, a fluctuating body, should be chargeable for twenty years with rates in discharge of the loan, but that ratepayers after twenty years should not be liable, which could not be unless after the twenty years the rates were no longer chargeable with repayment of the loan. This is carefully provided for by the direction as to annual payments to be made in twenty years. Now the mandamus issued in 1871 is to levy a rate for the payment of the instalment due on the 14th Sept. 1854. This rate must necessarily be levied more than twenty years from the advancing of the loan in 1849, and, as it appears to me, in the teeth of the Act. If this can be supported it will follow that the churchwardens may be called upon year by year for fifteen years to levy rates for the payment of the instalments; for it was not considered by the Queen's Bench that the whole arrears can be required to be discharged by a single rate, which, however, would be equally objectionable. It is unnecessary to examine the cases which have been cited, none of which appears to me to have any application; nor is it necessary to consider whether it was incumbent upon the Commissioners to be active in enforcing their rights, nor whether they had any remedy personally against the churchwardens under the indenture of the 17th Sept. 1849. I confine myself entirely to the Act upon which the whole question turns, and, looking at that alone it seems to me to be perfectly clear that not by implication only, but by the most express language, it prevents a rate for the repayment of the loan by the commissioners being made after twenty years from the time when the money was advanced. I submit to your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I have come to the same conclusion after hearing the able arguments which have been advanced at the Bar on both sides of this question. I may put out of the case at once what I may call the incidental question, which my noble and learned friend has touched upon, namely the question of how far the direction of the Court of Queen's Bench is to be regarded as a point of discretion on the part of the Court. I entirely agree in the view taken by my noble and learned friend that, when the Court of Queen's Bench are invited to make an order by way of mandamus, it is no more in the power of that Court than of any other court to direct that to be done which is not lawful. Upon a prerogative writ there may arise many matters of discretion which may induce them to withhold it, matters connected with delay, matters connected in certain cases possibly with the conduct of the parties, and when they have exercised their discretion in directing that which is in itself lawful to be done, I apprehend that no other court can question their discretion in so directing. But with regard to that which is in itself lawful to be done, they are open to correction, as every other court is, by the Court of Appeal, or by a higher authority. The question we have really to consider in this case is whether or not that which the churchwardens were directed to do by the mandamus in question was a thing which they could by law be ordered under any circumstances to do. That must depend entirely upon the authority derived from the special Act of Parliament under which they professed to act. Undoubtedly they have not at common law any right to raise, or direct to be raised, a rate which is for purposes which are in themselves retrospective. The principle of that is very clear. It is not right on the one hand that those who have had the benefit of work done should be exempt for several years, and perhaps exempt altogether, from the change and fluctuation which takes place among the inhabitants, from making any contribution to the expense of the work, and should throw upon those who succeed them the whole of that duty. And again, as regards the general law, it has been held that with reference to retrospective rates, except under special powers contained in special Acts of Parliament for that purpose, it is not right to throw any past expenditure upon a succeeding class of inhabitants of the district affected by the work. But it was found by the Legislature that there were certain works of a permanent character which it might be wise to execute, and in such cases those who came after would have the benefit of the work proposed to be done; and therefore from time to time Acts of Parliament have been passed with this view, and public moneys have been vested in certain commissioners, called "the commissioners of loans." These commissioners have been authorised to make advances under Acts of Parliament, but Parliament has at all times carefully made provision, according to what seemed to the wisdom of the Legislature to be right at the moment, for the repayment of those moneys by charges which would affect subsequent inhabitants of the district which would obtain the benefit which was to be secured by the loan to be advanced. Among other things the object of building or repairing churches has been considered to be a proper object for such advances; and, accordingly, in the Act of Parliament before your Lordships on the present occasion, among various objects for which the power is given of charging the rates upon the parish, we find that one is the repairing of churches, and that is the object we have before us for consideration to-day. Another object, dealt with in the 3rd section, is the building of new churches, and another is increasing the accommodation for students in colleges at the universities. But in all those cases very careful provision is made for the mode in which the loan is to be raised, and the security to be given. My Lords, we find in the 1st clause of the Act, which is the clause we have to construe now, the loan being one for the repairing of a church, that provision is made in the first place that the commissioners may lend moneys, and in the next place that the churchwardens and the overseers of the poor of a parish may receive a loan, under certain provisions as to consents and the like, which have been complied with in this case; and they having received the loan, then comes this clause, under which the commissioners must now seek the repayment of the money lent, if they can obtain it at all. [His Lordship read the latter part of sect. 1 of the Act, as set out above, and continued:] Now, without looking in the first instance to the deed which has been executed under the authority of this clause, let us just see what the authorities and powers of the churchwardens were. They could do nothing except under this Act; let us see what the Act authorises them to do. They were authorised to assign the rates, and they were authorised to assign them in such a manner, and the instalments of the loans were to be payable in such proportions, and at such times, as should be directed by the commissioners. But both the commissioners and the churchwardens were limited, as it appears to me, plainly and distinctly by the close of this sentence, which tells you in what manner the repayment was to be secured. It was to be repaid with interest thereon by instalments spread over a "period of twenty years at farthest" from the advance. It appears to me that they could, therefore, give no security beyond a security for the repayment within that particular time; they could give no security which should postpone the repayment, by instalments or otherwise, to any later period than twenty years from the advance. In giving to the commissioners full authority to direct how and in what form the annual or half-yearly payments should be made, the Legislature appears to have thought they could trust a public body like the commissioners with the power of seeing that all should be done justly and fairly; otherwise it might be said that it would be possible, under the particular words of this section, for the commissioners to say, you can begin to pay the instalments at the tenth year from the date of the advance, paying none in the interim, and so, by means of an operation of double instalments, as it were, secure the payment of the advance by the end of the twenty years. But I apprehend that that would not be a reasonable exercise of their duty, and it would not be one which we ought to impute to them, or which the Legislature contemplated as possible on the part of the commissioners. I make the observation that they have considerable powers given to them as to proportions and as to times, for they are to be such proportions and such times as the commissioners may direct, and I apprehend that that power was given for the express purpose of enabling the commissioners, in a reasonable and proper manner, to take the best steps they could for securing to themselves the repayment of the money within twenty years from the advance. They would have to see what a reasonable rate to be raised in each succeeding year would be in the particular parish in question, whether there should be an increase or a diminution in the amount, according as the parish might increase or might diminish in population, or the like. At all events this power furnishes an answer among other things to the objection which has been raised as to the difficulty that might occur with respect to the payment of the last instalment, that difficulty having been of this nature. It was said in the course of the argument, you cannot apply for a rate until the money is due, and if the last instalment will be due at such a time that you cannot secure to yourself the payment by a rate, you will have to lose the last instalment altogether. It is an answer to that to say that the commissioners have power to make such arrangements as to proportions and as to times of making payments as would enable them to have the last instalment paid by means of a rate levied at a time when it would fall within the twenty years. Under this provision in the Act arrangements would be made whereby the commissioners could secure themselves against a loss of that description. Then we come back again to the question what is the power the churchwardens have of levying rates, and what is the power the commissioners have of directing payments? They appear to have acted very properly in their mode of having the deed prepared. I need not go through its details; the deed is so prepared as to recite that it is intended that the payment shall be made in the manner and in the proportions afterwards directed by the commissioners. Then there comes the assignment of the rates; then there is a provision which would be called in an ordinary mortgage deed a proviso for redemption, which points out the particular periods at which the instalments shall be paid. The deed being dated September 1849, the first instalment of a portion of the principal together with interest is directed to be paid in September 1850, and then in each succeeding year the payments of 227l. of principal, and an amount of interest, diminishing in proportion as the debt itself would diminish, are to be paid by successive instalments. If everything had been rightly and properly done according to the provisions of the deed this would have been the mode of paying off the debt. Then it says the deed will be completely avoided by paying all those instalments. I apprehend that that was a very proper form of deed, and that all that can be claimed by the commissioners is that which alone the Act authorises them to receive, and that which they have provided should be paid to them by their deed. The case is clear of all the authorities which have been cited, because they appear to have been decided upon the simple ground that if there is an express power of charging indefinitely the rates that power will not be diminished because there is a provision made for the payment of the debt in a certain manner, there being no proviso that if the debt is not paid in that manner, it is to be acquitted or discharged. If there is a charge upon the whole of the rates indefinitely and in perpetuity, then the mode of making the payment which is pointed out will not invalidate the charge. But if you find in an Act of Parliament like this one particular power of effecting the object, and that power cannot now be further pursued, because the time has been allowed to pass, then I apprehend that all that one can say is that the security is not one which will carry and proceed further than the very form and extent in which it is framed, which is in pursuance of the Act, and that, therefore, the commissioners, having been directed to take steps to provide for the payment of these sums as they become due, cannot now, in the year 1876, obtain payment of those instalments which were due under the deed in 1854. I do not think that any argument arises from any of the other clauses in the same Act of Parliament. In fact it is only idem per idem to a great extent. If anything they would rather incline my mind against the view contended for by the appellants, because after the 4th clause has directed that the colleges shall have the power to borrow money, and make provision by their deeds for the assignment of the college property, so that the debt may be paid off like parochial debts, in the course of twenty years, the following clause, the 5th, contains an express proviso that no other instruments and no other powers of charging college estates shall have any effect under the Act. It is not necessary for me to say any more with regard to those later clauses on the present occasion, for the case we are disposing of is not one of a college at all; but it appears to me that if it were necessary to decide upon the effect of them it would be open to great question and argument whether the successors in the college could not say: "There is no authority to extend this security beyond the period pointed out by the Act of Parliament." However, I say no more upon the other matters contained in the Act of Parliament beyond this, that they do not convince me that one is wrong in coming to the conclusion to which my noble and learned friend has come, and to which I have also come, upon the clause we are called upon to construe, namely the first clause.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I concur in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, but I do not desire to be understood as adopting all the reasons on which that judgment was grounded. Twenty-seven years have elapsed since the loan was made, of which the Public Works Commissioners seek now the repayment, and twenty-three years ago the parishioners of Wigan and the adjacent townships appear to have repudiated liability for that loan, and declined to pay any instalments upon it, and have ever since been allowed by the commissioners to succeed in their passive resistance to a claim which was apparently made more than once, but when exactly, how often, or under what circumstances, your Lordships are not at all informed. The commissioners in no way account for this singular delay and inaction, which is the more remarkable as the statute (5 Geo. 4, c. 36) cast upon them the duty of enforcing the discharge of the debt by yearly or half yearly rates, "in such proportions and at such times as they should think proper to direct and appoint." Within the lengthened period during which the commissioners have been so strangely quiescent it is stated in the various returns to the mandamus, and not denied, that several districts have been severed from the parish to which the loan was made, on the requisition of a majority of its inhabitants, and have become separate parishes for the purpose of levying rates, and entitled to the benefit of the exemption from liability to contribute to the repair of their respective parish churches, under 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 71, after twenty years from the dates of their consecration. So that if the contention of the appellants be sustained, the debt incurred by one set of people will be enforced against another. Those who have received the benefit will not bear the burden. A new generation, affected by new Acts of Parliament, and holding a new ecclesiastical position, will be visited with the well-defined and limited liability of their predecessors, in whose enjoyment of the advantages to which it was originally referable they may not, possibly, in their new circumstances participate at all, and all this seeming injustice will be accomplished because public officers have failed to do their duty in enforcing a public claim, not from any want of power to do it, or from any suggestion that the parish, which contracted to pay under the statute year by year, had not ample means available for the purpose, but from the unexplained and unwarrantable neglect to take effectual proceedings, which would have been easy and simple, and must have been effectual. In this state of facts we come to consider whether the terms of the statute require us at this time, and after all the events which have taken place, to give effect to a claim so questionable in its staleness, and in its practical operation, if established, so capable of working injustice. I quite adopt the view of the Attorney-General that a retrospective rate is not necessarily illegal, and that if this be a case of the exercise of discretion by the Court of Queen's Bench, cadit questio. Neither the Exchequer Chamber nor your Lordships' House has the power to interfere, and the appellant must prevail. But for the reasons already given, there was no exercise of discretion here which could oust the control of this House. In my view the statute, if rightly construed, does not warrant a retrospective rate, but contemplates and requires that the loan should be repaid from rates leviable within a specified period; then the argument as to discretion does not arise, and we are bound to enforce the intention of the Legislature. The dictum of Lord Wensleydale (when delivering, as Parke, B., the unanimous opinion of the judges in Harrison v. Stickney, ubi sup.), on which reliance has been placed, not only in the court below, but by the learned counsel who have addressed your Lordships, points to that intention as the determining consideration in the case; and if it be, as I think it is, the words of the Act seem to me decisive. Sect. 1, by the imperative words "it shall be lawful," casts on the churchwardens and overseers the duty of making, for the payment of the loan obtained on the demand of a majority of the inhabitants of the parish, or of four-fifths of the select vestry, if there be such a body, "such annual or half yearly rates" for the payment of it "in such proportions and at such times as shall be directed and appointed" by the commissioners, and to assign them, so as to secure the repayment of all sums so advanced with interest, by annual or half yearly instalments, "within the period of twenty years at farthest" from the advancing of such sums. Could a clause have been framed with more elaborate care to secure the payment within the twenty years? It has not a negative provision, but its affirmative words are very stringent. The rates are to be made "so as to secure repayment"—of what?—"of all sums," that is, of everything which has been advanced "within the period of twenty years." This seems clear enough, but to render the purpose of the Act if possible, more unmistakable, it adds, "at farthest," and fixes the period so as to make it run from the time of the first advance made to the parishioners. And this emphatic declaration of intention to have the payment made within the twenty years is repeated over and over again in the 3rd and 4th sections with equal force. I decline to give an opinion upon the construction of the 3rd and 4th sections, because it is not required for the case which is now before the House for consideration. I therefore reserve my opinion, as has been done by my noble and learned friend opposite. But if an opinion were to be given at this moment, I should say that the other section ought to be construed as I construe the first section, and not according to the view presented by the Attorney-General and Mr. Cowie, that those two sections ought to be interpreted as not limiting the period of payment. I do not know how language could have made the intent more clear, and I can see no sufficient reason for holding the clause directory. Words, though affirmative, are not necessarily so if they are absolute, explicit, and preceptory; and so, in my opinion, they are here. No doubt express words forbidding any action after twenty years might have been added, and then there would have been no room for controversy. But Lord Wensleydale held of course that the prohibition of a retrospective rate might well be made either impliedly or expressly, and if the intention here is indicated by words which are unequivocal, and if the Legislature has supplied all facilities for carrying that intention into effect by compelling the parish to make the rate, and arming the commissioners with ample authority to regulate the making of it, so as to have full payment assured within the time specified, the implication seems to me natural and reasonable that the Legislature did not mean to allow the making of it after that time had passed. I, therefore, agree with the Exchequer Chamber as to the construction of the statute, and I do so the more willingly because it is in manifest accordance with its policy and, as I conceive, essential to its equitable operation. It is of importance that public officers should not be encouraged to sleep at their posts, and postpone the fulfilment of their duties in the expectation that their delays will be condoned and their demands conceded, whatever may have been the lapse of time or the change of circumstances. It is important to the community that the public funds, advanced for meritorious purposes, should not be lost from neglect in enforcing the repayment of them; and it is of equal importance that persons who never sought the advance or derived benefit from it should not be made responsible when those who became liable at their own instance have passed away. As to the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104. sect. 15, it leaves the legal liabilities of borrowers under Acts of Parliament where it found them, and does not, in my judgment, operate the least to revive the claim of the commissioners if it ceased to be enforceable at the end of the twenty years. As to the authorities which have been cited for the appellants, my noble and learned friends have dealt with them sufficiently. In all cases of construction like this, the specific terms of each statute must be carefully considered, and those authorities will be found to apply to Acts quite distinguishable from that before us. Lord Coleridge has pointed out that in Reg. v. St. Michael's, Southampton (ubi sup.), and Reg. v. Hurstbourne Tarrant (ubi sup.), the amounts in question were charged upon the rates, whereas in this case they were not. In the first of these cases, Erle, J. relies on the fact that the obligee of the bond was not required to enforce annual payments, as he hopes, in justice towards future ratepayers, future legislation may provide. In the second case, Lord Campbell, C.J., takes notice of the fact that the rates are charged; Erle, J. and the other judges note that no duty to enforce payment is imposed on the bondholder, and Erle, J. says, "It would I think be highly satisfactory if it were in all such cases made obligatory on the creditor to enforce payment at once. If the Act had said that the charge should be paid off within five years, and not otherwise, it would have made it the duty of the creditor to secure it in time." Here the Act clearly says that the debt shall be paid "within twenty years at furthest," and the commissioners get power to have payment made "in such proportions and at such times as they shall direct and appoint." I shall only add that in those cases, and in every other which has been relied on, the phraseology of the Acts has been very different from that with which we are dealing, and in none of them will be found the strong, clear, and unequivocal limitation which warrants us in adopting a view consonant, in my opinion, at once with legal principle and natural justice.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

ARCHES COURT OF CANTERBURY

Reported by A. H. BITTLESTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before the Right Hon. Lord PENZANCE, Dean of Arches.)

Jan. 4, 5, and 6, and Feb. 3 and 26, 1876.

CLIFTON v. RIDSDALE.

Illegal Communion—Number of communicants—Ceremonial observance—Crucifix—Unauthorised decorations—Appeal no stay—37 & 38 Vict. c. 85.

It is not lawful for a minister to consecrate or receive the Sacrament in his church when there is only one communicant besides himself.

On the top and in the centre of a screen, stretching across a church at the entrance to the chancel, was placed a figure of Our Saviour on the Cross, in full relief, and about eighteen inches long, facing the congregation. A row of candles at distances of about a foot apart ran along the top of the screen, and were continued up the central portion, which was raised, the last candles coming close up to the crucifix on either side:

Held, in a proceeding under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, that, as it was not proved that the candles were used for other than lighting purposes, their position and the manner in which they were used, did not constitute a ceremonial observance, and were not, therefore, illegal; but that the figure, being in danger of becoming the object of superstitious reverence, must be removed from the cross.

Attached to the walls of the same church were fifteen groups of figures in coloured relief, purporting to represent scenes of Our Lord's Passion, and such as are commonly used in Roman Catholic churches, where prayers are said before them, and they are known as the "stations of the Cross." No faculty having been obtained to authorise their erection:

Held, that upon this ground they must be removed; and, further, that being in danger of being used for the purposes for which they have been used among Roman Catholics, they were decorations forbidden by law.

An application to the Court of Arches to suspend the execution of a monition, issued under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, pending an appeal to the Queen in Council, will only be granted on special grounds; and where the decision appealed from follows a decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal, or where obedience to the monition, pending the appeal, cannot be painful to the consciences of those against whom it is directed, the application will be rejected.

In cases under this Act the court will hear two counsel on each side.

Construction and jurisdiction of the court explained.

THIS was a proceeding under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, in which the complainants were three resident parishioners of the parish of St. Peter's, Folkestone, who were members of the Church of England, and the respondent was the Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale, perpetual curate of the same parish.

A requisition from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the judge of this court to hear and determine the matters complained of, the parties having failed to state their willingness to submit to the directions of the Archbishop touching those matters, had been received in the registry of the court from the registrar of the diocese of Canterbury.

The following is the material portion of the representation put forward by the complainants:

1. The Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale, the incumbent or perpetual curate of the said district-chapelry (over which he has the exclusive cure of souls), on Sunday, the 4th July 1875, in his church or chapel of St. Peter, being the church or chapel of the said district chapelry, at the early service commencing at 7.30 a.m., and again at the mid-day service commencing at 10.30 a.m., and also on Sunday, the 11th July 1875, at the like mid-day service, unlawfully used lighted candles on the Communion Table at which the Communion was at the said times respectively being celebrated, or on a ledge immediately over the same, during the celebration by him of the Holy Communion, and when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light.

2. At all the said services on the said days the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, when officiating in his said church in the Communion Service and in the administration of the Communion, unlawfully wore certain unlawful ecclesiastical vestments other than or besides and instead of those appointed and allowed by law, to wit, a vestment known as an alb, and a vestment known as a chasuble.

3. At all the said services on the said days the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, when officiating in the said church in the Communion Service, unlawfully mixed water with the sacramental wine used in the Communion, and also then administered or caused to be administered wine mixed with water to the communicants at the Lord's Supper.

4. At all the said services on the said days the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, when officiating in his said church in the Communion Service and in the administration of the Communion to the communicants, unlawfully used in such service and administration wafer bread or wafers, to wit, bread or flour made in the form of circular wafers, instead of bread such as is used to be eaten.

5. At the said mid-day services, commencing at 10.30 a.m., on the said 4th July and on the said 11th July, the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, when officiating in his said church in the Communion Service, unlawfully stood, while saying the prayer of consecration in the said service, at the middle of the west side of the Communion Table (such Communion Table then standing against the east wall, with its shorter sides towards the north and south), in such wise that, during the whole time of his saying the said prayer, he was between the people and the Communion Table, with his back to the people, so that the people could not see him break the bread or take the cup in his hand.

6. At the said mid-day services, on the said 4th July 1875, and the said 11th July 1875, the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, when officiating in his said church in the Communion Service, and saying the prayer of consecration in the said service, did not continue in a standing position, but twice unlawfully knelt or bent the knee during the reading thereof.

7. At the said mid-day service, commencing at 10.30 a.m., on the said 11th July 1875, immediately after the conclusion of the Prayer of Consecration in the Communion Service, the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale unlawfully caused to be sung in his said church the words, or hymn, or prayer, commonly known as "The Agnus," that is to say, "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us."

8. At the said mid-day service, commencing at 10.30 a.m., on the said 4th July 1875, and at the like service on Sunday, the 1st Aug. 1875, the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, when officiating in his said church, unlawfully celebrated the Lord's Supper in the course of divine service, and himself then consecrated and received the elements when only one person communicated with him.

9. At the said mid-day service, commencing at 10.30 a.m., on the said 4th July 1875, the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, in his said church, after the conclusion of morning prayer, and immediately before the commencement of the Communion Service, and as connected with such Communion Service, and in the presence of the congregation then assembled in the said church for such service, unlawfully formed and accompanied a procession consisting of the choir and of two acolytes in short surplices and red cassocks, and four banners and a processional cross, were carried in such procession, and it proceeded from the chancel down the north aisle and up the nave back to the chancel again, the choir singing a hymn while walking in the procession, and the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, while taking part in such procession, wore a chasuble, and had a cap called a biretta upon his head, and on the return of the procession to the chancel, the Communion Service at once commenced.

10. On the occasion of the evening service on the evening of Sunday, the 4th July, 1875, and immediately after an offertory, which took place at the conclusion of the sermon, and without any break or interval, and as connected with such service, and in the presence of the congregation assembled for such service, the said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, in his said church, unlawfully caused a like procession to that before mentioned, as having taken place at the morning service, to be formed, and accompanied the same round the church, in like manner singing, and at one period of such procession all those who took part in it fell upon their knees and remained kneeling for some time, and after their return to the chancel the general thanksgiving was intoned, and the congregation were then dismissed.

11. The said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, without lawful authority, and unlawfully, and since the consecration of his said church, that is to say, in the year 1872, set up and placed upon the top of the screen separating the chancel of the said church from the body or nave thereof, and still unlawfully retains there, a crucifix and twenty-four metal candlesticks with candles, and at the ordinary evening service on Sunday, the 4th July, 1875, the said candles were lighted on either side of such crucifix, and so continued during such service, although the other lights in the church were amply sufficient to light the church, and the said candles were not wanted for that purpose.

12. The said Rev. C. J. Ridsdale, without lawful authority, and unlawfully, set up and placed in his said church, since the consecration thereof, that is to say, in the year 1871, and still unlawfully retains therein, certain representations of figures in coloured relief of plastic material, purporting to represent scenes of our Lord's Passion, attached to the walls of the said church, and forming what are commonly called stations of the cross and passion, such as are commonly used in Roman Catholic churches, and not in churches of the Church of England, and some of the said representations relate to legendary and superstitious scenes not part of the gospel history, and not accepted or recognised as authentic by the Church of England, and the said representations as a whole tend to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorised and superstitious kind, and are unlawful.

13. The said acts, matters, and things hereinbefore mentioned are respectively alterations in, or additions to, the fabric, ornaments, or furniture of the said church, made without lawful authority, decorations forbidden by law, unlawful ornaments of the minister of the said church, failures on the part of the incumbent to observe, and cause to be observed, the directions contained in the Book of Common Prayer, relating to the performance in such church of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the said book, or unlawful additions to and alterations of such services, rites, and ceremonies.

There was no prayer at the close of the representation; but it was intimated by the court that a representation under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, should conclude with a prayer, as in other cases.

The answer of the respondent commenced by admitting the charge in the 6th article of the representation, and that such kneeling during the prayer of consecration was unlawful, but stating that it had been discontinued. It proceeded to require the complainants to prove every charge made in the representation; and to deny the illegality of the alb and chasuble. With regard to the 8th article of the representation, the answer stated that there were on the days mentioned present in the church a convenient number to, and every opportunity was given to them to, communicate with the priest. With regard to the crucifix, it was alleged to be part of a screen for which a faculty had been granted by the Commissary Court of Canterbury, and erected at the same time as the rest of the screen; and further, that the parishioners were necessary parties to any suit in which any order might be made for the removal of any part of the said screen. It was submitted that the paintings called the stations of the cross were not unlawful; that the allegations in the 12th article of the representation, commenting upon those paintings, were irrelevant, immaterial, calculated to prejudice, and improperly made against the respondent; that the parishioners were necessary parties to any suit for their removal; and that the court should grant a faculty to confirm their erection. The answer concluded with a prayer that the respondent might be dismissed from all further observance of justice in the matter of the said representation.

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. and B. Shaw, for the complainants.

Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., A. Charles, Jeune, and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondent.—

For the complainants witnesses were examined to prove the charges made in the representation. For the respondent, the deputy registrar of the diocese of Canterbury proved the granting of the faculty mentioned in the respondent's answer; and the respondent himself was examined. At the close of the respondent's case his counsel stated that, having regard to the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in it was not proposed that any argument should be offered by them in this court, except with reference to the charges contained in the 8th, 11th, and 12th articles of the representation.

Hebbert v. Purchas, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605; and

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. for the complainants.—It was illegal for the celebrant in the Communion Service to consecrate the elements and receive the Communion unless he bonâ fide believed that at least three persons, as to whom he had reason for his belief, would communicate at the same service: (Parnell v. Roughton, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 594; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 46.) The second and third rubrics after the Communion Service contain the whole law on the subject. The object of these rubrics was the prevention of a solitary Communion. Before commencing to read the second of the two portions into which the Communion Service is divided, the respondent was bound to have ascertained that a sufficient number of persons were present and about to communicate with him: (Wynn v. Davies, 1 Curt. Rep. 69, 63; Priestley v. Lamb, 6 Ves. 421.) [Lord PENZANCE.—How is the minister to ascertain this?] The rubric before the exhortation in the Communion Service requires that those about to communicate shall be conveniently placed to receive the Communion; and, therefore, the minister should require persons intending to communicate to separate themselves then from the rest of the congregation. This could be done either through the pulpit or the churchwardens. With regard to the crucifix and the lighted candles on the screen, the parishioners can have no interest in articles which are illegal. There is abundant evidence that the candles were not required for the purpose of giving light. The faculty relied on by the respondent does not specify with sufficient particularity what screen it was intended should be erected. All crucifixes in churches of the Church of England are illegal. The Homilies are directed against their use, and the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Phillpotts v. Boyd (L. Rep. 6 P. C. 435; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73), does not sanction them. In Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's S. Rep.), a distinction is drawn between crosses and crucifixes. Mr. Justice Keating, in Boyd v. Phillpotts (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 297), says, "It is clearly to be gathered from Westerton v. Liddell, that the Judicial Committee thought a crucifix

[ARCHES.]

CLIFTON v. RIDSDALE.

[ARCHES.]

would be illegal." At the Hampton Court Conference, in 1603, James I. referred to the material crosses which existed before the Reformation as demolished. A crucifix is within the prohibition of 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 10, a statute held by the Privy Council in Phillpotts v. Boyd (ubi sup.), to be still in force. Using lighted candles near and about the crucifix is an unauthorised ceremonial addition to the services prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. The pictures described in the 12th article of the representation were put up without a faculty, and are obviously placed in the church for no other than superstitious purposes. [He proposed to refer to two Roman Catholic books of devotion, entitled The Key of Heaven, and The Crown of Jesus, but Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., objected that no foundation for using them had been laid, and that at any rate a witness should be called to prove that they were works of authority. Lord Penzance having, under the circumstances, given permission for a witness then to be called, one of the clergy attached to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter's, Hatton Garden, was examined, and stated that each of the two books in question contained fourteen pictures known to the members of the Roman Catholic Church as the Stations of the Cross and Passion, and prayers to be repeated before each picture; that the drawings produced of the pictures in the respondent's church were similar to those in the books, and that the books in question were devotional works approved by the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church. They were then put in evidence, and passages from them cited for the purpose of showing that the Stations of the Cross were in the Roman Catholic Church turned to uses which the Church of England would consider illegal and superstitious.] Five of these pictures are clearly illegal, as they do not even represent any historical incidents in our Lord's life. The 23rd of the Inquisitions of Queen Elizabeth orders the destruction of all pictures and paintings, and all other monuments or feigned miracles, pilgrimages, idolatry, and superstition (Cardwell's Documentary Annals, vol. 1, pp. 221, 222); and when it is remembered that the stations were first introduced into churches in order that prayers might be said before each in turn, instead of at the actual spots intended to be represented by them, it is evident that they are monuments of pilgrimages. One of them is also a monument of a feigned miracle. He also referred to Martin v. Mackonochie, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 209, 116; 2 P. C. 365; 3 P. C. 409; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 512; The Exeter Reredos case, revised report by Burch, Exeter, 1874; Wallot's Sacred Archaeology, voce Rood; The Catholic Layman, vol. 5; Fulke's Defence of the Translation of the Bible, Parker edition.

LORD PENZANCE intimated that in cases coming before him under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, he would hear two counsel on each side, and one in reply.

Shaw, on the same side, cited Delegat v. Highley, 3 Bing. N. C. 950; Keeling's Liturgies Compared; Scott v. Withman, 3 Stark, 168; Elphinstone v. Purchas, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 66.

Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C. for the respondent.—The respondent had a bonâ fide belief that several members of his congregation would receive the Communion at the midday service on the 4th July last. All the congregation present in the church are exhorted to partake of the Communion by the preparatory exhortations which form part of the Communion Service, and it has been held that the rubric requiring previous notice to be given by those who propose to attend is merely directory (Parnell v. Boughton, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 594; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 46), and that the minister cannot refuse to administer the Communion on the ground of no such notice having been given: (Stewart v. Crommelin, a judgment in the Consistorial and Metropolitan Court of Armagh, by the Rev. Alexander Irvin. Hodges and Smith, Dublin; Rivingtons, London, 1852.) The rubric directing that there shall be no communion unless three persons communicate with the priest, is only to insure a bonâ fide administration of the communion. No blame can attach to the minister if the spirit of the rubrics is complied with. The respondent exercised his discretion bonâ fide, and the fact that one person did communicate with him shows that that discretion was not quite unfounded. If, as is the custom in the respondent's church, the congregation remain to the end of the communion service, the officiating minister, unless he takes some unauthorised means of ascertaining the fact, thus incurring grave responsibility, cannot, at the commencement of the second portion of the service, be certain of the number of persons about to communicate with him. With respect to the candles on the chancel-screen, only two of them were placed so as to be close to the crucifix, and it has not been proved that any of them were ever lighted except at the evening service. The crucifix in this case is an architectural portion of the screen on which it stands, and is not an abused image. It has not been abused, and it is not likely to be abused, to superstitious uses. Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.) really decided nothing more than that crosses, as architectural ornaments, were lawful. It follows, from the decision in Phillpotts v. Boyd (L. Rep. 6 P. C. 435; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73), that a crucifix in stone, set up as an architectural decoration in a parish church, is no more unlawful than a crucifix painted on glass, such as that in St. Margaret's, Westminster, which still remains (Pierson v. Gell: Return of Causes before the Delegates, p. 85, No. 171); and that crosses and crucifixes set up for the purpose of decoration are alike not illegal, unless it is shown that they are in some way or other liable to abuse. The proclamations and the injunctions of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, with respect to the destruction of abused crosses and images, were merely executive acts directed to an evil then existing; and the statute 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 10, is entirely spent. What has been said with respect to the crucifix applies with equal force to the series of pictures called Stations of the Cross. They have not been, and are not likely to be, abused. It is no evidence of their unlawfulness that similar pictures are usually to be found in Roman Catholic churches.

A. Charles, on the same side, cited the 29th injunction of Edward VI., Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 17; Liturgies of Edward VI., p. 85, Parker Society, 1844; Campbell v. Spottiswoode (3 B. & S. 769); Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605); Wilson's Ornaments of Churches.

[ARCHES.]

CLIFTON v. RIDSDALE.

[ARCHES.]

Feb. 3.—Lord PENZANCE.—Some misconception, I fear, exists as to the functions, powers, and duties of this court. Some, also with regard to the source of its jurisdiction. It is not well that this should be so; for those who, however unadvisedly, question the authority or jurisdiction of the court, can hardly be expected to yield to its decrees that readiness of obedience in which the true force of all tribunals resides. I think it, therefore, not out of place that before proceeding to the details of the case before me, I should try to set in their true light some matters that have been by some unwittingly but grievously distorted, and in the interests of the many who conscientiously desire to yield obedience to an authority which they perceive to be lawful, to remove the misconceptions set on foot by the very few who may have no desire to submit to any authority at all. It has been said, and I fear widely accepted, that this court is a new court; that its authority is independent of the church; that the Bishops' Courts, which ought properly to entertain such questions as those now before me, have been by Parliament suppressed, and that a lay tribunal has been set up in their place, to sit in judgment not only upon ritual, but on soundness of doctrine and the mysteries of religion. If these things were true, they might afford ground for criticism upon the statute, though they could not affect the duty of obeying it. I hope, however, that those who may be inclined to act upon their truth will be at the pains of reading the statute for themselves. They will then perceive that every one of these four propositions is absolutely incorrect in fact. In the first place, the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85), did not, from one end to the other of it, create any new court, or indeed any court whatever. By the 7th section it is enacted that a person with certain legal qualifications should be nominated and appointed by the two archbishops, with Her Majesty's approval, to be a "Judge of the Provincial Courts of Canterbury and York." "The provincial courts" here spoken of are of course the existing provincial courts, namely, what is commonly called the Court of Arches, in the southern province, and the Chancery Court in the province of York. At the time the statute passed there were very learned judges presiding in each of these courts, though they have both since then retired, and the enactment which thus created a new judge to be a judge in both of them, without defining his relation to the existing judges, may be fairly criticised on that score, but is not open to the opposite charge of having created a new court. This explanation removes also the objection that the courts upon which the powers given by the statute are conferred, are courts independent of the church, unless, indeed, those who make this objection are willing to contend that the provincial courts of the two archbishops deserve that designation. The next objection, as to the suppression of diocesan courts, is equally incorrect in point of fact. These courts are not named or referred to, directly or indirectly, in the statute; their rights, their powers, and their jurisdiction remain to them, since the Act passed, as they existed before it was passed, untouched and unrestricted. What has really been done by the statute is to confer on the provincial courts (with a more speedy and less costly procedure than heretofore) the right to entertain questions of ritual concu-rently with but not to the exclusion of the diocesan courts. This jurisdiction is no more than the provincial courts exercised before the statute upon letters of request from the bishop—they may exercise it now without those letters of request; but the necessity for the bishop's assent which is thus withdrawn in one direction, is restored in another, for by sect. 9 of the Act, no suit can be carried into this court if "the bishop shall be of opinion that proceedings should not be taken." The provincial courts, therefore, have substantially gained no new jurisdiction by the statute. But if they had, the question I am considering is, not what addition has been made to the powers of the provincial courts, but whether the diocesan courts have been suppressed to make way for another tribunal, and what I have here advanced (which anyone may verify for himself on reading the statute) will, I hope, serve to show that their suppression by this statute is purely imaginary, and contrary to the fact. There may, I dare say, be some to whom the arming of the provincial courts, as courts of concurrent jurisdiction, with a more expeditious and efficient procedure, will appear to be the same thing in substance as suppressing the diocesan courts. To others, on the contrary, it may appear that the rendering a court less likely to be resorted to than before, by bringing another and more effective court into competition with it, is hardly the same thing as suppressing or abolishing it. I have no desire to entertain the question which of these two views is the more correct. Provided that the matter be truly stated and understood according to the fact, and not according to conclusions drawn from the fact, every one can judge for himself, and my end will have been attained. I am no further concerned with the remaining suggestion, that a lay tribunal has been set up to deal with doctrine as well as ritual, than to affirm that in all matters of doctrine this court has now precisely the same jurisdiction, and no more than it had before the statute was passed; nothing has been added, and nothing taken away. There are some, I believe, who contend that all questions touching the clergy in their ministrations ought to be referred only to a synod or some other tribunal composed of ecclesiastics. With such a proposition, I have nothing here to do, and I will dismiss the subject with the remark that those who assert it must needs go further, and either point out where in the judicature of this country such a tribunal is to be found, or contend that the Church of the State has no laws to govern it, or, what is the same thing, no laws capable of being enforced. I now address myself to the merits of the present case. It is a proceeding taken under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict., c. 85). Three parishioners of the parish of St. Peter's, Folkstone, have transmitted to the Archbishop of Canterbury a representation under that statute complaining of certain proceedings and matters, which they allege to be unlawful in the conduct of the respondent on the 4th and 11th July 1875. On the 1st Nov. 1875, and after the duties of judge under the statute had become merged in the office of official principal (or Dean of Arches) of the Provincial Court of Canterbury, this representation was transmitted to me, and, consequently, the proceedings before me, by virtue of the 7th section of the Act, became at once a proceeding in the Court of Arches. The representation complains of many things done by the respondent, which, at the hearing of the case, he did not deny, nor did he deny that these things were unlawful in the present state of the law, as enunciated by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, reserving to himself the right to question that state of the law, so far as he may be allowed to do so by that tribunal, should he appeal to it in the present case. I will shortly enumerate these offences: 1. The use of lighted candles on the Communion Table, or on a ledge immediately over it, at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion, when those candles were not required for giving light. 2. The mixing of water with wine for the service of the Holy Communion. 3. The use of wafer bread, instead of bread such as is usually eaten, in the administration of the Holy Communion. 4. Standing at the middle of the west side of the Communion Table with his back to the people, so that the people could not see him break the bread during the Prayer of Consecration. 5. Kneeling during the Prayer of Consecration—a practice, however, which he says he has since discontinued. 6. Causing the hymn or prayer commonly known as the Agnus Dei to be sung during the Communion service, immediately after the Prayer of Consecration. 7. Forming and accompanying a procession, consisting of the choir and two acolytes in short surplices and red cassocks, four banners, a brass instrument, and a processional cross being carried in it, the choir singing a hymn, and the respondent walking in it, with a cap called a biretta on his head; such procession taking place after the service of morning prayer and immediately before the Communion. 8. Forming and accompanying a like procession on another occasion, when, at one period of it, all those who took part in it fell on their knees and remained kneeling for some time. The fact of these eight charges having been admitted by or on behalf of the respondent, and the unlawfulness of his conduct on these occasions being unquestioned before me, and, in my opinion, unquestionable, my duty on the present occasion will be confined to admonishing him not to offend again in the same way. There is one other charge, upon which in like manner no defence has been offered, which requires, I think, some further notice. I allude to the charge of celebrating the Holy Communion in the vestments known by the names of "chasuble" and "alb." The question of vestments is one which stands in a peculiar position, in respect of the judicial decisions of which it has been the subject. Dr. Lushington, Sir John Dodson, and Sir Robert Phillimore have all held what are called the Edwardian vestments to be lawful. By the Court of Appeal in Liddell v. Westerton (Moore's Sp. Rep.), consisting of some of the ablest judges of our time, Lord Cranworth, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Kingsdown, Sir John Patteson, and Mr. Justice Maule, with the late and present Archbishops of Canterbury, it was affirmed in the following words: That "the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used." In the case of Martin v. Mackonochie (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 365; 24 L. T. Rep. N.S. 204) it was declared generally that the court "entirely concurred" in the construction of the ornaments rubric in the previous case, and particularly that "the term ornaments in the rubric means those articles the use of which in the services and ministrations of the church is prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI." In Liddell v. Westerton (Moore's Sp. Rep.), it is right to observe that the court, in the remarks above quoted, was commenting upon this rubric for the particular purpose, and the particular purpose only, of showing that it applied to articles and things which were "used" in the service as distinguished from ornaments which were not "used," but "set up in churches as ornaments in the sense of decorations." The terms, therefore, in which their construction of the ornaments rubric was declared, constituted a judicial dictum (very valuable, no doubt, considering the high authority of the judges from whom it emanated), but still a judicial dictum only. But in the later case of Martin v. Mackonochie (ubi sup.), the question arose directly whether the lighting of a candle could be justified as the "use" of an ornament permitted by this same "ornaments rubric," upon which the question of vestments turns. It thus became necessary to construe the language of that rubric, and the court having, as above stated, declared their adherence to the construction given to the rubric in the former case, went on to say that this construction went far to decide the case in hand, and concluded thus: "But the rubric, speaking in 1661, more than 100 years subsequently, has, for reasons which it is not the province of a judicial tribunal to criticise, defined the class of ornaments to be retained by a reference, not to what was in use de facto, or to what was lawful in 1549, but to what was in the church, by authority of Parliament, in that year; and in the parliamentary authority which this committee has held, and which their Lordships hold, to be indicated by these words, the ornaments in question are not found to be included." The argument of the court, therefore, ran thus: The ornaments which may be lawfully used are defined by the rubric of the present Prayer Book; the meaning of that rubric is, that such "ornaments" may be used as are prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.; the use of a lighted candle is not found to be prescribed by the first book of Edward VI.; therefore it is not lawful. I can only regard this case, then, as a decision directly based upon the proposition that the rubric of the present Prayer Book defined the "ornaments" which should be lawful in future as those which had been prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. No doubt the category of lawful ornaments to be found in the first book of Edward VI. was appealed to in that case to prohibit a lighted candle as not being within it; it must be invoked by those who uphold the Edwardian vestments as a justification for the use of all vestments which are within it; but it is difficult to conceive that this distinction warrants a different conclusion as to the rubric's meaning. If the directions of the book of Edward VI. are to be taken as the test of what may be lawfully used under the present Prayer Book, for the purpose of excluding matters and things which are not within them, it may be well urged that they are also the test of legality for the purpose of justifying the use of the things which are within them, and expressly enjoined by them. When fully considered, therefore, this case affords not a mere judicial dictum, but a direct authority, as to the true meaning of the rubric, judicially announced as the ratio decidendi of the court, and acted upon as the basis of its ultimate decision. With this decision the subsequent one of Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605) condemning the vestments which are among the "ornaments" prescribed by the first book of Edward VI., appears to be directly in conflict; but then it must be borne in mind that the case of Martin v. Mackonochie (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 365; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204) dealt with things used in the church service, such as a candle, while the case of Hebbert v. Purchas (ubi sup.) dealt with the dresses of the ministers, as to which dresses the canons of A. D. 1603 had given certain directions, and it was to these canons, as I understand the latter case, that the court ascribed the authority to qualify the subsequent statute and rubric in respect of dresses or vestments. The only passage which throws any light on the aspect in which the previous decision was regarded by the court is the following: "In Martin v. Mackonochie (ubi sup.) the committee stated anew the substance of the judgment in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.) upon this point, but did not take up any new ground." Save in these words no reference whatever to the case of Martin v. Mackonochie (ubi sup.) is made in the judgment in Hebbert v. Purchas (ubi sup.). So brief a notice and summary a dismissal seem rather to favour the conclusion that the case was considered unimportant to the matter in hand than that it was meant to be overruled. It may be, therefore, that this conflict of authorities is rather apparent than real, but whether it be the one or the other, my course in this court is clear. I cannot doubt that of two judgments delivered in the Appellate Court, which are in any degree inconsistent, I am bound in pronouncing the decision of the inferior court to obey and carry out that which was addressed directly to the matter in issue here, and which also was the last pronounced. As this result was inevitable the learned counsel have done well, I think, not to argue the question, and as the question has not been argued, I forbear to express my own opinion on the subject. I must, therefore, hold that Mr. Ridsdale has offended against the law in celebrating the Communion in a chasuble and in an alb, and admonish him to refrain from doing so in future. If this decision is wrong it must be corrected by the Appellate Court. I proceed now to deal with the remaining charges, and I will take, first, the charge which relates to the celebration on the 4th July 1875, at the service of the Holy Communion, commencing at 10.30 a.m., when only one person beside the respondent received it. The fact is not denied. The only answer given is that the great bulk of the congregation remained in the church, that there were 200 to 250 people present, and that the respondent had reason to believe, and did believe, that a sufficient number of them would communicate with him. I will examine the correctness of this last assertion presently, but, in the first place, it is desirable to turn to the rubric itself, which is said to have been contravened. It is in these words: "And there shall be no celebration of the Lord's Supper, except there be a convenient number to communicate with the priest, according to his discretion. And if there be not above twenty persons in the parish of discretion to receive the Communion, yet there shall be no Communion except four (or three at the least) communicate with the priest." It cannot, I think, be said that the words of this rubric admit of any but one interpretation.

There is to be no communion unless as many as three persons are present and communicate with the priest. It was not even in argument contended that the rubric meant anything else. It does not say there shall be no communion "unless the priest believes," or "unless he has reasonable ground to believe" that there will be as many as three communicants, but expressly that there shall be no communion "except three at the least" do in fact "communicate with the priest." But it was urged on Mr. Ridsdale's behalf, that his infraction of this rubric was not a wilful or voluntary one, and that on a principle which pervades the administration of all laws he ought not to be held responsible for what he could not prevent. I must observe that this defence was rather that of his counsel in argument than that which he had urged himself in his "answers." All that he there says is, that a convenient number of persons were present who might have communicated, and that every opportunity was given to them to do so, studiously omitting to say either that he honestly thought the requisite number would communicate, or that he had no means of knowing whether they would or not. I cannot regard this as otherwise than a very significant and possibly intentional omission. Still the question remains whether there was on this occasion, or would be on other occasions, any real impossibility of conforming to the rubric, a proposition which it devolves upon the respondent to establish. This impossibility is said to reside in the fact that the priest must, according to the several rubrics regulating the administration of the sacrament, consecrate the elements, and receive them himself before he has any means of knowing whether there will be as many as three persons coming forward to receive them after him. But is this the fact? Neither by any evidence that he has given, nor by any conclusions to be extracted from the rubrics of the Communion Service, does it seem to me to be established that a priest, really desirous of conforming to the rubric, is practically unable to discover whether the celebration he is about to enter upon will be a lawful one or not. On a perusal of the several rubrics as they occur in the Communion Service, it certainly seems to be assumed throughout that the number of those who are about to communicate will be known (or, at least, approximately so) to the priest, and if others are present (the propriety of which is, I believe, a controverted point, but one with which this court has nothing now to do), discriminated in some manner from them. Thus at the very beginning of the Order for the Administration of the Communion, it is said, "So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion, shall signify their names to the curate at least some time the day before." Then at a later period of the service, "The priest shall then place on the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient;" and again, "At the time of the celebration of the Communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the Holy Sacrament;" and again, "Then the priest shall say to them that come to receive the Holy Communion;" and again, "Then shall this general confession be made in the name of all them that are minded to receive the Holy Communion." Those, therefore, who intend to receive the Holy Sacrament, are invited to give notice of their intention, a quantity of bread and wine is to be placed on the Communion

Table, which is to be estimated in reference to the probable number of them; they are to be conveniently placed "for the receiving of the Holy Sacrament;" and they are to be addressed in the character of communicants by the minister, all of which provisions seem to imply that the minister has some means of distinguishing them. But no precise direction appears to be given as to the details of the manner in which any separation, discrimination, or distinction between those who do and those who do not communicate, is to be brought about. A reference to the rubrics of the previous Prayer Books may throw some light on the general intention of the Legislature on this head. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., at the end of the offertory, stands the rubric, following: Then so many as shall be partakers of the Holy Communion, shall tarry still in the quire, or in some convenient place nigh the quire, the men on the one side, and the women on the other side. All other (that mind not to receive the said Holy Communion) shall depart out of the quire, except the ministers and clerks: (The Liturgies of Edward VI., Parker Society edit., 1844, p. 35.) In the second Book of Edward VI., this rubric desiring the communicants to remain in the quire was omitted, perhaps because the congregation was no longer invited to come into the quire, and deposit their alms in the box which used to stand near the altar, or perhaps because a rubric was then for the first time introduced, directing that the table at the time of the Communion should stand in the body of the church, except in those churches where morning and evening prayer were read in the chancel. But at this same time a further alteration was made by adding the following very strong expressions to the form of exhortation which was to be said "at certain times:" "And whereas ye offend God so sore in refusing this holy banquet, I admonish, exhort, and beseech you, that unto this unkindness, ye will not add any more. Which thing ye shall do, if ye stand by as gazers and lookers on them that do communicate, and be no partakers of the same yourselves. For what thing can this be accounted else, than a further contempt and unkindness unto God. . . . Wherefore, rather than ye should so, depart you hence, and give place to them that be godly disposed. . . .—(Ib. pp. 272, 273).—This exhortation is looked upon by some, I believe, as addressed only to those who were not in the habit of communicating at all. By others, on the contrary, it is regarded as an invitation to all who are not about to communicate on the particular occasion, to leave the church, and thus separate themselves from the communicants. But, whatever may have been the intention of it, it is not unlikely that it gave rise to a custom, more or less general, for the non-communicants to withdraw. On this matter I will quote a passage from a judgment delivered in the Metropolitan Court of Armagh in the year 1852. The case was cited by Dr. Stephens, and I am indebted to him for a copy of the judgment. Speaking of this exhortation, the rev. judge of that court said: "This striking address, repeated in all the churches of the kingdom during a period of nearly 100 years, very effectually brought about and established the custom of the non-communicants withdrawing—a custom that continues to this day, although this part of the exhortation was omitted in the Prayer Book of 1662." He then adverts to the fact that the rubric above quoted, as to the communicants "being conveniently placed," was for the first time inserted in the present Prayer Book, and goes on thus: "When, therefore, the non-communicants have withdrawn, and the communicants have placed themselves conveniently for receiving the sacrament, that is in a part of the church near the Lord's table, it would seem to be easy for the officiating minister to make a tolerably accurate estimate of the numbers for whom he is to provide a sufficient quantity of bread and wine, even though they have not signified their names previously." The only other matter which sheds any light on this subject is the language of the 25th article of religion, which speaks of the sacrament as not to be carried about or "gazed upon." Upon this review of the history of these rubrical directions, the conclusions at which I arrive are, that the Legislature, in both Prayer Books of Edward VI., as well as the book of 1662, contemplated that there would be some method of discriminating between those who intended to partake of the Holy Communion, and those who did not; that under the first book of Edward VI., the means of doing so were specifically prescribed; that under the second book of Edward VI. and the present book, no such specific means are prescribed (except they be found in the direction that the communicants should be "conveniently placed"), and that the custom, however general, of the non-communicants retiring from the church is not specifically enjoined by any positive direction of the existing rubrics. Nor am I aware that the minister has any means at his command to enforce compliance with this custom, supposing it to be desirable to do so, upon which matter it is not my duty here to express an opinion. But admitting this to be so, it was still urged by the complainants that the minister has, practically, other means within his reach of ascertaining whether a sufficient number are about to communicate, did he choose to avail himself of them. It was not asserted, nor can it be assumed, that the members of the respondent's congregation would do otherwise than assist him in avoiding the celebration of the sacrament in a manner contrary to the express letter of the law; and it was therefore contended that the respondent had only to make known to his congregation the difficulty in which they placed him by the practice of non-communicants remaining in the church when the celebration of the holy sacrament was about to begin, without any separation being effected between them and the communicants, for the difficulty to pass away. To this it was replied, that a clergyman has no means of doing so without violating the rubrical directions, and the judgment in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.), was relied upon to show that the details of the Communion Service could not be added to or varied by any announcement on the part of the minister without infringing the law. Various means were suggested, however, by which it might be done, and either through the churchwardens or through the pulpit or otherwise, it was said that the minister might make known his desire that if noncommunicants chose to remain in the church, the communicants should conveniently place themselves apart from the rest, so as to enable him to recognise them. The most formal method of proceeding in this direction, perhaps, would be for the clergyman to apply to

CLIFTON v. RIDSDALE.

[ARCHES.]

his ordinary, and with his leave to read out during the service a notice describing what those who intended to communicate should do to declare themselves, and thus comply with the rubric, immediately preceding the offertory, on the subject of notices to be given in church. I do not dwell further on this, or pause to decide what the respondent might best have done, because he has in fact done nothing and attempted nothing, and, further, because I am not even satisfied that he had any reasonable cause to expect that the celebration of the 4th July would be other than what it actually was. It appears, on the respondent's own evidence, that what happened on the 4th July had happened on several previous occasions; that he had taken no steps to prevent the recurrence of it, and that on leaving his cure in the hands of two other clergymen when he went abroad in August, he gave them no warning or directions, so that the same thing happened again in his absence. The possible difficulties of a position can hardly, therefore, be listened to in exculpation of one who had not been at the pains of ascertaining whether they are real difficulties or not. But now I turn to the question whether the respondent had reasonable ground to believe, or did even in fact believe, that there would be a sufficient number of communicants on the 4th July. It is impossible, I think, to read his own evidence on this head, and not perceive that he entered upon the celebration of the holy sacrament on that day without, as he states it himself on re-examination, "any positive expectation one way or the other." It is true that there were many present as to whom he did not know that they might not communicate, and as to some, he says he thought they might, but he had no belief that they would. Whatever may be said, as to whether reasonable grounds for believing that the proper number would communicate existed or not, it is clear, I think, that the respondent must establish that he did in fact believe that they would do so, before he could possibly be in a position to set up any exculpation based on the imperfect state of his own knowledge. This he failed to do. The rubric has, in my opinion, been violated, and without excuse. It will, therefore, be my duty to admonish the respondent to obey the rubric in future. The next question for the decision of the court concerns the lawfulness of the crucifix, and of the paintings called the stations of the cross, which have been set up in St. Peter's Church. The solution of these questions depends not on any single contested passage of a statute or a rubric to be construed by the court, but on the general result of the various acts of the Sovereign and the Legislature, which go to make up that momentous change in the state religion, and the ecclesiastical laws of the realm, which is known as the Reformation. The field, therefore, over which such an enquiry is capable of being pursued, is an almost unbounded one, but it does not, I think, devolve upon this court so to pursue it. For the ground has been already travelled by the appellate tribunals, in the two cases of Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.), and Phillpotts v. Boyd (L. Rep. 6 P. C. 435; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73), in which all that historical research and able argument could do to elucidate the legal propositions deducible from any inquiry of the kind, was fully and effectually done. I will state, in a few sentences, the points decided in these cases so far as they affect the present inquiry. In the case of Westerton v. Liddell, the court had to pronounce upon the legality of a cross set up in Mr. Liddell's church. And it was decided that although before the Reformation the symbol of the cross had no doubt been put to superstitious uses, "yet that crosses when used as mere emblems of the Christian faith, and not as objects of superstitious reverence, may still lawfully be erected as architectural decorations," and that the wooden cross erected in that particular case, "was to be considered a mere architectural ornament." The court determined nothing directly as to the legality of a crucifix, but was at great pains throughout the judgment to point out that crosses were to be distinguished from crucifixes, saying that "there was a wide difference between the cross and images of saints, and even, though in a less degree, between a cross and a crucifix," the former of which they said, had been "used as a symbol of Christianity two or three centuries before either crucifixes or images were introduced." I must infer, therefore, that in the opinion of the court, as declared in this case of Westerton v. Liddell, the use of the cross was only to be justified when it played the part of a mere architectural ornament, and that the views and arguments upon which that justification was based did not afford the same justification to crucifixes. In Phillpotts v. Boyd, the court, in justifying the erection of the Exeter reredos, adhered entirely and very distinctly to the position taken up in the previous case, and pronounced that erection lawful, though it included many sculptured images, on the express ground "that it had been set up for the purpose of decoration only," declaring that it was "not in danger of being abused," and that "it was not suggested that any superstitious reverence has been or is likely to be paid to any of the figures upon it." These two cases, considered together, afford to this court a sufficient guide for the principles which it is now bound to apply. All that remains is to apply them. In doing so it is necessary first to have a clear idea of what is meant by "superstitious reverence being paid," and then to ascertain whether such "reverence" is likely to be, or in danger of being, "paid" to the particular objects here complained of, or whether, on the contrary, it is established that those objects are for architectural ornament only. It will be observed that the contrast set up by the court in these cases, is between superstitious reverence on the one hand, and architectural decorations on the other; and, I cannot but think that the court considered that all figures in sculpture or painting must needs fall within one category or the other, so that if the objects and figures here in question were intended to be, or were likely to become anything more, or other than mere architectural decorations, they would be illegal as objects of "superstitious reverence." This view would at once simplify the definition of "superstitious reverence," and reduce the inquiry to the question whether the limits of mere architectural decorations have been exceeded or not. But, passing this by, and considering the matter in a more general light, I conceive that the words "superstitious reverence" or "idolatrous practices," together with the more general term "abuse," all which expressions are used indifferently by the court in Phillpotts v. Boyd are intended by the court to mean the same thing as "worship" and "adoration," which are found in the 22nd Article of Religion. This appears from the following passage in the judgment in that case: "As the Reformation proceeded, and the Articles of Religion came to receive statutory authority, the doctrine of the Church on this subject was plainly set forth. The 22nd Article of Religion declares that 'the Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping and adoration, as well of images as of reliques, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.' In other words, it condemns only the abuse of images." What, then, was this Romish doctrine? The actual worship of the graven image in place of the Deity it represents, has never, so far as I am aware, been inculcated by the Romish church. It certainly forms no part of the teachings of that church, if I may rely on the testimony produced in this case from the lips of the witness Dominic Criscitelli. The "Romish doctrine" "concerning worshipping and adoration of images," spoken of in the 22nd Article of Religion, as "a fond thing, vainly invented," must therefore be intended in that article to mean the devotion and prayer which the Roman church to this day enjoins its adherents to offer, not to images themselves, but to God, before crucifixes, images, or paintings, and the like. And it was this doctrine, together with the practices which had been found to result from it, which it was a main object of the Reformation to denounce and put away utterly from the reformed church. That I may in no wise mistake or misapprehend the doctrine of the Romish church on this matter, I will refer to the following passage from the decrees of the Council of Trent: "... Imagines porro Christi, deiparæ Virginis, et aliorum sanctorum, in templis præsertim habendas et retinendas, eisque debitum honorem, et venerationem impertiendam; non quod credatur inesse aliqua in iis divinitas, vel virtus, propter quam sint colendæ; vel quod ab eis sit aliquid petendum; vel quod fiducia in imaginibus sit figenda, veluti olim fiebat a gentibus, quæ in idolis spem suam collocabant; sed quoniam am honores, qui eis exhibitur, refertur ad prototypa quæ illæ representant; ita ut per imagines quas osculamur, et coram quibus caput aperimus, et procumbimus, Christum adoremus; et sanctos quorum illæ similitudinem gerunt, veneremur.—Sess. 25.—De Invocatione, veneratione et reliquiis sanctorum et sacris imaginibus. (Canones et decreta sacrosancti . . . Concilii Tridentini . . . Opera et Studio Jacobi Le Plat Sessio xxv, p. 280, Antwerp, 1779.) It was not, therefore, intended in the above decision of the Court of Appeal by the use of the words "superstitious reverence," "adoration," or "worship," to convey only the limited idea of a figure or object itself worshipped like a Pagan idol. On the contrary, I understand these expressions as intended to embrace the far more extended conception of adoration, worship, or reverence paid to the Deity in presence of or before those objects or figures. It may not be easy to push definition further than this, and define what it is that in any, or every case, constitutes adoration or worship in presence of an image or figure; nor is it necessary to do so; it is enough for the purpose in hand to say that it must be taken to include all and every form or degree in which the object in question is made to take a place or play a part, in the devotions which are paid to the Deity before it. It is in this sense then that I propose now to inquire whether it can fairly and reasonably be said that the figures complained of are likely to be or are in danger of being objects of "worship" or "superstitious reverence." There is no dispute as to what these figures are or where they are placed. There is a screen of open ironwork, some nine feet high, stretching across the church at the entrance to the chancel; the middle portion of this screen rises to a peak, and is surmounted by a crucifix or figure of our Saviour on the cross, in full relief, and about eighteen inches long—this is the crucifix complained of. The screen, of course, from its position directly faces the congregation, and the sculpture or moulded figure of our Lord is turned towards them. There is, further, a row of candles at distances of nearly a foot apart all along the top of the screen, which is continued up the central and rising portion of it, the last candles coming close up to the crucifix on either side, so that when the candles are lighted for the evening service, I should presume that the crucifix would stand in a full light. These candles were proved to have been lighted for the evening service on the 4th July 1875; it hardly seems that they were necessary for the purpose of lighting the church at the beginning of the service on that occasion: but, on the other hand, it appears that the gas was necessarily turned on before the service concluded, and I cannot say that it is made out to my satisfaction that the candles were not then wanted for lighting purposes. I may at once then dispose of the charge, which, though not distinctly made in the representation, was urged in argument that the position of the candles in relation to the crucifix and the manner in which they were used together constituted a ceremonial observance, and as such were not warranted by law. I hold that this charge is not made out, and I pass to the more serious consideration whether a crucifix so placed and lighted is in danger of being an object of "superstitious reverence." The best forecast of the future in most cases, but especially in those wherein the failings of mankind are concerned, is to be obtained from the experience of the past. And it was to the past that the court in Phillpotts v. Boyd emphatically appealed in justification of the Exeter reredos. In speaking of "painted representations of portions of sacred history, to be found in many of our churches," the court relied upon the circumstances that these paintings "had been proved by long experience to be capable of remaining there without giving occasion to any idolatrous or superstitious practices." Would an appeal to the experience of the past, in the case of crucifixes, bring out the same result?—or rather, it should perhaps be asked, would not the result be the very opposite? It is precisely here that, to my mind, the great difficulty presents itself in the proposal now made to sanction the restoration of so well-known an object as the crucifix to that place in our churches to which for 300 years it has been a stranger. The crucifix, as set up in our churches, has a special history of its own. Before the Reformation the "rood" was ordinarily to be found in parish churches in this country. It presented the carved, sculptured, moulded, or painted figure of Jesus Christ on the cross, and was, in fact, a "crucifix, with images at the base." (Perry's Lawful Church Ornaments, p. 247.) This figure was erected on a structure called the rood loft, which appears to have traversed the church at the entrance to the chancel; in fact, it occupied as nearly as may be the position which the iron screen in the present case does. There is in existence the most precise and unquestionable evidence on this matter, and it is to be found in the records of the Lincolnshire parishes, printed in Mr. Peacock's book on Church Furniture, and dated A.D. 1565-6. So universal does the existence of the rood in some form, either sculptured or painted, seem to have been, that in these returns of the churchwardens of upwards of 150 parishes, there is mention of the rood as having been defaced or pulled down in at least 140. It will also be found that in Bonner's Articles, put forth during the reign of Queen Mary, in the year A.D. 1554, inquiry is made "whether there be a crucifix, a rood loft, as in times past has been accustomed; and if not, where the crucifix or rood loft is become, and by whose negligence the thing want." Again, in Cardinal Pole's Articles, A.D. 1557, "... whether they have a rood in their church of decent stature, with Mary and John..." After this period, the historical evidence abounds that in the reign of Elizabeth these roods and rood lofts were destroyed far and wide as monuments of idolatry and superstition, but I am not at present concerned with that circumstance, save so far as it serves to show that they had existed, and were of general if not universal occurrence. Not only so, but in the year 1560, a discussion appears to have arisen as to the propriety of setting the roods or crucifixes up again in parish churches. In the Zurich Letters, first series, p. 67, is a letter by Bishop Jewel, dated the 4th Feb. 1560, in which he says: "This controversy about the crucifix is now at its height. ... A disputation upon the subject will take place to-morrow. ... For matters are come to that pass, that either the crosses of silver and tin, which we have everywhere broken in pieces, must be restored, or our bishoprics relinquished." In the same series, at pages 73-74, dated the 1st April, in the same year, is a letter of Bishop Sandys, in which is the following passage: "We had not long since a controversy respecting images. The Queen's Majesty considered it not contrary to the Word of God, nay, rather for the advantage of the church, that the image of Christ crucified, together with Mary and John, should be placed, as heretofore, in some conspicuous part of the church, where they might more readily be seen by all the people. Some of us thought far otherwise, and more especially as all images of every kind were, at our last visitation, not only taken down, but also burnt, and that too by public authority; and because the ignorant and superstitious multitude are in the habit of paying adoration to this idol above all others. ... God ... delivered the Church of England from stumbling-blocks of this kind." From all this it is plain that the crucifix formed an ordinary feature in the parish church before the Reformation; and it cannot be doubted that it did so, not as a mere architectural adornment, but as an object of reverence and adoration. If any proof was required of this proposition, it may be found in the fact that the worship of it was enjoined in the Sarum Use, the missal most largely accepted and used in England before the Reformation. This was especially the case on Palm Sunday. In the order of service for that day, given in the Sarum Missal, a very elaborate service ended with the adoration of the "rood" by the celebrant and choir, before passing into the chancel. Such is, most briefly, the part played by the "rood" or crucifix in English churches in the past. If set up again in them now, what part is it likely to play in the future? It is no doubt easy to say, What proof is there of danger of idolatry now? What facts are there to point to a probability of abuse? But when the court is dealing with a well-known sacred object—an object enjoined and put up by authority in all the churches of England before the Reformation, in a particular part of the church, and for the particular purpose of "adoration"—when the court finds that the same object, both in the church and out of it, is still worshipped by those who adhere to the unreformed Romish faith, and when it is told that, now, after a lapse of 300 years, it is suddenly proposed to set up again this same object in the same part of the church as an architectural ornament only, it is hard not to distrust the uses to which it may come to be put, or escape the apprehension that what begins in "decoration" may end in "idolatry." If this apprehension is a just and reasonable one, then there exists that likelihood and danger of "superstitious reverence" which the Privy Council, in Phillipotts v. Boyd, pronounced to be fatal to the lawfulness of all images and figures set up in a church. Before concluding that it is so, let me pass in review the arguments urged in favour of the opposite side of the question. I will place, first among them the consideration, forcibly pressed on the court, that the times we live in are not as the times before or at the period of the Reformation; that images and figures which gave occasion then for "unhealthy minds" to abuse, "we, in our more extended knowledge, may be permitted to use with safety." That there is a wide difference in the state of knowledge, and still more in the degree of its general diffusion, between the 19th and the 16th centuries will not be denied; but is it equally certain that superstition has waned in proportion as the light of intellectual culture has advanced, and that the ground gained by the one has been lost by the other? Is it really so absurd, as it was argued to be, to imagine that in the present day the worship of lifeless images and figures, not as idols, perhaps, but as aids to devotion, should again prevail as in old times? The fear that it should be so may be unfounded, but I question whether intellectual culture can be relied upon as a safeguard against it; for, if so, what is to be said of the Romish church and of those able and distinguished men who, in our own day, have not hesitated to join it and accept its doctrines. What I am here discussing, I must again repeat, is not the belief in an idol of wood or stone, but the practice of involving in devotional exercises outward and visible forms, as inculcated in the devotional books of the Roman Catholic creed. This is the "fond thing vainly invented" of the 22nd Article of Religion; and the mere fact of the existence of such a doctrine in that church, among whose members high intellectual power and acquirement is rife, is, to my mind, a conclusive answer to the suggestion that the intellect or knowledge of the present day may be relied upon to take the place of those safeguards which it was the work of the Reformation to establish. But another consideration must not be lost sight of. If the intelligent and the cultivated no longer need the protection of old days, can the same be said of the weak and ignorant? The parish church is for all—not for a class—and if the crucifix, placed as it is in this instance, is lawful for St. Peter's Church, it is lawful for every parish church in the country, and may be provided for every congregation—strong-minded or weak—instructed or ignorant. Let it be considered to what such a state of things as that would be likely to lead. If devotion to our Lord comes to be habitually paid immediately before a sculptured figure of his body on the cross, which arrests the eye and occupies the imagination while the mind is in attitude of prayer, it may be easy to some, and possible to many, but hardly possible to all, to wholly dissociate the outward object from the inward prayer, and exclude it from playing any part in that devotion. The immediate presence before the eye of an outward form or object proffers an assistance, though of a spurious kind, towards fixing wavering thoughts and exciting religious fervour, which can hardly be rejected by those who most feel the want of it, and to whom all abstract thought is a difficult exercise. When there cease to be any such, the peril may cease also; but, until then, it is impossible, I think, to accept the alleged robust temper of the present times as a safeguard against so obvious a temptation. Another argument urged for the respondent was this, that crosses had been as much abused and worshipped before the Reformation as crucifixes, and are therefore as much in danger of abuse now, and yet crosses were by the court, in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.), held not to be unlawful as ornaments. I will only say on this head of argument that the court in that case were of a different opinion; that for reasons which they considered sufficient, they distinguished crucifixes from crosses in this respect, and that if they had been unable to do so, there is nothing to show that, in their judgment, either crosses or crucifixes would have been lawful ornaments. A further objection was then taken that if the delineation of the crucifixion in sculpture may not be lawfully set up in a church, the same thing must be equally true of a picture in a painted window, exhibiting a similar figure. It is not to be doubted that, in many churches (and in the notable instance of St. Margaret's Church, at Westminster, where the window is of great age), representations of the crucifixion in painted glass or paintings are to be found, and I am not prepared to offer any definition which should draw a sharp line of distinction between such decorations and a crucifix. Indeed, I doubt whether any narrower or more exact definition of what is lawful and what unlawful, can, for practical purposes, be framed, than that which is set forth in the case of Phillipotts v. Boyd. But, adhering to that decision, and each case standing on its own circumstances, it is, I think, to be presumed that the Court of Appeal would not hesitate to adjudge even painted windows, or paintings portraying the same subject, to be unlawful if it was satisfied from the mode in which the subject was treated, the place which they occupied, or other incidents in the surrounding circumstances, that they were in real danger of adoration, worship, or superstitious reverence. So long as they are free from this charge, and fulfil no other function but that of fitly decorating the church, they are free from objection—the moment that, from any cause, whether residing in the objects themselves, or arising among those who worship in the church, the danger of their adoration is made manifest, I conceive that they cease to be innocent, and fall under the charge of illegality. Up to this point I have considered only the reasons which lead to a conclusion that this crucifix is likely to invite "superstitious reverence." I will now say a few words on the alternative proposition that it is intended only, and is likely to serve only, as an architectural decoration. Viewing the matter in this light, the remark naturally arises that this particular figure of the crucifix, while it may be justly said to stand highest among the representatives of gospel history in its fitness for the purposes of adoration or worship, must surely be admitted to occupy a very inferior place among the subjects adapted for the display of mere architectural beauty. In association with other figures, and as embodying the scene of the crucifixion, it has no doubt been the subject of artistic treatment; but by itself, as it appears here in this church, standing alone without incidents or adjuncts, it is a subject which, however, artistically treated, might be so well spared in the mere decoration of churches, that it is not easy to conceive that it should be selected solely for that purpose. Upon the whole, then, I must declare that the crucifix surmounting the screen, in this case, has not been shown, to my satisfaction, to have been set up as an architectural decoration only, and that there does exist a danger and a likelihood that it may be the object of "adoration" and "superstitious reverence." This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider whether its erection was originally covered by the faculty which was obtained for the iron screen; and the court must now order it to be removed; but a removal of the figure, leaving the cross standing, will be a compliance with this order. It remains to deal with the "stations of the cross." They are described in the representation as "figures in coloured relief of a plastic material, attached to the walls of the church, purporting to represent scenes of our Lord's Passion, and such as are commonly used in Roman Catholic churches." It was not denied that this general description of them is a correct one. More particularly they are a set of fourteen separate groups, affecting to delineate the sufferings of our Lord, commencing with His judgment and condemnation, and ending with His crucifixion and burial. The first objection taken to them I must hold to be a fatal one, namely, that they constitute "an addition to the fabric ornaments or furniture of the church" within the meaning of the statute, and have been set up in the church by the respondent "without lawful authority," no faculty having been either granted or applied for to justify their erection. The law which requires that those who wish to fix or set up any new decoration in a church must apply to the proper authorities for a faculty before they do so, is very salutary and ought to be upheld. It serves as a safeguard against the introduction of many objectionable things into the church, which apathy or want of vigilance on the part of the parishioners might, in many instances, facilitate, and it maintains the principle, which is a wholesome one, that the structure and ornament of the church is not to be meddled with except upon due consideration and lawful authority. It is upon this ground, therefore, that I shall order their removal. But the representation further alleges that they are "decorations forbidden by law," and as they now stand I think they are. It is needless to enter into the history of this set of pictures. Whatever origin they or some of them had, it is clear that the three falls of Christ under the cross, and the legend of S. Véronique, have no warrant in gospel history. It is also clearly established by the two devotional books put in evidence, The Crown of Jesus, published under the authority of Cardinal Wiseman and four Roman Catholic archbishops in Ireland; and the Key of Heaven, by S. Alphonsus Liguari; that these fourteen representatives are to the present day authorized objects of adoration in that church. In the Crown of Jesus, p. 421, the following instruction appears: "Devotion to the passion of our Lord is a singular special means of grace. The great means of impressing the devotion profoundly on the soul is the holy mass, the holy rosary, and the stations of the cross. You should endeavour to make the stations of the cross every week. The church encourages this practice by the greatest indulgences. Every time that in a state of grace you go round the stations of the cross, kneeling before each (or if the crowd be great simply turning and kneeling towards each), and with a truly contrite heart meditate on each stage of our Lord's Passion, as represented in the Via Crucis, you have it in your power, even without Communion, and without any additional special prayers, to obtain several plenary indulgences for yourself, as also for the poor souls in purgatory. . . . In making the following stations, the same indulgences are gained as if they were made at Jerusalem on the very spot where our Saviour suffered." Then there follow a set of prayers for each station, with direction at what part of them the worshipper is to kneel. These extracts sufficiently show the character and objects of the pictures in question, as used among Roman Catholics; the respondent puts them up in a church of the Church of England, and asks the court to say that they are architectural decorations only, and of a lawful character. I think they are neither. Some of them, if they stood alone dissociated from the rest, such, for instance, as the Judgment of Pilate, may be unobjectionable in themselves, whilst others, such as the three falls of Christ under the cross, and the fable of S. Véronique, whether they stand alone or not, may be held objectionable in themselves; but the entire set, viewed as a whole and in their relation to their well-known history, must be regarded, I think, as likely (if not intended) to be used for the purposes for which they always have been used, and not for the mere purpose of decorating the church. I shall, therefore, as I have above said, order their removal, leaving it open to the respondent, if he shall desire it, to apply for a faculty to authorise the introduction into his church of such of them as may turn out to be free from objection. It will be observed that in dealing with the question of lawfulness, both as regards these stations of the cross and crucifix, I have hitherto excluded from view all conclusions to be drawn from the manner in which the respondent has been in the habit of conducting the services of his church. At the same time it is obvious enough that the probability of both the crucifix and the stations of the cross being turned to superstitious uses, is largely augmented by the fact that they have been set up by a clergyman who celebrates the Holy Communion with a mixed chalice and wafer bread, and with a "biretta" on his head, accompanies a procession round his church with banners, crosses, and acolytes in red cassocks, in apparent imitation of the Church of Rome. But the structure or ornament of a church is more or less a thing of permanence, while the ministrations of a particular clergyman are more or less temporary, and if sound objections exist, as I think they do in this case, to the objects complained of, in themselves, those objections constitute the best, because the most permanent basis for their condemnation and removal. I will only add that I have endeavoured in the above conclusions rightly to interpret and apply the decisions of the Appellate Court on this grave subject, in their spirit as well as their letter. I say grave subject, for no one can doubt that the slightest return to the use of graven images or pictures as an aid to prayer or a spur to devotion, would be justly regarded as a surrender of principles, vindicated at high cost in the Reformation, and dear to the people of this country. On the other hand it would be a matter of no small concern if any needless restriction or prudery of apprehension should serve to check the generous piety of those who have laboured to restore what the hand of time had defaced; to undo the work of Puritan excess, to repair the ravages of neglect, and enhance the outward beauty of the house of God. It is between these alternative evils that the decisions of the Appellate Court appear to me to be designed to occupy a safe position. It may be that, in some cases, the line of severance between the "mere decoration" which is free from harm and the "superstitious reverence" which is full of peril, may be difficult to draw or uncertain to maintain. I do not think it is so in this case, but if I deceive myself in that belief there remains the obvious reflection that a false step in one direction is likely to be fraught with evils far greater than any that can ensue from an error committed in the other. If sculptured figures or pictures are once set up in our churches, and sustained by the law, to which (whether from the natural tendencies and weaknesses of the human mind on this subject, or from the teachings of books, or the promptings of individuals), adoration or superstitious reverence should, contrary to expectation, come to be paid, an irreparable step towards idolatry may prove to have been taken; for the outward object once sanctioned, the inward devotion is beyond the reach of laws. In the opposite direction I can discern no evil comparable to this. The range of decoration and artistic design is practically without a limit, and, in the profusion of choice, the loss by prohibition of any special figures or objects can at no time be more than faintly felt, and can at all times be easily repaired. As the judgment of the court is on all the charges in favour of the complainants, the respondent must pay the costs of these proceedings.

CLIFTON v. RIDSDALE.

[ARCHES.]

From so much of the decree as related to the eastward position of the celebrant at the Holy Communion, the distinctive vestments worn by the respondent at the said service, bread to be used thereat, and the illegality of the crucifix, the respondent appealed to the Queen in Council.

Feb. 26.—W. G. F. Phillimore moved the Dean of Arches to suspend the execution of the monition in respect of the above four points, pending the appeal, and referred to sect. 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, and r. 24 of the Order in Council relating to that Act.

Shaw opposed the motion on behalf of the complainants, and referred to Walford v. Walford (L. Rep. 3 Ch. 812; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S., 233).

Lord PENZANCE.—I must say I think it would be a great misfortune if I were bound by any view of the justice of this case to accede to this application. One of the evils that existed before the late Act was the grievance that, when the Court of Arches had decided the thing to be lawful or unlawful, appeal was had to the Queen in Council, and the immediate effect of that appeal was to stay the hand of the inferior court, so that the decisions of the court never could have any effect until a great length of time had elapsed, and until very great expense had been incurred. Reference has been had to what happens in other courts. It is now, as Mr. Shaw has very properly said, under the Judicature Act, the universal practice in all the courts, that the court appealed from should be able to hold its hand over the circumstances under which the appeal should go on, and that it should have the discretion to suspend the operation of its own judgment or decree in proper cases, but that where such circumstances do not exist as to render it a proper case for that suspension, the rule should be that the decree of the inferior court should go forward. That was the practice in the Probate Court under the Probate Act, it was the practice of the courts of equity, and in some cases it was the practice of the courts of law, but now, by the Judicature Acts, it is the practice of all the courts in Westminster Hall. To that extent the analogy of other courts is a thing to look to. But the circumstances under which other courts think it right to stay the execution of the decree of the inferior court will be of very little assistance to this court, owing to the very different nature of the matters involved. Therefore I do not hold with the proposition that because courts of equity lay down the rule—if they do lay it down—that irreparable injury must be done before they will stay the decree, that this court should take the same principle as its guide. I think that the principle, and the only principle, if it can be called a principle, which is to be adopted is that the court in each case should consider the whole of the circumstances, the amount of actual injury, the amount of grievance to people's feelings, the circumstances under which the alleged offence has been committed, the state of the law in previous cases, and a variety of other circumstances, in fact every circumstance that could bear upon the matter—that the court should take all that into its consideration, and then, if special grounds are shown to exist, that it should hold its hand until the Superior Court has had cognisance of the case. That I believe, is the only principle which can be laid down for the exercise of the power confided to this court by the late Act of Parliament. Then the question is, whether in this case any special grounds have been shown. The respondent in the present case has been in the habit of conducting the services of his church in direct contravention of the law as settled by the Supreme Tribunal in the last case that came before it. I do not know whether I may assume, from his appealing only in respect to certain points, that he is prepared to yield obedience to the law upon those points as to which he has not appealed; I hope I may; but in the cases in which he has appealed he now asks upon no special grounds—except that he still maintains that these matters are not illegal, which is a proposition that everybody maintains in such cases—that he should be allowed to continue the services in a way which the Supreme Court of Appeal has declared to be illegal, until he can have the opportunity, if the court permits him that opportunity, of questioning again in that court its own decision and inducing it to revoke the conclusion at which it previously arrived. Now, that seems to me a very unreasonable thing to ask. I think he should obey the law as it stands. I think he should perform the services of the church as the Supreme Court of Appeal has declared they ought to be performed, and then he will come with clean hands at least to the Superior Court, saying, I have been obedient to the law up to the present time, and I ask you to allow me to open the question again which you have previously decided, and to endeavour to persuade you if I can that you on a former occasion came to a wrong decision. That applies to three of the four points in respect of which alone there is an appeal. The fourth point is as to a decision of this court of a novel character relating to a point which has not been decided before. Now, upon that matter, I will say this, that I think this court, like all inferior courts, ought not by any means to assume that its own judgment will ultimately be affirmed, and, therefore, if any decision is given in this court upon which an order issues which may be very painful to the consciences of those against whom it is directed, I can conceive cases in which it would be very proper indeed that that order should be withheld, or its operation suspended until the Superior Court has had an opportunity of declaring whether it was justified or not; but in this case I can conceive no difficulty of that kind, because the order here is to take off from the crucifix the figure which, as has been very properly pointed out by counsel, was proved in the case not to be a part of the same structure as the cross, but to have been distinct from it, and screwed upon the cross; it therefore can be detached without the slightest difficulty, it also can be detached and removed without doing injury to the religious feelings, scruples, or consciences of anybody, because we must always recollect that the respondent maintains that this figure is a mere architectural decoration, and if it is only a decoration of the church, the loss of that decoration for the period during which this case is under appeal, is not a matter that really could wound the most sensitive conscience. Viewing this figure, therefore, in the light in which the respondent views it, it seems to me that there is no pretence for applying to the court on any special ground as to the injury that would be done to people's feelings, or to the structure of the Church, by the removal of the figure, until the Court of Appeal shall have determined, if it does determine, that it may lawfully be put up again. Therefore, going through the items of the respondent's appeal, looking at the circumstances in which they stand, looking particularly to the state of the law as it now is settled by the supreme tribunal in these matters, and not throwing aside or being unaware of the strong feeling that exists upon many of these subjects, I still think it plain that the respondent ought to obey the law as he now finds it, and that, until he can succeed in reversing it he ought to be content to conduct the services of the church in accordance with the judgment that the Privy Council have already delivered. The power confided to this court under the section of the Act to which allusion has been made (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85, s. 9), is one that ought to be sparingly applied—it is one that ought to be applied only where very special circumstances exist, and as, in my opinion, no such circumstances exist in this case, I must reject the application. The application is rejected with costs.

GREEN v. THE QUEEN.

[H. OF L.]

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER IN ENGLAND.

Private Act of Parliament—Existing rights abrogated by general words—Election of churchwardens—New parishes for ecclesiastical purposes—Stat. 10 Vict. c. iii., sect. 5.

As a general rule existing customs or rights cannot be taken away by general affirmative words in an Act of Parliament, but if the affirmative words of the Act are clear and precise, and the right in question cannot co-exist or stand with them, it may be abrogated without express words.

The parish of D. consisted of four townships, D., W., B., and M. The parish church was in D., and churchwardens were appointed at D. in the usual manner, who acted for the whole parish except M., where there was a chapel, and a special custom that the parishioners should elect two churchwardens to act for the hamlet of M. A private Act of Parliament was passed to divide the parish into three, D. and W. to be one parish, B. another, and M. a third. The Act contained a provision that after the contemplated division had taken effect, two persons should be chosen churchwardens for each of the new parishes, "in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed for the said parish of D."

Held (reversing the decision of the court below), that the object of the Act being to create three entirely new parishes for ecclesiastical purposes, formed upon the model of the mother parish of D., the previous right of the parishioners of M. to elect both churchwardens was taken away.

This was a proceeding in error from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which had reversed a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, upon a return to a writ of mandamus. The facts of the case were shortly as follows: The parish of Doddington, in Cambridgeshire, comprised the four townships of Doddington, Wimblington, Benwick, and March. The parish was of very large extent, comprising nearly 37,000 acres, with a population of more than 9000 people. In 1847 a private Act of Parliament (10 Vict. c. iii) was passed, at the instance of the then patrons of the living, to sub-divide the parish into three, Doddington and Wimblington to be one, Benwick another, and March the third. The division was to take effect upon the death of the then incumbent, which took place in 1868. The four townships were quite distinct from one another for all civil purposes, and the Act only constituted them separate parishes "for all ecclesiastical purposes," and contained a clause, sect. 44, preserving all civil rights. By sect. 5, it was provided, that when the division should have taken effect "two fit and proper persons shall be chosen churchwardens for each such parish, at the same time, and in the same manner, as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed for the said parish of Doddington;" and that the new rectors should have "the same powers, privileges, rights, and immunities as the present rector of Doddington." At the date of the Act vestries were held at Doddington, where the parish church was, at which two churchwardens were appointed, one by the rector and the other by the parishioners, in the usual common law manner, under the name of the churchwardens of Doddington, who acted for the whole parish except the hamlet of March. At March there was a chapel, and vestries were held there, in which the inhabitants of the rest of the parish never interfered, in which two churchwardens for the hamlet of March were elected by the parishioners. This right had been the subject of previous litigation, and had been established by a verdict at the Cambridgeshire Assizes in 1782. In 1868 the plaintiff in error, Mr. Green, was appointed to the new rectory of March, and claimed the right of appointing one churchwarden. The parishioners resisted the claim, and writ of mandamus was issued commanding him to convene a meeting for the election of two churchwardens by the parishioners. To this writ a return was made, and by consent it was turned into a special case, which is fully set out in the report in the court below.

Upon argument, the Court of Queen's Bench (Blackburn and Archibald, JJ.) gave judgment for the defendant, and against the claim of the parishioners, Quain, J. dissenting, as reported in 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255. The case was carried to the Exchequer Chamber, and the decision of the Queen's Bench was reversed by Bramwell, Cleasby, Pollock, and Amphlett, BB., Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, and Denman, JJ. dissenting: (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 543.)

Error was then brought to the House of Lords.

Prideaux, Q.C. and McIntyre, Q.C., for the appellant, argued that the intention of the statute was to put the three parishes on one footing, making Doddington the model, and that the customs existing in March, while it was a mere hamlet, were put an end to. The Rector of March was to be just in the position that the Rector of Doddington had been in. They referred to Bulwer, Q.C. and F. M. White, for the respondent, contended that the parishioners could not be deprived of an express right by general words in a private Act of Parliament in which they had no part: (Co. Litt. 115a.) They also cited Bacon's Abridgment, Tit "Churchwardens," A.; Com. Dig. "Parliament," E. 23.

Prideaux, Q.C. in reply.

At the conclusion of the argument, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, the appeal in this case arises out of a proceeding by way of mandamus, in which the appellant, the rector of a parish in the diocese of Ely called March, contends that he has the right, in the ordinary way, of appointing one of the churchwardens of the parish. Those who have applied for the mandamus, on the other hand, claim that the parishioners have the right of appointing both the churchwardens. That question must be solved by reference to a private Act of Parliament, which was passed in the year 1847, and in point of fact to one clause of that Act. The circumstances under which that Act of Parliament was obtained were these [his Lordship then went through the clauses of the Act, and the facts, as set out in the special case, and continued]. Now these being the facts, as to which there appears to be really no dispute, let me ask your Lordships to consider whether they make any alteration in the construction of the Act of Parliament, which, after all, must be the guiding rule by which we have to determine the present case. The learned judges in the court below, who have decided in opposition to the appellant, apply these facts, as it appears to me, in two ways. In the first place they apply them in the positive construction, if I may use the expression, of the 5th section, and that I will consider in a moment. They also apply them in another way. They say: You have here a custom established in the hamlet of March for the parishioners of that part of the parish to choose officers, who are called their churchwardens. That custom they set a value upon to such an extent, that in the middle of the last century they had it established by proceedings at law. You cannot suppose, say the learned judges, that a custom of this kind is to be taken away by an Act of Parliament without express words, and if there be no express words taking away the custom, it must be held to remain. I will say a word upon the second of these arguments first. I have to remark upon it that there is no doubt that, as a general rule, customs, or rights of a similar description are not to be taken away by inference, or without distinct words. But the error, as it appears to me, which the learned judges have fallen into upon this point is this: This custom was a custom connected with and attaching to the hamlet or chapelry of March, quâd hamlet or chapelry. The Act of Parliament does not continue the hamlet or chapelry of March. If it did, it might well be said that incidents of this kind were continued along with it. The Act of Parliament makes, ecclesiastically speaking, a tabula rasa of the whole of the ecclesiastical arrangements within the area of the old parish of Doddington, and having made that tabula rasa it proceeds to erect and to create three new well-known and clear ecclesiastical divisions, namely, parishes or rectories, within the old area; and, creating these three new ecclesiastical divisions, it enacts that each of them is to be created after the pattern of the old and entire rectory, and that each new rectory is to have the incidents of the old one. It therefore ceases to be a question as to whether a custom attaching to the old chapelry or hamlet of March is or is not taken away by express words. The hamlet itself, as an ecclesiastical division, disappears; the thing is gone, that to which the custom attached is no longer in existence, and therefore that has been done by the Act of Parliament which is much stronger than the abolition of a custom by express words: that is abolished upon which alone the custom could exist, and to which alone it could apply. It only remains to apply the facts thus derived from the special case to the 5th section in the way in which the majority of the learned judges of the court below propose to apply them. This is the mode in which the judges of the court below apply them. I will read again the words of the 5th section. [His Lordship read the section.] Now, say the learned judges who have decided against the appellant, the meaning of that is this: Your new churchwardens, in a new parish, for example, of March, are to be chosen in the same way as churchwardens were appointed in any part of the old parish. In the old parish there were churchwardens appointed at Doddington, and in the old parish there were churchwardens appointed at March, and this is a cumulative expression that new churchwardens are to be appointed throughout the whole area, as former churchwardens were appointed throughout the whole area. If you find that in one part of the old area churchwardens were appointed in one way, and in another part of the old area in another way, when you make your new divisions you are in each new division to appoint your new churchwardens as nearly as possible in the way in which churchwardens were appointed in that particular area. That is the argument of the learned judges. But your Lordships will perceive that the argument proceeds altogether on a fallacy, or rather, I should say, on an interpolation into the Act of Parliament of a word which does not occur there, and the excision from the Act of Parliament of a word which is there. The learned judges substitute for the plain expression, "in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed for the said parish of Doddington," the words "in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed in the said parish of Doddington." But what says the case? The case, which binds both parties, says, "Separate churchwardens were appointed at the Doddington vestries by the names of the churchwardens for the parish of Doddington." Is it to be said that you ought to alter the wording of the Act of Parliament in this important way, and that having words describing an office in apposite and proper terms, "churchwardens for the parish," you are to alter that expression, and say that it points to any person who in the parish is appointed a churchwarden, although he be not one of the churchwardens for the parish, but a churchwarden for March? Nothing could be more violent than that construction. But what say the learned judges to the second part of that section? "The rector of each of the said new rectories exercising the same rights and powers in the appointment of such churchwardens or one of them as the rector of the said rectory of Doddington now exercises." Say the learned judges : That means that if the rector has no power he is not to exercise any power. But if that had been the intention of the Act of Parliament, the expression ought to have been, "The rector of the new rectory of Doddington retaining the same right and power in the appointment of churchwardens for that rectory as he now exercises." That would have been a clear and distinct way of expressing what would, according to the supposition, have been meant. The learned judges absolutely reduce to silence, quoad March, the second part of this section, and make it altogether inapplicable. Looking at the Act of Parliament, apart from the statements in the special case, I feel no doubt that the construction does not give to the parishioners the right of appointing both the churchwardens; and, looking at the statements in the special case, and applying them to the Act of Parliament, I cannot find anything in those statements which should alter the plain and natural construction of the Act. I therefore submit to your Lordships that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench is correct, and the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber erroneous, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the case depends entirely upon the meaning of the words of the 5th section of the Act for dividing the parish and rectory of Doddington into three separate and distinct parishes and rectories. In construing the Act, the object of it must constantly be kept in mind. It was to put an end to the existing parish of Doddington, and to create out of different parts of it three entirely new parishes. It was, of course, absolutely necessary to make provision for the performance of parochial functions, and the appointment of new parochial offices in the new parishes. The Act evidently intended that the three new parishes should be similar in all respects, unless otherwise provided, and that they should be formed upon the model of the parish of Doddington, out of which they were taken. There is nothing throughout the Act to show that the new parish of March was intended to be distinguished in any respect from the other newly-constituted parishes. But it was argued for the respondents, that as before the Act there was a custom in March to choose persons who were called, though improperly, "churchwardens," the rector of Doddington never interfering in such appointment, the words in the 5th section "in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed for the parish of Doddington," must be read as not comprehending March, which ought to be regarded as having been intended to be left in this matter visu statu quo. But the separate appointment of wardens for March, and the non-interference of the churchwardens of Doddington with their functions, have nothing whatever to do with the manner of choosing and appointing churchwardens for Doddington, which are the words of reference to the appointment of churchwardens in the new parishes; they amount, at the utmost, to evidence of the extent of the powers and duties of the churchwardens of Doddington after their appointment. Under the Act the old chapelry and township of March is put an end to, and it appears to me that everything connected with it in this character, its incidents, privileges, and customs, is abolished. And I cannot imagine, if their appointment of churchwardens was intended to be preserved, that this should not have been expressly provided for. A new parish is created instead of the old chapelry, and this must necessarily have the effect of changing its character, in respect at least to parochial officers. A rector, too, is placed over the new parish, who is clothed by the Act with the same powers, privileges, rights, and immunities as belong to, and are exercised by, the rector of Doddington. Now there can be no doubt that the rector of Doddington had a right to intervene in the choice of churchwardens; and the 5th section of the Act provides for the choice of churchwardens in the manner in which they are chosen in the parish of Doddington, the rector of each of the new rectories exercising the same rights and powers in the appointment of churchwardens as the rector of Doddington now exercises. It is said that this provision is obscure, but I confess it is, to my mind, perfectly clear. We are referred by the Act to the manner in which churchwardens are chosen in the parish of Doddington, and the rights exercised by the rector of Doddington in the appointment of them. When these are ascertained, and there is no doubt about them, they are applicable to the new rectories and the new rectors. As I have already observed no separate notice is taken of March throughout the Act, which seems to lead fairly to the conclusion that it was intended to be placed as to the appointment of churchwardens, and in all other respects, on the same footing as the other new parishes, all of them being established upon the model of the parish of Doddington. The argument for the exception of March from the provision as to the appointment of churchwardens is founded merely on implication, which cannot, in my opinion, prevail against the rights expressly and clearly conferred upon the rector in the choice of churchwardens in the same manner as upon the other newly-created rectors by the 5th section of the Act. I agree with my noble and learned friend, that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be reversed.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I have come to the same conclusion after hearing the very able arguments of counsel at the Bar, and after very seriously considering the opinions of the learned judges who have so remarkably differed in their construction of this clause; for the case depends almost entirely upon one clause, namely, the 5th clause of the Act of 1847. From a very early period of the argument it appeared to me that, looking at the Act alone, and especially at the wording of the 5th clause, without regarding any of what may be called the accompanying circumstances under which the Act was passed, there could scarcely be any doubt as to what the construction of the Act must be, namely, that it intended for the future, after the new parishes were constituted, the election and appointment of churchwardens should be such as took place, and had always taken place, in the parish of Doddington. But I was struck, I confess, during the argument also by the observations of the learned judges to the effect that it was necessary to consider whether any other construction was open, and, if so, whether under the circumstances that attended the passing of the Act of Parliament that other construction ought to take effect. It was urged with considerable force by some of those learned judges who expressed an opinion contrary to that which I now hold, that this being a private Act of Parliament, passed without the usual summoning of the persons who might be supposed to take an interest in the passing of the Act, and there having been a litigation some sixty years before with reference to the election of churchwardens at this very place, March, in relation to the controversy which now exists, it could not be supposed that it was the intention of the Act to alter by indirect means the rights which had been ascertained and declared as between the rector and the inhabitants as to the appointment of churchwardens; and that if another construction, therefore, could possibly be put upon the clause, that construction was the one which we should be justified in placing upon it, in preference to anything which would appear to work an injustice on the part of the Legislature towards persons whose rights had within a comparatively recent period been ascertained after dispute. Now I find in the Act we are construing the usual saving clause which one would expect to find there with regard to all persons interested in the advowson, and in the proprietary right which the patron would have in the advowson. Their interests are all saved. But there is another clause which is important as a saving clause, and which shows the scope and frame of the Act in its entirety. That clause is the 44th, by which it is provided, "that nothing in this Act contained shall make any alteration in the division of the said parish of Doddington into townships or divisions for the maintenance of the poor, or in any civil purpose whatsoever relating to the present parish of Doddington." The Legislature, therefore, tells you what is intended to be done by this Act, namely, that the Act was passed for what we may call a purely ecclesiastical purpose, and that all civil rights are intended to be in this manner saved, unless, indeed, as might possibly occur, and, as it has been argued before us, it may be said in a sense to occur, with regard to the appointment of churchwardens, it should be found that any civil right was affected by the construction which one felt oneself bound to put upon the Act. And I find in the preamble that which corresponds entirely with the view which I attribute to the Legislature in inserting in the 44th clause a protection of the civil rights of all persons within the parish. Therefore, one sees that being passed for ecclesiastical purposes the object of the Act could not affect prejudicially the civil rights of the inhabitants. It was an Act passed very largely for the benefit of the inhabitants of this unwieldy district, and large benefits are, in fact, conferred. You find that a provision is made in the Act, with the concurrence of the patron and of the bishop, for establishing in this large district of March, which up to that time had had only a licensed curate residing within the boundary of the township, and had been separated by a distance of about four miles from the parish church, for establishing in that district, and in a third district, which is also created, a permanent and resident rector instead of a licensed curate. Now, when your lordships look to another clause in the Act, you form some idea of the means which were considered to be required for effectuating these purposes, because although power is given to borrow on the advowson considerable sums of money for the purpose of erecting a church at Benwick, and parsonage houses both at Benwick and in March, you find that the Legislature thought fit, by the 29th section, to set a limit upon the expenditure for these purposes, and that limit is mentioned at 1150*l*. What, therefore, was the object of the Act? I think some of the learned judges scarcely had that sufficiently before their minds. The main object of the Act was the better instruction and better pastoral care of the inhabitants of the whole of this large district, comprising four townships, and to provide for that by means of a rector residing in each of the new districts, instead of one rector superintending, as he had done up to that time, the whole of the larger parish, to provide for his residence there by means of a house which was to be built for him. Finding that, you are not surprised when you come to the other clauses of the Act to find that in constituting these parishes the Legislature provides that the parishes should be constituted with a system, and with a staff, if I may so express it, which should place them in the position of wholly independent new parishes. These three districts are accordingly, by means of the Act, constituted into three separate and distinct parishes for all ecclesiastical purposes, without the invasion of any civil rights. That being done, coming to the 5th clause with that view, we must consider in the first place its natural meaning, and see if it should by any means be diverted or explained into a somewhat unnatural construction by having regard to the state of circumstances which existed at the time of the passing of the Act. The enactment itself relates to the time when the division into separate parishes shall have taken effect. The first part of clause 5 does not speak of churchwardens being "chosen and appointed," but says "chosen." But in a subsequent passage the same clause says "in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed." I do not think that that difference of expression can be construed as giving any different effect to the first part of the clause as distinguished from the second part. With regard to Doddington township proper there never could be any doubt, and there has been none raised in the course of the inquiry as to the mode of constituting churchwardens, yet that township is included in the phrase "shall be chosen churchwardens." The mode of constituting churchwardens pointed at in the latter part of the sentence was by means of election and appointment, that is to say, that if the rector and the parishioners agreed they would be appointed, but if they differed the rector would have to appoint one of them, and the parishioners to elect the other. The two churchwardens are to be appointed for the new parish "at the same time and in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed for the said parish of Doddington." Now I think upon all the documents it is quite clear that the churchwardens for Doddington were the churchwardens whom the parishioners elected in concurrence with the rector, if they did concur, or of whom the parishioners elected one, and the rector appointed one, if there was a difference of opinion between him and the parishioners. No other set of people can be taken to have been churchwardens for Doddington. Indeed, I asked the question during the argument, although I felt pretty sure it could be only answered in one way. The natural and original course would be that the mother church would have its own churchwardens as churchwardens for the whole of the rectory, that is to say, the whole of this huge parish of Doddington. By degrees, no doubt, it might well be that it came to pass that they confined their operations to the township of Doddington, because there existed a chapel in another remote part of this large parish in which certain persons were elected to be churchwardens, who appear only to have repaired that chapel, and never to have acted by way of making a rate in the general parish of Doddington. I have no doubt whatever that when you find the words "churchwardens for the parish of Doddington" in the Act, there being nothing to compete with that interpretation, you must take it to mean the churchwardens for the whole parish of Doddington, as far as their name was concerned, and as far as their original functions were concerned, however much those original functions may have been altered subsequently. At all events it is clear that whether you take them to have been churchwardens for the whole parish of Doddington, or churchwardens for the township, they were not churchwardens for March, as separate and distinct from the township of Doddington proper. Nor certainly were the churchwardens of March at any time whatever, either popularly or legally, the churchwardens for Doddington. Therefore, the plain interpretation of the clause is only one, that the churchwardens shall be elected as the churchwardens for Doddington were. That is the plain and only interpretation; and the words which follow appear to me to make it still plainer, because the end of the clause says that the rector of each of the new rectories is to exercise "the same rights and powers in the appointment of such churchwardens, or one of them, as the rector of the said rectory of Doddington now exercises." It appears to me to be plain that that can only point to this, that when the parish is divided into three parts, the rights of the rectors of those new districts shall be the rights now enjoyed by the rector of the mother church in respect of the appointment of churchwardens. It seems to me that any other interpretation would be most strained and forced. It is said, however, that as you can interpret this clause in a different way, you ought, in the circumstances of the case, to do so. Bramwell, B., undoubtedly puts it very ingeniously. He says (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546): You are to take all Doddington, when it is divided into its several parts, and say that churchwardens shall be appointed as they have been appointed for the parish of Doddington, and in the parish of Doddington you find two modes of appointment; the way, therefore, to arrive at a construction which will at once reconcile the existing state of the law, as it had been in comparatively recent times determined, with the provisions of the Act, is this: You must construe the Act reddendo singula singulis; when you are in this part of Doddington, it is to be as the churchwardens are appointed in this part; when you are in another part, it is to be as the churchwardens have been accustomed to be appointed in that other part. It appears to me a very violent construction which requires you to apply the principle of reddendo singula singulis in this way, when you find that what you call interpreting on that principle simply strikes out all the last words of the section, which says that the rector is to have all such powers as the rector of Doddington had, and in the case of this large part of the parish you tell the rector that he is to have no right or power in the matter at all. I think it is evident that you are stretching the construction to an extent to which the clause itself is incapable of being extended, and it appears to me that if we were so to read it we should in fact be making a new Act of Parliament instead of construing the enactment which we find before us in the plain language of the clause. But I feel the less scruple in coming to this conclusion because I see no necessity for our endeavouring to strain the construction with reference to the external circumstances to meet this view. A well-known passage from Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 115 a) has been cited by Quain, J. (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 259)—namely, that you are not to do away with existing special rights by general affirmative words. But if the affirmative words are clear, plain, and precise, and the two things will not co-exist or stand together, then I apprehend you are compelled to come to a construction which is sensible in itself, and also a natural and ordinary construction. Finding that the two things will not stand together, you are compelled to adopt that construction which the plain sense of the words requires, although it may in some degree interfere with what had been done on previous occasions within the same district; the real point of the case being this, that this Act does, for purposes beneficial to all the inhabitants ecclesiastically, sub-divide this great parish into three parishes; it constructs each of these three parishes on the model of the old parish, and, giving them that construction, it gives them a frame of church government, as far as this question of churchwardens is involved, similar to that which existed in the original parish, which was the mother parish of the whole. Coming to the 6th clause, it does not appear to me that any difficulty arises there. That clause not only offers no difficulty in this construction, but in one point of view it seems to me materially to assist us in construing the Act as I propose to construe it. It seems to me to be a saving clause with regard to anything done by the churchwardens anterior to the alteration and the creation of the new parishes. That tends very strongly to show that the Legislature was aware that it was constructing something altogether new, because if the construction of clause 6 was such as is contended for by the learned judges whose view I am now differing from, there would have been no necessity to make any saving about the churchwardens of March at all. The new rector would have had nothing to do with them with reference to their election, and the Act would simply continue the churchwardens of March in their existing position, without any new offices or any new ecclesiastical constitution being framed. But it appears to me to be plain that it was intended to have a full ecclesiastical constitution in each of the new parishes, and that that ecclesiastical constitution should be according to the common law of the land. That being the case, the churchwardens of March would no longer be in the same position as to election as before; there would be a new form of constituting them, and that being so, it was necessary under the new code to save all such rights as they had until the new system could be arrived at. As regards the statement in the case that the churchwardens of March had acted ex officio as overseers of the poor, I apprehend that no difficulty could arise in that respect. The Act saves all civil rights, and if it be necessary to have an election of overseers of the poor, I apprehend that that election will take place in the ordinary way, as it has done hitherto, and no inconvenience will occur. The parishioners may elect the same persons if they like, or they may elect others if they prefer. The question of the election of churchwardens remains untouched by that. I apprehend that the whole scope of the Act remains untouched, the whole scope being to place each of these parishes in a similar position with regard to the election of those officers. For these reasons I concur in the resolution which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor.

LORD PENZANCE.—My Lords, after the full discussion which this case has received, I should not have thought it necessary to say a word upon the subject, if there had not been so exact a division as there was between the learned judges who have considered this matter in the courts below. And I shall confine myself in the observations which I address to your Lordships to one very short and simple point. I may say that I entirely agree with the arguments and statements which fell from my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, and therefore I shall forbear from dilating on the points on which he has dwelt. The first thing which I wish your Lordships to bear in mind in considering this question is that the scope and intention of this Act was expressly, on the face of it, limited to the creation of three fresh parishes for ecclesiastical purposes. The words in the statute by which that is made apparent are found in the first clause. It describes the division that is to take place, and it says "that the township of Doddington and the hamlet of Wimlington shall form and be one separate and distinct parish and rectory for all ecclesiastical purposes." And then follow similar provisions for the other two divisions into which the original parish is cut up. Then, in two other clauses which have been referred to by your Lordships, clause 42, and especially clause 44, it is distinctly provided in the negative "that nothing in the Act contained shall make any alteration in the division of the parish of Doddington into townships or divisions for the maintenance of the poor, or in any civil purpose whatsoever relating to the present parish of Doddington." It is therefore plain, both by way of affirmative and negative words, that the scope of the Act is limited to the creation of three parishes for ecclesiastical purposes; and whatever rights the inhabitants of the four townships which existed within the parish had at the time of the passing of the Act in relation to the maintenance of the poor, in relation to choosing officers who should regulate that maintenance, or take an active part in that regulation, whatsoever rights the inhabitants had in any civil purpose or office whatever, as attaching to the separate townships, the Act carefully preserved to them. Bearing that in mind, the short question is, what did the Legislature mean when it said that the churchwardens should be chosen in each of the new parishes "at the same time and in the same manner as churchwardens are now chosen and appointed for the parish of Doddington"? On the face of them, these words would not appear to carry with them any ambiguity whatever, because a parish is an old ecclesiastical division of land, and one understands what the meaning of appointing churchwardens for a parish is. One would have thought, therefore, upon the face of the statute, that there would be no difficulty, because one would only have to inquire what was the method which had prevailed in appointing churchwardens for the parish, and at once the description in the Act of Parliament would be satisfied. But in this particular case a controversy arises upon that question, and the difference which has taken place in the court below amongst the learned judges is a difference in the view which they take of the meaning of the words "appointed for the parish of Doddington." Now what are the facts? for it is upon the conclusion to be drawn from the facts as they existed in the parish at the time the statute passed that any difference arises. The case states that there was a mode, which is said to be the common law mode, of electing churchwardens for the parish, and it states that churchwardens were appointed at certain vestries by the name of churchwardens for the parish of Doddington. This, upon the face of it, would seem to satisfy the description we are in search of, in order to give effect to the Act of Parliament. But then it is said these people were appointed by the name of churchwardens for the parish; but in point of fact they were not churchwardens for the parish, they were churchwardens for a limited portion of the parish only. As I understand the argument, it comes to that. Now, this brings me to the point upon which I wish your Lordships' particular attention, because I think sufficient attention has hardly been directed to it. In my judgment, they were not merely in name, but they were in substance and in fact, churchwardens for the whole parish. The church was in the township of Doddington. The inhabitants of that portion of the parish which was called March, being at some little distance from the parish church, had a chapel at which they used to attend, but it is found upon the face of the case that practically the inhabitants of March did occasionally use the church and churchyard at Doddington as parishioners. And whether they did or whether they did not, I am quite unable, from anything which is to be found upon the face of the case, to come to the conclusion that they had lost their legal right to do so. March was within the legal parish of Doddington; the inhabitants of March were parishioners of Doddington; it seems to me that they were entitled to all the services of the church, and to every right of the parishioners of Doddington. If that be so, the persons who were appointed churchwardens for the parish of Doddington, at a vestry held at Doddington, appear to me to have been in fact and in substance, as well as in name, churchwardens for the parish. If so, as I said before, that entirely satisfies the words of the section we have to deal with. Now let me examine whether there was anyone else who could satisfy that description. The only other mode of election which the case discloses was a mode of electing certain persons as churchwardens for the hamlet of March, and by no stretch of language, as it seems to me, could they be held to be in any sense churchwardens for the parish. There was, therefore, at the time this Act passed, a mode of electing churchwardens who were churchwardens for the parish in substance as well as in name; and there was another mode of electing churchwardens, who were not churchwardens for the parish, but only for the hamlet of March. I say that it is impossible to put these together, and to say that those four persons together are the persons who are meant when the 5th section says that the manner of electing and appointing churchwardens for the parish of Doddington is to become the manner of electing and appointing them in future for the new parishes. The other construction, the one already placed upon the clause, seems to me, upon the face of the Act of Parliament, perfectly to satisfy the provisions of the Act, and I should say to leave it without anything that may be called reasonable ambiguity. Now, why is that to be departed from? The proposition upon which my judgment is founded in respect to construction is this: If you have a thing described in a statute, and you find, upon applying that description to the existing facts, that there is one set of facts or circumstances, one person, or one thing, as the case may be, which amply, fully, and entirely satisfies the description which the statute gives, then you have no right, upon any surmise as to what the Legislature intended, to depart from that simple description, to go away from the words of the description itself, and to amplify them or vary them until you have included some set of circumstances, some other set of persons, or bodies, or things, which, under that amplified form, will come in under the description. I say that it is a principle of construction that no such thing should be done, subject to this, that if, upon the face of the Act of Parliament, you find that giving the ordinary sense and meaning to the words you are involved in some inconsistency in any of the other clauses, it may then be necessary to search about and see whether the palpable and obvious construction which the words point at may not be varied, in order that the inconsistency may be avoided. But there is no such inconsistency here. It is not suggested that this creates any difficulty whatever except this; it is said, if you give this meaning to these words, which is their plain and natural meaning, you will then be depriving the inhabitants of March of some legal right which they had at the time when the statute passed, and that you ought not to do that without express words. It is obvious that that argument does not go far enough, if I am right in the canon of construction to which I have just alluded. But, in point of fact, there is no such right taken away. My noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has already pointed out that the right of election was one which attached before to the hamlet of March, for the civil purposes of the township, and that this Act, which is confined to ecclesiastical purposes, really has not, upon the face of it, either expressly or impliedly, taken away that right. Under those circumstances, the plain words of the statute are amply satisfied, in my opinion, by the state of facts which existed at the time of the passing of the Act; and the mode of choosing the churchwardens for the parish of Doddington must be intended to mean, and must mean only, that mode which was in existence, of choosing the only persons who satisfied the description of being churchwardens of the parish.

Metropolis Management Acts—Apportionment of expenses—One side of a street—18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105—25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77.

The plaintiffs, acting under the Metropolis Management Acts, resolved that a portion (to wit, the eastern side) of a new street should be paved throughout the whole length for a uniform breadth of 12ft., measured from the eastern boundary; and that the owners of the houses forming the eastern side should pay the estimated expenses. In an action against the defendants for contribution to these expenses, their workhouse being part of the eastern side of the street, it was stated in defence that there were houses and land on the western side liable to contribute; and it was replied that these houses and land did not bound or abut on any part of the street to be paved.

Held, upon demurrer to the reply (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the plaintiffs had no power to charge the owners of one side of the street only, and that the action could not be maintained.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in favour of the defendants on a demurrer to reply. The case is reported in 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 178, ante, p. 126, where the pleadings are set out at length.

The vestry of Mile End New Town resolved to pave the whole length of a new street on one side only. The estimated expenses of the work were apportioned amongst the owners of the houses and land bounding or abutting on the side of the street so paved, and not among the owners on both sides of the street. The real question raised by the demurrer was whether the vestry had power by law to throw the entire expense on owners of houses and land adjoining the particular side which has been paved, or whether the cost of paving must be apportioned among the owners of land and houses adjoining the street on both sides?

The Queen's Bench Division (Blackburn, J., Lush, J., and Field, J.) held that the owners on both sides were liable for the cost incurred in the paving. The vestry appealed.

Philbrick, Q.C. and Bazalgette for the appellants (the plaintiffs in the court below).—The appellants are empowered under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105(a)

(a) By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105, in case the owners of the houses forming part of any new street laid out or made, or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry, or district board of the parish, or district in which such street is situate, be desirous of having the same paved, as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well to pave part of the breadth of a street, and the question to be decided is, whether the owners of land and houses abutting on the part so paved can be charged with the estimated expenses. We submit they can under the Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77. Whitchurch v. The Fulham Board of Works (L. Rep. 233, Q. B.; 35 L. J. 145, M. C.; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 631) is distinguishable. There the expenses of paving were apportioned among separate sections of a street, varying in character and value throughout its entire length, instead of the whole of it.

Finlay (Day, Q.C. with him), for the respondents, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think the decision arrived at by the Court of Queen's Bench in this case is clearly right. There is no doubt that the term "street," according to the interpretation clause, includes "part of a street." And the 105th section (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) says that "if a vestry deem it expedient or necessary to pave a street, such vestry shall well and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriage way and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth;" and that the owners of the houses "forming such street" shall on demand, pay to such vestry the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement, each amount to be determined by the surveyor of the time being for the vestry. And by a later statute (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) the owners of land are also made liable to contribute. Now the question raised before us is a very simple one, and it is this: if a vestry decide on paving the whole or part of a street, that is to say, cutting the street transversely, and do not choose to pave it throughout the whole breadth, is such vestry not bound to divide the expense between the owners of land and houses on both sides? I think they are. Houses "forming such street" must mean the houses on both sides. The intention of the Legislature was that whether the whole or part of a street is paved, the owners of land or houses on both sides should be liable to pay for the costs incurred in such paving.

and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth and carriage way and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall, on demand, pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement, such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board.

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102 s. 77, where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105, have paved or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding and abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses, or estimated expenses, of paving the same, as well as the owners of the houses therein.

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 112, the expression "new street" shall apply to and include all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out, and a part of any such street.

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE v. HEMATITE STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED.

Rating of iron mines—Deduction from royalties—Reservation in lease—Liability of lessor—The Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), s. 8.

By sect. 8 of the Rating Act 1874, where the lessee of a mine is exempt from being rated to any poor or other local rate, he may (unless he has specifically contracted to pay such rate in the event of the abolition of the said exemption) deduct from any rent, royalty, or dues payable by him, one half of any such rate paid by him.

The plaintiff and defendants contracted in a lease of iron mines that the rent and royalties payable by the defendants, the lessees, should be free and clear of and from all rates, taxes, tithe rent charges, expenses and deductions whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or of any other nature. The defendants deducted from their royalties half of the rates paid by them under this Act, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover the deduction.

Held that this section of the statute overruled the reservation in the lease, and that the defendants were not liable for the half of the rates which they had deducted.

THIS was a special case stated by consent of the parties for the opinion of the court under Order XXXIV., r. 1.

1. By an indenture of lease dated 17th June 1864, and made between the plaintiff of the one part, and Henry William Schneider and Robert Hannay, of Barrow-in-Furness, in the county of Lancaster, iron masters, of the other part, the plaintiff granted to the said Henry William Schneider and Robert Hannay license and authority to get and raise all iron ore that might be found in and under the lands in the parish of Dalton-in-Furness, in the county Palatine of Lancaster, described in the schedule and plan to the said lease, together with power to open limestone quarries, and to work any such quarries then opened in the said lands. The lease to continue for the term of thirty-one years from the 1st Jan. 1864, but to be determinable as therein mentioned.

2. The reservation of rent in the said lease is in the words following: "Yielding, paying, and delivering unto the said Duke, his heirs and assigns, during the said term, the annual rent of 500*l.*, by equal half yearly payments, on 1st July and 1st Jan. in each year, and also at the same periods the royalty of 1*s.* 4*d.* per ton for every ton of 2240*lbs.* of iron ore which in any half year shall be dug, raised, and taken out of the said premises over and above 3636 tons. And also at the same periods the royalty of 1*d.* per ton of 2240*lbs.* of limestone, which in any half year shall be dug, raised, and taken out of the said premises, such rent and royalties to be free and clear of and from all rates, taxes, tithe rent-charges, expenses and deductions whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or of any other nature."

3. The covenant by the lessees for the payment of rent is in the words following: "That they the said Henry William Schneider and Robert Hannay, their executors and administrators, shall and will from time to time, and at all times during the said term, pay the said rent and royalties hereby reserved at the times, and in the manner herein mentioned."

5. The interest in the said lease of the lessees was assigned to, and is now vested in, the defendants.

6. There was due and owing from the defendants to the plaintiff in respect of the rent and royalties on iron ore payable under the said lease on the 13th Sept. 1875, the sum of 937*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*, and on 2nd May 1876 the sum of 945*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, making together the sum of 18,824*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.*

7. The defendants, after the passing of the statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 54, became liable to pay, and have paid, for poor and local rates imposed upon them as such lessees as aforesaid in respect of the iron ore worked by them under the said lease, and on which they were liable to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 18,824*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.*, the sums following, that is to say, the sum of 1296*l.* in respect of the poor rate, and the sum of 1728*l.* in respect of the local rate, making together the sum of 3024*l.*, the value of the iron ore raised by the defendants, being for the purposes of the assessment of the defendants to the said rates taken at the sum of 2*s.* 3*d.* per ton.

8. The defendants claimed to be entitled to deduct from the plaintiff the sum of 1098*l.*, being the sum at which one half of the said local and poor rates so paid by the defendants amounted to, calculated upon the said sum of 18,824*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.*, so payable by the defendants to the plaintiff for the said royalties.

9. The defendants having claimed to be entitled to deduct from the plaintiff the said sum of 1098*l.*, have paid to the plaintiff the sum of 17,726*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.* in respect of the total of 18,824*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.* mentioned in the sixth paragraph, leaving unpaid the sum of 1098*l.*

10. On 31st May 1876, a writ was issued in this action, in which the plaintiff claimed to recover from the defendants the sum of 1098*l.* as the balance remaining due to him from the defendants in respect of the said royalties.

11. The plaintiff contends that the defendants are not entitled to deduct from the rent and royalties payable by them to him any money in respect of the rates so paid by them.

12. The defendants contend that they are entitled to deduct the full sum of 1098*l.* in respect of such rates.

13. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the defendants are entitled to deduct from the plaintiff the said sum of 1098*l.*

Kay, Q.C. (with him Bowen), argued for the plaintiff.—This case turns upon the application of sects. 8, 9 and 10 of the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), to the circumstances herein stated. By sect. 8, "Where any poor or other local rate which, at the commencement of this Act, any lessee, licensee, or grantee of a mine is exempt from being rated to in respect of such mine during the continuance of his lease, grant, or licence, or before the arrival of the period at which the amount of the rent, royalty, or dues is liable to revision or readjustment, he may (unless he has specifically contracted to pay such rate in the event of the abolition of the said exemption) deduct from any rent, royalty or dues payable by him one half of any such rate paid by him. Provided that he shall not deduct any sum exceeding what one half of the rate in the pound of such poor or other local rate would amount to if calculated upon the rent, royalty, or dues so payable by him." By sect. 9: "Where any occupier, lessee, licensee, grantee, or other person is authorised by this Act to deduct any rate or sum in respect of a rate from any rent, royalty, or dues payable by him, then (1) Any payment so authorised to be deducted shall be a good discharge for such amount of rent, royalty, or dues as is equal to the amount of such payment, and shall be allowed accordingly. (2) Any payment so authorised to be deducted may be recovered as an ordinary debt from the person to whom the rent, royalty, or dues may be payable. (3) The person receiving the rent, royalty, or dues shall have the same right of appeal and objection with reference to the rate and to the valuation of the hereditament in respect of which the rate is payable, as he would have if he were the occupier of such hereditament." By sect. 10: "After the commencement of this Act, the hereditaments to which the poor rate Acts are extended by this Act, and which are thus made rateable to the relief of the poor, shall be rateable to all local rates in like manner, as if the poor rate Acts had always extended to such hereditaments." The words of the lease with respect to payment by the defendants of future rates are very extensive, and may well be held to be within the exemption contained in the 8th section. [LUSH, J.—You must show that the defendants have specifically contracted to pay poor rates and local rates in the event of the abolition of the exemption existing in the year 1864.] The words of the reservation in the lease are sufficiently specific to include the defendants' liability for the whole of these rates: the rent and royalties are to be free and clear of and from all rates and deductions whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or of any other nature.

Edwyn Jones (with A. Wills, Q.C.) appeared for the defendants, but was not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This case to my mind is clear enough: it turns upon the construction of a reservation in the plaintiff's lease of some iron mines to the defendants, whereby the defendants, the lessees, undertake to pay certain rents and royalties, which are "to be free and clear of and from all rates, taxes, tithe rentcharges, expenses and deductions whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or of any other nature." I quite agree that this clause is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the royalties in full, without any deduction for poor or local rates, were it not for the words of the 8th section of the Rating Act 1874. An occupier of a mine previously exempted, but rated under that Act, "may (unless he has specifically contracted to pay such rate in the event of the abolition of the said exemption) deduct from any rent, royalty, or dues payable by him one half of any such rate paid by him." The exception in the parenthesis is very clear and precise, and we cannot expunge from it the word "specifically." It cannot be said there is any such contract as that described in this exception to be found in the lease before us. As I understand the effect of this clause in the lease, when the contract is general to pay rates and taxes, all existing rates, and all newly imposed rates of an ordinary character, are to be paid by the lessees; but with regard to this new rating liability imposed upon mines by the Rating Act, there can be no duty upon lessees to pay the whole of the new rates, unless the parties to the lease had previously considered the probable abolition of the existing exemption, and specifically provided for meeting it when it might take place. In other cases, where the parties have made no specific contract for such a contingency, half of the new rates must be paid by the lessor, and half by the lessee. In order to escape this liability on the lessor's part to share these rates, there must be expressed in the contract a reference to this particular extension of the application of poor rates, or to the prospect thereof. In this lease no specific contract was made to pay these rates in the event of the abolition of the then existing exemption, therefore I think the statute has bound our hands, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I also think that the Act entitles a tenant to deduct half his payments under this new legislation, unless there has been an express and a specific provision for this particular possible rateability in his lease.

ELLIS v. THE MANCHESTER CARRIAGE COMPANY (LIMITED)

Ancient lights—Sale of adjacent land—Right of purchaser to build.

Where the owner of a house has sold a piece of adjacent land without reserving right to lights he cannot maintain an action for obstructing his ancient lights by building on the land.

Proof that the land so built on was a public street would not enable the owner of the house to maintain such an action.

THIS was an action for damage to the plaintiff's reversion by obstruction to lights. The plaintiff had a reversionary interest in certain houses and shops in Rochdale-road, Manchester, which had been built more than twenty years before the plaintiff purchased the property. Afterwards, about the year 1869, the plaintiff bought some other houses and land in Emmet-street, near the property which he had previously purchased. In 1870 the plaintiff sold the Emmet-street property, which, after certain mesne assignments, was subsequently purchased by the defendants. In the conveyance by which the plaintiff sold the Emmet-street property, there was no reservation of rights of light. The defendants knocked down the houses on the Emmet-street property, and built stables on their site. The stables covered more ground than the cottages, and came nearer to the back windows of the plaintiff's houses in Rochdale-road, and darkened the plaintiff's lights. The case was tried at the Manchester Summer Assizes, 1876, before Mr. Ambrose, Q.C., sitting as commissioner, who ruled that the plaintiff had made out no case in point of law, and directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants. Leave was given to the plaintiff to move to have the damages to which he should be entitled assessed by an arbitrator, if the court should hold that the learned commissioner was wrong in ruling that no case was made out.

Jordan moved accordingly.—The ruling was wrong, and the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action. The houses in Rochdale-road having been built for more than twenty years, the plaintiff had acquired an indefeasible right to light as against the occupier of the Emmet-street property; and the fact that the two properties had at one time been held by the plaintiff would make no difference: (Freven v. Phillips, 11 C. B., N. S., 449.) The main point relied on for the defendants was that in the conveyance by which the plaintiff sold the Emmet-street property no rights of light were reserved, and therefore according to the case of White v. Bass (7 H. & N. 722; 31 L. J. 283, Ex.), the plaintiff had no right to light as against the defendants; but that case is distinguishable from the present, for there the ownership had never been severed before the granting of the lease, and no easement had been acquired. [DENMAN, J., referred to the note to Gale on Easements, p. 104, 5th edit., where the judgment of Channell, B., in White v. Bass (ubi sup.) and Curriers' Company v. Corbett (2 Dr. & Sm. 355) are cited.] Those cases are distinguishable, for here the plaintiff was prepared to prove that part of the land built on by the defendants was part of a public street, and no person would have any right to build on a public street, and therefore it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to insert any stipulation against so building in his conveyance. In Curriers' Company v. Corbett (ubi sup.) the land built on was not part of a public street.

GROVE, J.—I am of opinion that there ought to be no rule. We are bound by the decision in the Curriers' Company v. Corbett (ubi sup.), which is absolutely on all fours with the present case, as Mr. Jordan admits, unless the present case could be distinguished if the ground built on was a public street; and there are other cases to much the same effect, which show that where a person sells land without reserve he sells it for all purposes. It is alleged here that the land built on was a public street, but of that fact there is no evidence. If the action had been one for impeding the plaintiff in the use of the street, evidence that it was a public street might have been important; but here the action was for building so as to impede the plaintiff's lights, and therefore it was immaterial whether the land was a street or not. The defendants could not be expected to be prepared to meet such evidence, and it might be that the street had been abolished. Here the person from whom the defendants purchased the land had a perfect right to sell it, and when he sold it to the defendants they bought it with the right to build on it. There will be no rule.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In Tenant v. Goldwin (2 Lord Raym. 1093) Lord Holt, C.J., said, "If indeed the builder of the house sells the house with the lights and appurtenances, he cannot build upon the remainder of the ground so near as to stop the lights of the house; and as he cannot do it, so neither can his vendee. But if he had sold the vacant piece of ground and kept the house, without reserving the benefit of the lights, the vendee might build against his house." No doubt this is not a decision, but it is the dictum of a very learned judge; and in White

v. Bass (ubi sup.), to which case Mr. Jordan very fairly called our attention, Channell, B., adopts the words of Lord Holt to which I have referred, and the case was so decided. The Curriers' Company v. Corbett (ubi sup.) is to the same effect, and the weight of authority is very strong against the proposition contended for on behalf of the plaintiff. Mr. Jordan says that the cases to which I have referred do not apply here, because he was in a condition to prove that the land on which the defendants built was part of a public road; but there was no issue as to that; it was a simple case of persons building on land which they had bought without any rights being reserved. If it were a public road I do not say how the case might stand as to the defendants' liability to an action for building on the road, but that case is not before us.

Parliamentary franchise—Receipt of alms—Disqualification—2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 36.

By 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 36, no person can be registered as a voter who within a year before 31st July has "received parochial relief or other alms, which by the law of parliament now disqualify from voting."

Property was devised to trustees for charitable purposes, the overplus of the rents to be "distributed to the poorest inhabitants . . . as my said trustees . . . shall think fit."

The overplus was distributed yearly in small sums according to the discretion of the trustees.

Held, on a case stated by a revising barrister, that persons who had received a grant from this charity were disqualified.

APPEAL from the decision of a revising barrister. The following case was stated for the opinion of the court:

The Borough of Petersfield in the County of Hants.

1. At the court for the revision of the parliamentary list of voters for the above borough, held by me, the revising barrister, this 22nd Sept. 1876, one John Cook, of Weston, in the parish of Buriton, in the said borough, who was on the list of voters as an inhabitant householder in the said parish of Buriton, was duly objected to as not being qualified, inasmuch as it was alleged he had within twelve months next previous to the last day of July in the present year, received alms, which, by the law of Parliament, disqualified him from voting in the election of a member to serve in Parliament. The facts upon which this objection was founded and proved before me are the following.

2. In the year 1864, one John Goodger, by his will, left certain funds for charitable purposes.

The only portion of such will necessary for the consideration of this case is as follows:

I give and devise unto my honoured friend Leonard Bilson, Esquire, and my nephew Edmund Yalden, in the county of Surrey, clerk, and to his heirs and assigns for ever, all my messuage dwelling house, together with all the barns, stables, outhouses, and buildings, and all the gardens and orchard thereunto belonging, situate in Weston aforesaid, called Halfpenny Land, now in the possession of Thomas Jacques, together with the free liberty to water and overflow, the said lands as it is now and heretofore hath been used for the best improvement thereof, to the intent and purpose that they the said Leonard Bilson and Edmund Yalden, and the survivor of them, their heirs and assigns, shall grant and convey all the said messuage lands and premises, with the appurtenances, unto six, able honest, and sufficient persons, their heirs and assigns, as they or the survivor of them shall think fit, upon trust and confidence, and to the intent and purpose that all the yearly rents, issues, and profits of the said messuage land and premises shall be employed and disposed of for ever hereafter for the putting forth and placing abroad of all such poor children of the tything of Weston aforesaid, and the overplus thereof shall be distributed unto the poorest inhabitants of the said tything of Weston aforesaid as my said trustees and their assigns shall think fit.

3. The overplus, after making payments for education, apprenticeship fees, and sundry expenses generally amounts to about 40*l.*, which sum is distributed once in each year (generally in the spring) by the trustees amongst about eighty of the labouring population of the Tything of Weston, in the said parish of Buriton, according to their discretion in sums varying from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 12*s.* 6*d.*, according to the necessities of the recipient and the number of his family.

4. Personal application is not made to the trustees, who make inquiry by themselves or their agent into the circumstances of the inhabitants of the Tything of Weston, and they decide who are fitting persons to receive, and who shall receive a grant from the charity, and of what amount that grant shall be.

5. The money was distributed on the 10th Jan., in the present year, and the said John Cook then received 12*s.* 6*d.*, the largest sum granted.

6. The said John Cook, who is an agricultural labourer, is a married man with five children, and has from time to time applied for and received parochial relief. He was omitted from the list of voters for the year 1874-75 on the ground of the receipt of parochial relief, but he received no such relief in the electoral year which expired on the 31st July last.

7. That previously to the passing of the Reform Act of 1867 the said John Cook was not entitled to exercise the Parliamentary franchise, the house which he then occupied and now occupies being of insufficient value to confer a qualification under the Reform Act of 1832, and he being not otherwise qualified.

8. The said John Cook was a proper recipient of the charity.

9. The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

10. Upon objection taken that this was a receipt of alms, which incapacitated the said John Cook, I decided it was not such a receipt, and I refused to expunge the name of the said John Cook from the said list of voters, and his name was accordingly retained thereon.

11. The question for the consideration of the court is whether or not I did right in retaining the name of the said John Cook on the said list of voters.

There was a similar appeal in the case of Edmund Port, the facts were substantially identical with those in Cook's case, with the exception that Port had never actually received parochial relief; he had applied for it on one occasion but his application had been refused. The two cases were argued together.

Arbuthnot, for the appellant.—The decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and the names of these two persons ought to be struck off the register, for they are disqualified by 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 36, by which no person is entitled to be registered in any year who, within twelve calendar months before 31st July in that year, has "received parochial relief or other alms which by the law of Parliament now disqualify from voting," &c. This question was raised as to this same charity in the case of the Petersfield Election Petition, Stowe v. Jolliffe (L. Rep. 9 C. P. 734; 43 L. J. 173, C. P.; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795), but it became unnecessary to decide it. The proper rule as to what are such alms as disqualify is that a distinction is to be made between cases where the recipient has a vested right to the proceeds of the charity, and those where the mode of distribution is dependent on the will of the person distributing. The object of the disqualification is to ensure independence in voters, and a person who receives alms which it is in the discretion of another to give or to withhold is not likely to exercise the franchise independently. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Some of the cases seem to point to the principle that alms which disqualify are those which can be said to be in aid of the parochial relief.] The cases collected in Rogers on Elections, 12th edit., pp. 213—215, are conflicting. Smith v. Hall (33 L. J. 59, C. P.), is distinguishable from the present case, for there the persons whose right to vote was upheld were members of a foundation, and therefore could not be influenced in the exercise of the franchise as the recipients of this charity could. The principle now contended for is supported by the judgments in that case. Here, by the terms of the will, the recipients of the charity were necessarily the most indigent persons in the borough, and therefore the least likely to exercise the right of voting independently.

Anstie, for the respondent.—The true distinction is that alms which form part of or stand in the place of relief from the poor rate disqualify, but alms in the discretion of trustees do not. In R. v. Mayor of Lichfield (2 Q. B. 693) where a similar clause disqualified persons who had received "parochial relief or other alms," it was held that the word "parochial" applied to alms as well as to relief. See also Reg. v. Inhabitants of Halesworth (3 B. & Ad. 717). The principle contended for on the other side cannot be correct, for parochial relief is given not of grace but as a right to those qualified to receive it, yet the recipients are expressly disqualified. The Bedford Cases, Harpur's Charity and Haues's Charity (Rogers on Elections 12th edit. 213) are authorities in favour of the respondent, and Welborn's Charity (ibid.) is distinguishable, because there the alms were distributed by the overseers, and it conflicts with the Colchester case (ibid.). See also the Downton case (ibid.). The appellant is attempting to upset the right to vote, and the burden of proof lies on him.

Arbuthnot in reply.—The Aylesbury case (Rogers on Elections 213) is in favour of the appellant. Reg. v. The Mayor of Lichfield (ubi sup.) was decided on a different statute, and is not in point here. [LINDLEY, J. referred to the Bishop of Hereford v. Adams (7 Ves. 324)].

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. (having stated the facts). Now it cannot be disputed that alms have been received; in one of the cases parochial relief had also been received, but not within a year before the last day of July in the present year, and therefore what we have to try is whether the alms which have been received are alms which by the law of Parliament disqualify from voting in the election of members to serve in Parliament. The law of Parliament means the law with regard to the right to vote, as it was administered by Parliamentary committees until the jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Common Pleas, and the law as administered by the Court of Common Pleas, and, since the coming into operation of the Judicature Acts, by the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice, on appeals from revising barristers and election petitions. We have to try if we can extract a principle which will govern these cases from the decisions of the Committees of the House of Commons, or from the decisions of the court, but, as has been pointed out in the argument, it is very difficult to extract any satisfactory principle from the decisions of Committees of the House of Commons in these cases. It was suggested from the Bench in the course of the argument that the principle might be that alms would disqualify which were part of the parochial relief or in aid of parochial relief, and that view is to a certain extent supported by some of the cases which have been cited; but after all it does not seem to throw very much light upon the question, for suppose a person were in receipt of a payment, say of ten pounds a year from a charity, without which he would be unable to support himself, in such a case it would be difficult to say that this was not a payment in relief of the rates, for it would enable the recipient to live without receiving parochial relief when otherwise the expense of his maintenance would be on the rates. Very few cases have been decided on this question in the Court of Common Pleas, but we find in Smith v. Hall (ubi sup.), though the case is not quite in point here, a principle laid down in argument and to a certain extent adopted in the judgment, which throws some light on the present case. That was a case where the persons whose votes were objected to were the brethren of a hospital, and no doubt in one sense they received alms; but the same might also be said in the case of colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, where persons on the foundation receive the benefit of eleemosynary endowments, and it is quite clear that a fellow of a college would not be disqualified from voting at an election for the city or borough, if he possessed a house or in any other way had the necessary property qualification. The principle striven for by Mr. Welsby in arguing that case was that the brethren of the hospital were not disqualified because they were not dependent on the caprice or goodwill of any person for their share of the benefits of the charity, and in giving judgment Erle, C.J., says, "These persons are entitled to vote unless they are disqualified by the 36th section of the Reform Act . . . if we look to the meaning of the enactment in question, I think it will be evident that the reason why the persons there mentioned are disqualified is because it is considered that from being so situated they are likely to be subservient, and not to have that independence which a workman ought and might be expected to have. But I take it that these persons, having a house of their own, and a share in the proceeds of certain lands for life, would, in all probability, be more independent than many persons who have nothing to subsist on but the profits of their own labour." Williams, J. in his judgment says, "Shepherd, an able and accurate writer, in his work on Elections (2nd edit. p. 5) adopts the very words of Serjeant Heywood. 'A distinction may be made between charities which are of such a nature as to imply that the partaker of them is in a state of indigence and abject dependence, and those which afford no such inference, or from which a contrary one may be drawn.' (Heywood on County Elections, 2nd edit., p. 278). It seems to me impossible to hold that these persons are in a state of indigence or abject dependence, and that we ought not to hold them to be disqualified." Now as far as one can extract the principle of that case it seems that the persons whose right to vote was in question there were held qualified because they were not in a state of indigence and dependence, and it follows that persons who receive alms of such a nature as to show that they are in a state of indigence and dependence ought to be held disqualified. What then is the case here? Both these persons have, on previous occasions, made application for parochial relief, and one of them has received it; in fact, both of them appear to be on the very verge of the necessity of coming to the parish to keep themselves and their children alive; the charity by which they have been relieved is a charity for the benefit of the poorest inhabitants, and the distribution of the relief given is in the discretion of the trustees. It is obvious that this is just such a condition of things as the provisions of the Act were meant to apply to, for such a charity as this is capable of being misapplied in the very mode in which parliament thought that charitable relief might be misapplied unless the disqualification were established. Although there is no ground for suggesting that anything of the sort is the case here, still it is obvious that such a charity as this might be used for purposes which neither Parliament nor this court would sanction. I think, therefore, that these persons do come within the disqualifying provisions, and ought not to have votes. It may be that in Chancery the word "poorest" in this will would be construed as "poor" was in the Bishop of Hereford v. Adams (ubi sup.), but, however this may be, looking at the words of the statute it seems that these persons have been in the receipt of such alms as in the opinion of Parliament would have disqualified the recipients from voting at the time when the Reform Act was passed. The decision of the revising barrister will, therefore, be reversed.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is found in the case that these persons possessed the qualification necessary to entitle them to vote, subject to the question whether they were disqualified from having received a payment of 12s. 6d. under the circumstances stated. It turns on the construction of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 36, and the question is, did they receive parochial relief or other alms which would disqualify them? It is found that they have not received parochial relief within a year, and therefore the question is whether they have received "other alms" within the meaning of the section. Suppose the section had stopped at the word "alms," it would then have been necessary that the alms should have been ejusdem generis with parochial relief, which would be alms given by reason of the poverty of the recipient, and would include these alms which are expressly directed to be given to the "poorest" inhabitants. But the section does not stop there. It goes on, "which by the law of Parliament now disqualify from voting in the election of members to serve in Parliament." We must therefore find out if we can what is meant by such "other alms," and there is the difficulty, for it is not easy to see what the principle was on which the Committees of the House of Commons acted in deciding on this section. We must assume that there was a principle, and try to extract it, but it is not easy to do so, for in the reports of the decisions the reasons are not given, and the decisions themselves are contradictory. But there must be some principle underlying the decisions. First, it is said that the question is whether the alms are distributed by the parochial authorities, but I cannot say that it seems to me to be a sound principle to make the nature of the alms depend on the character of the trustees of the charity. Then the other principle is that the question depends on whether the recipient of the alms is likely to be dependent, and so to be easily influenced as to his vote. The case of Smith v. Hall shows that poverty alone will not do, if the person is permanently entitled to the benefits which he receives, and is not dependent for them on the caprice or good will of any other person. In such a case as that the mere receipt of alms ceases to be a disqualification. In this case all the evidence goes to show that it is exactly such a state of facts as was pointed at by the Act and the decisions. There is poverty, there is the receipt of alms, and there is the absence of independence, and where these three elements exist I think that the disqualification is made out. Therefore, although the burden of proof lies on those who question the franchise, I am of opinion that the necessity for proving the case is satisfied, and that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed.

HOLDEN AND WIFE v. KING.

Assault—Action for aggravated assault on woman—Conviction before justices of same assault in form of common assault—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 ss. 42, 43, 45—"Same cause."

Upon an information by the plaintiffs before justices, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, for unlawfully assaulting and beating the female plaintiff, the defendant was convicted and sentenced to suffer a term of imprisonment and to pay the costs, or in default a further term of imprisonment. The defendant paid the costs and suffered the imprisonment.

In an action for the same assault, in the form of an aggravated assault, as to which jurisdiction is given to the magistrates under sect. 43,

Held that the action was a proceeding for "the same cause" as that adjudicated upon by the justices, and was therefore barred by sect. 45.

Ex. Div.]

HOLDEN AND WIFE v. KING.

[Ex Div.]

Action for assault.

Two actions were originally brought, one by the plaintiff Thomas Holden to recover damages for an assault committed on him by the defendant, the other by Thomas Holden and Mary Rebecca his wife to recover damages for an assault committed by the defendant on the said Mary Rebecca Holden, in which action the husband also claimed damages for the loss of his wife's services. The two actions were, however, consolidated.

To the statement of claim in the first action, the defendant, in his statement of defence, raised the following defence:

First, not guilty. Secondly, that after the committing of the said alleged assault, the plaintiff preferred a complaint and charge of the said alleged assault before John Dixon Dyke, Esq., Frederick Luck, Esq., and William Walton, Esq., justices of the peace of the county of Kent, sitting at Sittingbourne, in Kent, having jurisdiction to try the same, and the said justices caused the said defendant to be summoned to answer the said complaint and charge; and thereupon the parties appeared, and the said justices heard and determined the same, and convicted the defendant of the alleged assault, and adjudged that the defendant should pay a fine of 40s., together with a further sum of 48s. 5d. costs, and the defendant thereupon paid the said sum forthwith, and before action.

And in answer to the statement of claim in the second action the defendant also pleaded not guilty, and a similar plea to the second plea pleaded in the first action, terminating with an averment that the justices convicted the defendant of the alleged assault, and adjudged that the defendant should pay the sum of 2l. 18s. 5d. for costs, and further should suffer a term of imprisonment with hard labour for fourteen days, and the defendant before action thereupon paid the said sum of 2l. 18s. 5d., and suffered the said term of imprisonment with hard labour awarded.

On these pleas the plaintiffs joined issue, and replied that the action was not in respect of the same cause as that which was adjudicated upon as therein alleged, on which issue was joined.

At the trial before Cleasby, B., at the Maidstone Spring Assizes, 1876, the following facts were proved:

On the 10th July, 1875, the male plaintiff who had been on strike, was at the Wheatsheaf public-house, at Eastchurch, with his wife, who had in her hand a basket of vegetables. The defendant, who was under the influence of drink, came in, and, pulling some onions and lettuces from Mary Holden's basket, began to tear them to pieces. Upon the husband's expostulating, the defendant knocked him down, and then struck Mary Holden a blow on the head and knocked her down, repeating the blow with great violence when she got up, fracturing her jaw, and causing her other injuries, and knocking her down a second time.

On the Monday following the assault, the plaintiffs applied for summonses against the defendant for unlawfully assaulting and beating the plaintiffs, which summonses were heard on the 16th Aug., when the magistrates, for the assault on the husband, fined the defendant 40s. and 48s. 5d. costs, and for the assault on the wife they passed a sentence on him of fourteen days' imprisonment with hard labour, and further adjudged that he should pay 2l. 18s. 5d. for costs, or suffer a further term of one month's imprisonment. The money was paid by the defendant, and he likewise suffered his term of imprisonment.

Upon these facts a verdict was entered for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for 10l. 10s. for the injury to the wife, and 5l. 5s. for the loss of the wife's services.

The sections of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, bearing on the case, are as follows:

Sect. 42. When any persons shall unlawfully assault or beat any other person, two justices of the peace, upon complaint by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, may hear and determine such offence, and the offender shall, upon conviction thereof before them, at the discretion of the justices, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months, or else shall forfeit and pay such fine as shall appear to them to be meet, not exceeding, together with costs (if ordered), the sum of 5l.

Sect. 43. When any person shall be charged before two justices of the peace with an assault and battery upon any male child whose age shall not exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, either upon the complaint of the party aggrieved or otherwise, the said justices, if the assault or battery is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their opinion be sufficiently presented under the provisions hereinbefore contained as to common assault and batteries, may proceed to hear and determine the same in a summary way, and, if the same be proved, may convict the person accused; and every such offender shall be liable to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding six months, or to pay a fine not exceeding 20l.

Sect. 45. If any person against whom any such complaint as in either of the last three preceding sections mentioned shall have been preferred by or on behalf of the party aggrieved, shall have obtained such certificate, or, having been convicted, shall have paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment awarded, in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause.

CLEASBY, B., was the only member of the court present, but by the consent of both the parties the case was argued before him.

Gates, Q.C. and Glyn, now moved accordingly.

—It is not disputed that the assault on the husband was adjudicated upon by the magistrates, but that on the wife was not adjudicated upon by them, the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover in this action, in respect of the aggravated assault on the wife. In order to avail himself of sect. 45 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, upon which he relies as a defence, the defendant must show that this action is a proceeding "for the same cause" as that adjudicated upon by the magistrates. But he cannot show that; the magistrates merely adjudicated upon the common assault upon the female plaintiff under sect. 42 of that Act, and did not take into consideration the aggravated assault upon her under sect. 43, for which aggravated assault this action is brought. That being so, the case of Reg. v. Morris (L. Rep. 1. C. C. R. 90), is directly in point, where it was held that a conviction for assault by justices in petty sessions, at the instance of the person assaulted, and imprisonment consequent thereon, are not either at common law or under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, a bar to an indictment for manslaughter of the person assaulted, should he subsequently die from the effects of the assault.

Henry F. Dickens, for the defendant.—The argument of the plaintiff simply amounts to this, that if A. gives B. three blows on the head, B. is entitled to get A. convicted before the magistrates of two, and to bring an action for the third. The clear intention of sect. 45 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 is to release the defendant from all further proceedings civil or criminal for the same assault for which he has been fined and imprisoned. In the case of Masper and Wife v. Brown (L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 97) which is absolutely on all fours with the present, it was held that the words "for the same cause" must be taken to mean "for the same assault." The point here then is, Is the assault on this female plaintiff, for which this action is brought, the same assault on her as that adjudicated upon by the magistrates? It undoubtedly is. The information before the magistrates was for a common assault upon her under sect. 42; but by sect. 43 the magistrates have power upon the summons for a common assault, if they find that the assault is of an aggravated nature upon a woman, to levy a heavier fine or impose a longer term of imprisonment. A special summons for an aggravated assault is not necessary. The true construction of sects. 42 and 43 is that upon a summons under sect. 42 they can adjudicate upon one under sect. 43. And they have done so here, for in the summons for the assault on the husband the defendant was only fined, in the summons for the assault upon the wife he was not fined but imprisoned. The case of Reg. v. Morris is altogether distinguishable. He also cited:

Wemyss v. Hopkins, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 9; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 378; 44 L. J. 130, Q. B.;

CLEASBY, B.—If I had entertained any doubt in this case, I should have preferred to have had the case argued again before two judges, but as I feel no doubt whatever, and as the parties consented that the motion should be heard before me, I have no hesitation in giving my decision. There were originally two actions which were consolidated, but with respect to the assault on the husband the plaintiffs' counsel does not deny that that assault was adjudicated upon by the magistrates, and that with respect to that the plaintiffs cannot recover. The whole question is whether the assault on the wife has been adjudicated upon. The action by the husband and wife is for an assault committed by the defendant upon the wife, and the defence set up by him is, that the case was brought before the magistrates under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, that he was imprisoned for this very assault, and that sect. 45 of that Act releases him from all further proceedings, civil or criminal. But in order that he can avail himself of that defence, he must show that this action is "for the same cause" for which he has been adjudged to be imprisoned. Has he then been adjudged to be imprisoned "for the same cause?" Now if there were one proceeding for a common assault, and another for an aggravated assault, I should have thought that the magistrates in this case could not be said to have adjudicated upon the aggravated assault, and that though to some extent the defendant suffered for the same cause, he would not have been said to have been convicted "for the same cause," but only for the common assaults and battery. But I cannot come to that conclusion. Sect. 42 gives power to the magistrates to impose a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, or a term of imprisonment not exceeding two months, on any person who shall unlawfully assault and beat any other person. Then sect. 43 provides that "when any person shall be charged before two justices of the peace with an assault and battery upon any male child whose age shall not exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, either upon the complaint of the party aggrieved or otherwise, the said justices, if the assault and battery is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions hereinbefore contained as to common assault and batteries, may proceed to hear and determine the same in a summary way, and if the same be proved, may convict the person accused, and every such offender shall be liable to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding six months, or to pay a fine not exceeding 20*l.*" The language of that section satisfies me that the information laid is for an assault and battery, and then if it appears that it is an assault and battery on a female of an aggravated nature, the magistrates may deal with it by inflicting a heavier punishment than they could inflict under sect. 42. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the proper way of proceeding is to lay the information for an assault and battery, and then it is for the magistrates to deal with the case under sect. 42, or if they think fit under sect. 43. That is a matter for their consideration. It does not follow in the slightest degree that because they have not gone to the full extent of the powers given them by sect. 43, that they never took the aggravated assault into consideration at all. Indeed, the fact is that they adjudged the defendant to pay a fine for the assault on the husband, and for the assault on the wife they adjudged him to pay the costs and to be imprisoned. Quite independently of authority, therefore, I think upon the proper construction of sects. 42 and 43, that the magistrates have dealt with the assault upon the female plaintiff, and that there can therefore be no further proceeding. With regard to the authorities, I think the case of Masper v. Brown, referred to by the learned counsel for the defendant, is in point, and I can see no distinction between that case and the present. The other cases cited in the course of the argument have, I think, no reference to the case before me.

notice, and in case of default may themselves curred in ten days in a summary manner from the owners according to the frontage of the premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or, in case of dispute, by arbitration.

The respondents were owners of premises divided by a narrow stream from a street which had been sewered, &c., under the provisions of the above-mentioned section. The respondents' premises communicated with the street by means of two bridges, one of which belonged to them. The respondents had gates on their own premises, by which they were enabled effectually to close all communication between their premises and the street.

Held, on the above facts, that the respondents' premises fell within the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69; per Field and Grove, JJ., because they fronted and abutted upon the street; per Cleasby, B. (with considerable doubt), because they adjoined the street.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Wakefield, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 63.

At a petty session holden on the 10th March 1875, a complaint was preferred by the appellants under the Public Health Act 1848, s. 69 (a), charging that prior to and on the 3rd April 1872, and thenceforward until after the service of the notice next mentioned, a street called Dyehouse-lane, situate within the district of the appellants' parish (not being a highway within the meaning of the statutes in that behalf), was not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the said board, whereupon the said board did, on the 15th Nov. 1872, by written notice in the form or to the effect provided by the statutes in that behalf, and dated the 3rd April 1872, to the respective owners and occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, and abutting upon such part of the same street as required to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled, require the said owners to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel the said street within six weeks from the service of the said notice in manner in the said notice described; that the said notice was not complied with as by law required; and therefore the said board thought fit to execute, and did thereafter execute the works mentioned and referred to therein; that the proportion of the expenses incurred by the said board in so executing the said works to be paid by the respective owners of premises so fronting, adjoining, and abutting as aforesaid, according to the frontage of their respective premises, were afterwards, to wit, on the 27th April 1874, duly settled by the surveyor of the said board, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and pursuant to the statutes on that behalf; that notice of the amount of the said proportion so settled by the said surveyor was, in accordance with the statutes in that behalf, given more than three calendar months before the 3rd Feb. 1875, being the day of complaint, namely, on or about the 9th June 1874, duly given to all the said owners, and the respective proportions of the said expenses to be paid by the said owners respectively, had theretofore and more than three calendar months before the date of the complaint been duly demanded of all the said owners; but that the respondents, two of the said owners within the meaning of the statute in that behalf made, had not paid, but had refused to pay, that proportion of the expenses so due from them as aforesaid, amounting to the sum of 145*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, nor had paid, but had refused to pay, the interest in respect of the said sum by law payable by them to the said board, and had not within the time limited by the statute in that behalf, and in manner thereby described, disputed the same; and that there was, therefore, then due from them to the said board, in respect of the premises, the said sum of 145*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, and the further sum of 4*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* for interest on the said first-mentioned sum, pursuant to the statute in that behalf, making together the sum of 150*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*, for the recovery of which last-mentioned sum these proceedings were taken.

At the hearing the respondents' solicitor admitted the regularity of the preliminary proceedings taken by the board, and that Dyehouse-lane was a street repairable by the owners adjoining or abutting thereupon.

The street called Dyehouse-lane was situate within the appellants' district, and on the east side of the stream called the River Chald or Ings Beck, which divided the townships of Wakefield and Alverthorpe-with-Thornes, and also divided the premises of which the respondents were owners from Dyehouse-lane. There were two communications with the respondents' premises out of Dyehouse-lane and over the beck by means of two bridges. One of these bridges was made of brick arched over the beck, and might be used by horses, carts, and other carriages, and by foot passengers. The other bridge was a wooden foot bridge, and could only be used by foot passengers. The respondents had gates on their own premises, by means of which they could at their own will and pleasure effectually close all communication between their premises and Dyehouse-lane, and these gates were the only obstructions to the free ingress and egress over the bridges to and from the respondents' premises; but it was stated by one of the respondents that he had known only one cart go over the brick bridge within the last ten years. These bridges had directly communicated between the respondents' premises and Dyehouse-lane for a great number of years, but there was no evidence adduced showing by whom they were erected. It was proved that they had been in existence for fifty years or upwards, and it was also proved that the wooden foot bridge was removed by the respondents at their own cost from its original position some seven or eight years ago, and that it still communicated between their premises and Dyehouse-lane. It was not proved by whom either of the said bridges had been repaired, or that they had ever been repaired by the respondents, except so far as the wooden foot bridge was altered and repaired by them on its removal as aforesaid.

(a) By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69, it is provided as follows: "In case any present or future street, or any part thereof (not being a highway), be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled, to the satisfaction of the local board of health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, or channelled, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, or channel the same within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or, in case of dispute, as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case), in the manner provided by this Act; and such expenses may be recovered from the last mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided."

The appellants admitted that they had cleansed or paid for the cleansing of the stream called Chald or Ings Beck up to the middle thereof co-extensive with their premises. The respondents proved that the principal entrance used to their premises was from the street called Westgate, in Wakefield, and not from either of the bridges.

The appellants contended, through their counsel, that the Chalk or Ings Beck was a fence bounding the respondent's property, and that as the respondents had two communications from Dyehouse-lane over the beck by means of an arched bridge for carts as well as foot passengers, and a wooden bridge for foot passengers, their premises fronted, adjoined, or abutted upon Dyehouse-lane in respect of the whole of the frontage of their premises co-extensive with the stream called Chald or Ings Beck.

The respondents contended, through their solicitor, that no part of their property fronted, adjoined, or abutted upon Dyehouse-lane, and produced a conveyance, dated 11th July 1845, of the land and premises in respect of which the present claim was made, upon which conveyance was indorsed a plan of the premises purporting to be thereby granted. According to this plan, the land of the respondents extended only as far as the bank of the stream next their property. They further contended that no part of the stream called Chald or Ings Beck, or the two bridges crossing over it, formed part of the premises in the said conveyance mentioned; that as the principal entrance to their premises was from the street called Westgate, they could not be owners of premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon Dyehouse-lane within the meaning of the Act; that the centre of the stream formed the boundary between the township of Wakefield and the township of Alverthorpe-with-Thornes; and that, supposing the respondents had any right to the stream, it would only be as an easement to the centre thereof in the township of Wakefield, and that the other half of the said stream would therefore front, adjoin, and abut upon Dyehouse-lane in the township of Alverthorpe-with-Thornes; that the respondents could not maintain an action for damages done to the bridge crossing the stream, and that under the circumstances they could not be held liable to pay any proportion of the cost of repairing Dyehouse-lane, it being divided from their premises by the stream as before mentioned. The appellants' counsel argued in reply that, if the respondents were owners up to the middle of the stream, it was quite clear they were owners up to the street, for the other half of the stream, from the centre thereof, was portion of the street, and therefore the respondents' premises fronted, adjoined, and abutted upon Dyehouse-lane. We were of opinion that the respondents under the circumstances, were not liable, and accordingly dismissed the complaint, but consented to state a case. The question of law is whether the respondents were liable to pay to the appellants a portion of the cost of sewerage, levelling, paving, flagging, and channelling Dyehouse-lane.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—CLEASBY, B.—The question here is, whether the premises of the respondent have been brought within the provisions of the 69th section of the Public Health Act 1848, and whether they can be said to be "fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon" Dyehouse-lane. The facts are shortly as follows: Between the respondents' premises and the lane there is a narrow stream. It seems clear that the whole of the bed of this stream does not belong to the respondents, and the evidence before us tends to show that their boundary was the edge of the bank next their land. Two bridges form the means of communication between the respondents' premises and the street; one of them is of brick, but it was not clearly proved to whom it belonged; it had been only once crossed by a cart during ten years. Besides that there was a wooden bridge, and it appeared to belong to the respondents, for they had removed it, and had exercised such rights relating to it as they thought proper. The respondents could, for all practical purposes, prevent anyone from using the bridge without their consent. We have now to consider whether, upon these facts, the respondents are liable to pay the amount claimed from them. I do not think the Legislature intended the words used in the 69th section to have the same meaning. One of the words which the statute uses is the word "abutting," and in considering whether the respondents' premises "abut" upon Dyehouse-lane, we ought not to forget that the premises in question are on the opposite side of the bridge. I am of opinion that the respondents' premises do not "abut" upon the street, because there is this stream between them, which is not part of the premises, and does not belong to the respondents. I may remark that if the respondents' premises do either front, adjoin, or abut upon a street, the fact that for practical purposes they gain no benefit from their proximity to the lane, is unimportant. Owners and occupiers falling within the provisions of the statute are to be assessed according to their frontages, and the argument that those who derive no advantage are not bound to pay is not warranted by the words of the statute: (See R. v. Newport Local Board of Health (ubi sup.)). There are two other points to be determined, namely, whether the premises "front" or "adjoin" the street. I confess it does not appear to me that upon the facts stated the premises front the street. Then do they "adjoin"? Now, it occurs to me that as the stream between the street and premises is of very small width, it is not using the word in an unreasonable sense to say they adjoin. The question is substantially one of fact, and the answer might be different if the stream could only be crossed by a ferry. On the whole I should have felt inclined to abide by the decision of the justices: but as both my learned brothers are of opinion that their judgment was wrong, I do not feel inclined to differ from them. The authorities, with the exception of R. v. Newport (ubi sup.), throw no light upon the construction of this section; and the decision in Baddeley v. Giggell (ubi sup.) was upon a different statute, and the question raised was whether certain houses in a yard could be said to be "within a street;" there the property had a frontage in the street, and its side communication was with the street. In the School Board for London v. Vestry of St. Mary Islington (ubi sup.), the question was whether certain land situated behind a row of houses fronting the street "formed part of a street," and great stress was placed by the learned judges on the fact that the only passage out was by passing to the street. The facts in both these cases are very different to the one now before us, and do not, in my judgment, at all aid us in arriving at a conclusion.

GROVE, J.—I think the appellants are entitled to our judgment. If the questions here were of fact I should be inclined to agree with my brother Cleasby, that we ought not to interfere with the decision of the magistrates; what, however, we have to determine is whether upon the facts as stated the defendants' premises are really "fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon" Dyehouse-lane. I feel considerable doubt whether, save in mathematics, there can be exact definitions of words; they must be construed with reference to the subject matter to which they are applied. The question is whether the respondents' premises can be said to "front, adjoin, or abut" the street known as Dyehouse-lane. Now, it is a fact beyond dispute that between the premises and street was a stream of which the breadth was about fifteen feet. Now, I am inclined to think that if a natural division of this kind existed, without any means of access from the one side to the other, that would have been a sufficient interruption to prevent the premises from being brought within the words of the section. But the case does not stop here. We find that there are two bridges over this stream, one of which apparently was the property of the respondents, and under their control. As regards the other bridge no act of ownership was adduced, though that was also under the respondents' control; and carriages coming over it could only gain access to the premises when the respondents opened their gates. I think the premises may be fairly said to "abut" and "front" the street, even if they cannot be said to "adjoin" it. The authorities cited throw some light on this question. In Baddely v. Giggell (ubi sup.) the occupiers of houses situated in a yard were held liable to be rated as being within a street, though they were separated from the street by other buildings. In the School Board case (ubi sup.) the question was whether certain houses "formed a street," and Cockburn, C.J., in the course of his judgment, said: "It matters not in point of justice of the case that the house, instead of actually fronting the street, stands in the rear of the street if it has its access from the street. It is the benefit of access to the premises which must be supposed to be the foundation of the liability which the Legislature thinks fit to impose." This is an à fortiori case in favour of the appellant, since the words "abutting and adjoining" are not so strong as "forming part of." These premises are in no way fenced off from the street, and I think they clearly front and abut upon Dyehouse-lane, and that the respondents are accordingly liable to pay their proportion of the expenses. I will only add that my brother Field agrees with me in the conclusion I have arrived at.

MUSSETT v. BURCH.

Justices' jurisdiction—Bona fide claim of right—Navigable non-tidal river—Public right of fishing—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 24.

The right of the public to fish in a non-tidal river which is made navigable by locks cannot exist in law.

The appellant was convicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 24 of fishing in water which was private property. The water was part of a navigable river, which was not tidal, and which was navigated by means of locks. At the hearing the appellant set up a public right of fishing, and argued that the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted by such bona fide claim of right.

Held, upon a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that no such right could exist in law, and therefore the jurisdiction of the justices was not ousted.

THIS was a case stated by the justices of Essex, before whom the appellant had been tried on the 15th Jan. 1876, upon an information which charged that he, Thomas Mussett, of Bures St. Mary, in the county of Suffolk, did unlawfully and wilfully, by angling in the day time, take fish in certain water then and there running through certain land belonging to Zachariah Pettitt, the owner of such water, and having a right of fishery therein, contrary to the form, &c.

The above information was laid by George Burch, water bailiff to the Stour Angling Preservation Society.

It further appeared from the case stated that the river referred to, the Stour, is navigable and that it is now used by the Stour Navigation Company by means of locks.

Two or three witnesses deposed that they had fished in the said river for upwards of forty years without interruption.

At the hearing Mussett set up his right to fish in the river as one of the public, and objected that the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted thereby. They nevertheless convicted him, and ordered him to pay a fine of 5s. and costs.

Against this order Mussett now appealed.

Graham, for the appellant.—The information in this case was laid under the 24th section of the Larceny Act, so that a mere bona fide claim of right is sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the justices, for there is no proviso in this Act as in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52, as to a fair and reasonable claim: (White v. Feast, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 353.) The question is, then, did the appellant make a bona fide claim of right? if so, the justices were bound to hold their hands: (Reg. v. Stimpson, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 B. & S. 301; Cornwell v. Sanders, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 356; 3 B. & S. 206; 32 L. J. 6, M. C.) Still, it is impossible to contend that every bonâ fide claim of right is sufficient; it must be such a claim as can exist in law: (Hudson v. McCrea, 4 B. & S. 585; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 678; 33 L. J. 65, M. C.) And that case also decides that no right to fish in a non-navigable river can exist in the public. It is admitted that the public have a right to fish in a tidal river. The third case, of a river which is navigable but not tidal is the one before us, and on that there has been no distinct decision in the English courts. Reg. v. Burrow (34 Just. of Peace 53) shows that such a claim may be bonâ fide raised in the case of a navigable lake, and that case is subsequent to Murphy v. Ryan (Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 143). The case is one of doubt, and therefore the justices should have stayed their hands. The case states that this is a navigable river. If there is any Act of Parliament with regard to the fishing, it is for the other side to produce it, otherwise this case will not be within Hargreaves v. Diddams (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 600; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 582).

Croome (Jones with him).—Reg. v. Stimpson is not applicable to the present case, for there the right could exist in the public, because the river was tidal, but Hudson v. McCrea is in point. In that case the fishing had been uninterrupted for sixty years, but as the river was not navigable it was held that a right to fish could not exist in the public. The decision in Reg. v. Burrow does not touch this case at all, as the fishing there was in a lake and not in a river; even if it were in point, it would be distinctly overruled by Hargreaves v. Diddams (ubi sup.). The river in question in that case was originally not navigable, but it was made so by Act of Parliament and various tolls granted, and there it was held that no right of fishing could exist in the public. Not a single case can be found in which it has been held that the public have such a right in a river which is not tidal.

Graham, in reply.—It is enough for me to show that the justices have decided what is in reality a doubtful case; that being so, Reg. v. Burrow is in point, and the jurisdiction of the justices is ousted.

CLEASBY, B.—It appears to me that the question which arises in this case is governed by the decision in Hargreaves v. Diddams. The real question is, did a matter of title come before the justices? If it did, they were not entitled to decide it. It is not necessary to ask, was the title established, but did it come in question? Nor is it sufficient that a bonâ fide claim should be raised, but it must be of some right which the law allows. We must not ask whether the appellant had the right in question, but whether such a condition of things exists as would enable him reasonably and fairly to claim such a right. Now, it appears to me that the case in the Irish reports (Murphy v. Ryan) is decisive on the point before us. It expressly decides that "the public cannot acquire by immemorial usage any right of fishing in a river in which, though it be navigable, the tide does not ebb and flow," and the following passage is there cited from Hale (De Jure Maris, p. 12): "That is called an arm of the sea where the sea flows and reflows, and so far only as the sea flows and reflows," and, it proceeds, that "only in such water is there primâ facie a right of fishing common to all." If the river in question were not navigable, Hudson v. McCrea would be directly in point to decide that no such right could be raised. Some doubts, however, seem to have been raised with regard to that case by observations made in the case of Reg. v. Burrow. But subsequently to that decision we have the judgment in Hargreaves v. Diddams, upon which I think we ought to act in this case. Lush, J. there says: "It is true that this part of the river was made navigable to the public on payment of tolls under the Act of Parliament, but that did not affect the ownership of the soil, and none of the incidents attaching to a navigable river up to the flow and reflow of the tide can properly attach here." We must deal in the present case with the facts that appear before us, it already having been decided that where a river is made navigable the right of fishing is private. Now, here the facts are precisely the same, for we have it as a fact that the river is navigated and used by the Stour Navigation Company by means of locks. It appears as a fact that the locks exist, and therefore primâ facie the river would not be navigable without such locks, and that the making of such locks does not interfere with private rights of ownership of soil is distinctly decided in Hargreaves v. Diddams. The conviction must therefore stand.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Graham has not shown us any case in which the public have been held to have a right of fishing in a river merely because it is navigable or navigated by boats. Can the right to navigate give the right to fish? No case has been made out to satisfy the court that such is the law. My brother Lush's judgment in Hargreaves v. Diddams already referred to, seems clearly in point here, and shows that no such right can exist. Again, we have the case Murphy v. Ryan, which expressly decides that the public can have no right of fishing in a river which is not tidal. The only case causing any doubt is that of Reg. v. Burrow, but that was the case of a lake, not a river, and Mellor, J. appears to base his judgment on the fact that the claim was raised by the occupier of a certain cottage who claimed on the ground of such occupation, and not as one of the general public. Be that as it may, the other cases referred to are too strong to leave any doubt on the question. The claim now set up is one that cannot exist in law, but if that were not so as the claim is so unusual an one that the onus would rest upon the respondent to show that such a right might exist. The locks were probably made within the memory of man, and the defendant ought to have proved that before those locks existed the river was navigable. He has not done so. On these grounds my judgment must be for the respondent.

Conviction affirmed.

SNAILBEACH MINE COMPANY (LIMITED) (apps.) v. FORDEN GUARDIANS (resps.).

Rateability of lead mine—Smelting works—Promises out of union—The Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), s. 7.

The appellants occupy a lead mine held under a lease, which comprises land and works in a neighbouring union, the mine and most of the works being in that of the respondents. After the ore is crushed and washed, it is taken by a tramway about half a mile to a smelting house, occupied under the same lease, in the neighbouring union, where the ore is converted into lead for sale. The appellants were rated under the Rating Act 1874, sect. 7, for their mine in the respondents' union at the amount of the whole of the dues payable in respect of the mine under the lease during the previous years. They were separately rated for part of the tramway to, and a chimney from, the smelting house, which were situated in the respondents' union; and were also rated by the neighbouring union for the land, works, and smelting house there situated.

Held, that all these crushing, washing and smelting works were included under the definition in sect. 7, as in connection with and for the purposes of the mine; and that a deduction should be made from the gross dues in respect of the rateable premises out of the union, in order to obtain the rateable value of the mine in the respondents' union.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the court on an appeal against an assessment and supplemental assessment, and a rate in conformity with such assessments made for relief of the poor in the parish of Worthen, in the county of Salop, and in the Forden Union, on the appellants, as occupiers of a lead mine called the Snailbeach Mine, and of certain lands, buildings, machinery, and tramways connected therewith or adjacent thereto.

The said rate was made in conformity with the valuation lists as hereinafter mentioned, which were duly objected to before the assessment committee, who declined to interfere. All notices necessary for appeal to the quarter sessions were duly given by the appellants, the appeal was duly entered and respited, and by the consent of the parties and an order of Master Unthank, dated 20th Jan. 1876, the following case was stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, for the opinion of the court:

1. The Forden union comprises, with others, the parish of Worthen, which adjoins the township of Minsterley, in the parish of Westbury, in the same county, but which township of Minsterley is comprised in the Atcham union.

The appellants occupy the Snailbeach mine as lessees under two several leases, one from the Earl of Tankerville, dated the 25th March 1858, and the other from the Marquis of Bath, dated 1st Nov. 1874. The whole of the lands comprised in the said lease from the Earl of Tankerville are situate in the parish of Worthen aforesaid, but the said lease from the Marquis of Bath comprises lands and works part of which are in the parish of Worthen aforesaid, and part in Minsterley township aforesaid.

3. The particular parts of the underground workings from which ores are at this moment actually obtained are wholly situate in the parish of Worthen, some of them being comprised in the lease from the Earl of Tankerville, and the residue in the lease from the Marquis of Bath.

4. The underground works are connected with the surface by two vertical shafts, worked by means of two steam engines, one of which is used for lifting the ore and spar in which it is found embedded, and the other for pumping the water from the underground workings.

5. The mixed spar and ore when so raised from the underground workings is conveyed to a landing stage situate about 20 yards from the top of the shaft (which is on the hill side), and thence conveyed to the surface in waggons through a horizontal level or tunnel about 154 yards in length to an outlet, also in the parish of Worthen. The spar and ore is then dealt with by the appellants in manner hereinafter described.

6. The steam engines, shafts, tunnel, and outlets therefrom respectively, are situated in the parish of Worthen, and within the land comprised in the lease from the Marquis of Bath.

7. The spar and ore, when brought to the outlet, is conveyed a distance of about 30 yards, by a tramway, to a tip, where the blocks of spar are deposited on a floor. By the operation of tipping a certain amount of breakage results, and some small ore is separated from the mass.

8. The unbroken masses are then conveyed a few yards, by wheelbarrows, across the parish boundary, to a crushing house, situated in the township of Minsterley, and where, by the operation of crushing, the ore is made separable from the spar in which it had been embedded. This crushing is effected by passing the material between iron rollers or wheels worked by steam. It is then taken, together with the small ore, to washing floors, which are situate entirely within the township of Minsterley, in the Atcham union, and by the process of washing the ore is separated from the spar, and so rendered fit for smelting. The ore in point of fact sinks to the bottom, as being the heavier, and the lighter spar is washed away.

9. The great bulk of the ore, when washed, is shot into a receptacle beneath the washing floor by means of a tunnel about 50 yards long; it is conveyed to the "ore bin," also in Minsterley parish, where it is weighed; the water from the washing floors, which still contains minute particles of crushed ore is passed through two pits, by which process the dust ore is precipitated and collected, and is afterwards conveyed to the ore bin.

10. After the ore is weighed it is taken by tramway to a smelting house, which is situated in the township of Minsterley, at a distance of about five-eighths of a mile from the bin. The ore is then smelted, whereby it is converted into lead for sale.

11. The whole of the tramway, from the outlet of the mine to the tip, is in Worthen parish, in land comprised in the lease from the Marquis of Bath; part of the floor on which the ore is deposited by the tip is in Worthen parish, in land comprised in the lease from the Marquis of Bath, and part in Minsterley township.

12. The crushing house, the washing floors (three in number), and all the works necessary for the subsequent operations, except portions of the tramway to the smelting house and of the flue of the chimney hereinafter described) are in Minsterley township.

13. The tramway, in its course to the smelting house, enters Worthen parish and traverses it for about a distance of 220 yards through lands comprised in the lease of the Marquis of Bath, when it recrosses the parish boundary into Minsterley township, and during the remainder of its course to the smelting house is situate in Minsterley township.

14. A straight underground flue passes from the smelting house, in the first place, about 748 yards through land in Minsterley township, and then about 484 yards through land in Worthen parish, and comprised in the said lease from the Marquis of Bath, and terminates by a chimney, which is also situate in that parish and in land comprised in that lease.

The flue and chimney are used for the purpose of collecting the small particles of lead which are carried away out of the smelting furnace by the heated air and smoke, and gradually deposited on the sides of the flue, from whence they are removed periodically; and such small particles of lead, when so collected, form what is commercially known as "flue dust."

15. All the works, buildings, and tramways described as in Minsterley township, in Atcham Union, are comprised in the lease from the Marquis of Bath.

16. All the surface works are situated on land comprised in the lease from the Marquis of Bath.

17. The leases under which the mine is occupied are each of them granted without fine on a reservation wholly of dues within the meaning of the Rating Act 1874; the leases were made part of the case.

18. The persons respectively receiving the dues under the leases are not liable for repairs, insurance, or other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command the annual amount of dues within the meaning of the Rating Act 1874.

19. The amount of the whole of the dues payable in respect of the mine, under the said leases, during the year 1874, was, under the lease from the Marquis of Bath, 3143*l.*, and under that from the Earl of Tankerville, 659*l.*

20. In July 1875, on behalf of the Forden Union, a substantial valuation list was duly deposited, in which the said mine was assessed as follows:—

No. 609. Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, the Marquis of Bath; description, lead mine; situation, Snailbeach; gross estimated rental, 3143*l.*; Rateable value, 3143*l.*; former amounts—gross 587*l.*, rateable value 440*l.*

No. 610. Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, the Earl of Tankerville; description, lead mine; situation, Snailbeach and Lordshill; gross estimated rental, 659*l.*; rateable value, 659*l.*; former amounts—gross 15*l.*, rateable value 12*l.* 10*s.*

The former amounts are those at which the surface works in connection with the said mine were assessed prior to the Rating Act 1874.

21. A supplemental valuation list was afterwards duly deposited on behalf of the said Forden Union, of which the following is a copy:—

Occupier, the Snailbeach Mining Company; owner, the Marquis of Bath; description, tramway from ore bin to smelting house, tunnel or flue from smelting house to chimney; chimney; situation, Snailbeach; gross estimated rental, 120*l.*; rateable value, 96*l.*

The amount of the gross and rateable value therein stated is correct, if the property described is separately rateable.

22. The "tramway" described in the last mentioned valuation list is part of the tramway from the ore bin to the smelting house described in the 13th paragraph hereof.

23. The "tunnel or flue from smelting house to chimney" is so much of the tunnel or flue described in the 14th paragraph hereof as is situate within Worthen parish. The chimney is that described in the said 14th paragraph hereof.

24. The said valuation lists were duly approved and confirmed and delivered to the overseers of Worthen aforesaid, and a poor's rate of 1*s.* in the pound was made by them on the 30th Sept. 1875, and duly allowed and published. The following is an extract from the said rate so far as it affects the said mine, tramway, tunnel or flue, and chimney:

No. 643. Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, Marquis of Bath; description, tramway from ore bin to smelting house, tunnel or flue from smelting house to chimney, and chimney; situation, Snailbeach; gross estimated rental, 120*l.*; rateable value, 96*l.*; rate at 1*s.* in pound, 4*l.* 16*s.*

No. 644. Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, Marquis of Bath; description, lead mine; situation, Snailbeach; gross estimated rental, 3143*l.*; rateable value, 3143*l.*; rate at 1*s.* in pound, 157*l.* 3*s.*

No. 645. Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, Earl of Tankerville; description, lead mine; situation, Snailbeach and Lordshill; gross estimated rental, 659*l.*; rateable value, 659*l.*; rate at 1*s.* in pound, 32*l.* 19*s.*

25. A valuation list was in 1875 duly deposited on behalf of the said Atcham Union in respect of lands and works connected with or adjacent to the said mine, situate within the said Atcham Union, of which the following is a copy:

Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, Marquis of Bath; description, crushing and dressing machinery, tramways, outhouses, washing floors, offices, timber yard, workshops, part of tunnel, engine, and spoilbanks; situation, Snailbeach mine; gross estimated rental, 600*l.*; rateable value, 450*l.*

Occupier, Snailbeach Mining Company (Limited); owner, Marquis of Bath; description, smelting houses; situation, Snailbeach mine; gross estimated rental, 350*l.*; rateable value, 262*l.* 10*s.*

26. The crushing and dressing machinery, tramways, washing floors, part of tunnel, and smelting houses are those already described herein in paragraphs 8, 9, 10, 11, and 13, so far as the same are situate within Minsterley township in the Atcham Union.

27. The valuation list deposited by the Atcham Union has been appealed against by the appellants, but the decision of the assessment committee of such Atcham Union has not yet been made known to the appellants.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:—First, whether the whole of the land, surface works, smelting houses, and other matters and things hereinbefore described and included in the said supplemental valuation list of the respondents' union, and the said valuation list of the said Atcham Union are to be regarded as part of the mine, and so treated for rating purposes within the meaning of the Rating Act 1874, and as covered by the rate payable in respect of dues payable during the preceding year, or whether they are liable to be separately assessed and rated, as distinct and separate from the mine; secondly, if the answer to question one be that such lands, surface works, matters and things are not to be regarded as wholly included for rating purposes in the Snailbeach mine, then whether any portion thereof, and what portion, ought not to be so included, the court being respectfully requested to state the principle upon which the dividing line between those which ought not to be so included is to be drawn; thirdly, if the answer to question one be that such lands, surface works, matters and things are to be regarded as included for rating purposes within the Snailbeach mine, then are the appellants to be rated to the respondents' union and parish for the whole amount of the rateable value (i.e., the annual amount of the whole of the dues payable during the preceding year) of such mine, or are they entitled to any deduction in the assessment for the respondents' union by reason of part of the works being locally situated as hereinbefore described within the said Atcham Union, and liable to be assessed there also; the court being respectfully requested to state the principle upon which such deduction, if any, is to be made.

It has been and it is agreed that a judgment in conformity with the decision of the court, and for costs as this court shall adjudge, may be entered on motion by either party at the quarter sessions next, or next but one, after such decision shall have been given.

Nov. 11.—Webster (with him Venables) argued for the appellants.—The mining company are rated in the parish of Worthen at the amount of the whole of the dues payable in respect of the whole mine, although they are also rated in the parish of Minsterley for the proportion of dues in respect of the surface premises in that parish. There is also a separate assessment of the smelting house and premises which must now be taken to be part of the mine. The section of the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54) which is important for the decision of these questions is the 7th. "Where a tin, lead, or copper mine is occupied under a lease or leases granted without fine on a reservation wholly or partly of dues or rent, the gross value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the whole of the dues payable in respect thereof during the year ending on the 31st Dec. preceding the date at which the valuation list is made in addition to the annual amount of any fixed rent reserved for the same which may not be paid or satisfied by such dues. The rateable annual value of such mine shall be the same as the gross value thereof, except that where the person receiving the dues or rent is liable for repairs, insurance, or other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command the annual amount of dues or rent, the average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses for which he is so liable, shall be deducted from the gross value for the purpose of calculating the rateable value. In the following cases, namely: First, where any such mine is occupied under a lease granted wholly or partly on a fine; secondly, where any such mine is occupied and worked by the owner; and, thirdly, in the case of any other such mine which is not excepted from the provisions of this Act, and to which the foregoing provisions of this section do not apply, the gross and rateable annual value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the dues or dues and rent at which the mine might be reasonably expected to let without fine on a lease of the ordinary duration according to the usage of the country if the tenant undertook to pay all tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe rentcharge, and also the repairs, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command such annual amount of dues or dues and rent. The purser, secretary, and chief managing agent for the time being, of any tin, lead, or copper mine, or any of them, may, if the overseers or other rating authority think fit, be rated as the occupier thereof. In this section the term 'mine,' when a mine is occupied under a lease, includes the underground workings and the engines, machinery, workshops, tramways, and other plant, buildings (not being dwelling houses), and works and surface of land occupied in connection with and for the purposes of the mine, and situate within the boundaries of the land comprised in the lease or leases under which the dues or dues and rent are payable or reserved. The term 'dues' means dues, royalty, or toll, either in money, or partly in money and partly in kind; and the amount of dues which are reserved in kind means the value of such dues. The term 'lease' means lease or sett or licence to work or agreement for a lease or sett or licence to work. The term 'fine' means fine, premium, or foregift, or other payment or consideration in the nature thereof." The only case in which this Act has been discussed with respect to a lead mine is The Van Mining Company (Limited) v. Llanidloes (L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 310), but no interpretation was there put upon what was to be included under the words "in connection with the mine."

McIntyre, Q.C. (with him Arbuthnot) for the respondents.—Nothing can be said to be in connection with and for the purposes of the mine, which is for the purpose of dealing with the material after it has been brought to the surface. If the premises for smelting are to be included in the mine itself, the words of the definition must be read as if they were also "and relating to the manufactory of the ore." The effect of the Rating Act 1874 is to make mines rateable besides the premises connected with them which were rateable before. In Rex v. Earl of Pomfret (5 M. & S. 139), a rate was imposed in respect of one-fifth share of the lead to be smelted from the ore raised from some lead mines, of which the appellant was owner of the ore. Lord Ellenborough, in his judgment, said, at p. 143, "But this is not a reservation of any part of the thing demised, it is not a reservation of any part of the ore, or of the mineral, in its natural and primitive state, but of something of a quality, name, and character entirely different; of a metal produced from that mineral by the laborious and expensive process of smelting, in which the native mineral is mixed with another matter, viz., with coal or charcoal; and by the effect of fire upon both a metal is obtained which is to be considered, for this purpose at least, as entirely different from either of the two, and rather as a manufacture of art and labour resulting from the use and application of these materials than the original earth itself." This is a conclusive authority for the respondents with respect to the smelting-houses and the tramway leading to them; and this being so, where should the line be drawn, except at the arrival of the ore on the surface? In the case of Talargoch Mining Company v. St. Asaph Union (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 478), a watercourse for the purpose of working the machinery connected with a lead mine was held to be rateable apart from the mine, although the mine was not rateable. So with respect to the surface lands, buildings, machinery, workshops, and tramways in connection with an iron mine, in Quest v. East Dean (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 334). [CLEASBY, B.—The definition of mine in the Act of 1874 expressly includes some premises of this kind. MELLOR, J.—These cases, therefore, do not touch the questions we are asked.]

under this definition of a mine the whole of the appellants' premises in the parish of Worthen should not be assessed together. But even if there should be a distinction between the dressing and the smelting houses, the whole of the dues payable in respect of the mine under the leases is too high an amount for the assessment of the mine in one parish only. The respondents must abide by the definition in sect. 7, or the whole assessment would under sect. 13 be bad, according to The Van Mining Company (Limited) v. Llanidloes.

MELLOR, J.—I think it is not necessary for us formally to answer all these questions reserved for us. The contention in the case depends upon the construction of the definition of a mine contained in sect. 7 of the Rating Act 1874, and we are of opinion that Mr. Webster is right so far that the rateable value of the mine in this parish must be estimated at a reduction from the gross value under the leases by so much of the dues payable in respect of the premises on the surface in the parish of Minsterley, and also by so much of the dues payable in respect of the buildings in the same parish which are separately rated. Whether the smelting house and the tramway are to be taken as works occupied in connection with and for the purposes of the mine is a matter which we will further consider if necessary. The proportional deductions are all questions of fact, and the amount must be settled elsewhere. We are clearly of opinion that there must be a diminution from the gross receipts of the value of the hereditaments separately rated in order to obtain the rateable value of the mine.

CLEASBY, B.—It seems to me that sect. 7 of the Act is conclusive as to our judgment for the appellants. I think it was intended to be a guide for the rating of mines, and it abolishes all principles to be inferred from previous cases on the subject. I certainly see no intention in the section to enable the rating authorities to assess any part of the mine twice over; and if there be any buildings, or other premises which should be rated separately from the mine itself, either in consequence of their position in another parish, or their not being connected with or for the purpose of the mine, then a deduction must be made in respect of those premises from the gross dues payable under the lease of the mine. And if the gross dues are the right measure of the rateable value, none of the premises for which those dues are payable ought to be rated a second time. This will necessarily involve some reduction of the rateable value, and for myself I may say I see nothing in this case to separate any of the buildings or works mentioned from the mine itself. There must be a deduction from the assessment of the amount of the dues proportional to the buildings in the next parish; in this we both agree. It seems to me that the smelting works are in connection with and for the purpose of the mine, but of this we will consider further.

Nov. 16.—CLEASBY B.—Upon further consideration my brother Mellor and I agree that no distinction can be drawn upon the facts stated in this case between the smelting house and the other parts of the mine. They all, in our opinion, come within the definition of the 7th section of the Rating Act, and are in connection with and for the purposes of the mine. It seems, however, as the case is stated, that it can be no consequence to the appellants whether the smelting works are rated separately or not. We have already decided that a deduction must be made from the gross dues in respect of works otherwise rated in order to obtain the rateable value of the mine itself, and apparently it cannot affect the total rateability whether the separate assessment of the smelting works be struck out, or whether the mine be assessed at a proportional reduction. At all events, if it be of any importance, we are prepared to hold that upon the statement of this case the term "mine" includes these smelting works.

SCOTT v. LEGG.

Covering in new building without party wall—Addition to old building—Metropolitan Building Act 1855, sects. 9, 27, 28, 46.

By the Metropolitan Building Act, s. 9, any alteration, addition, or other work made upon an old building is to the extent of such alteration subject to the provisions of the Act, which does not otherwise apply to old buildings. By sect. 27, rule 4, every warehouse containing more than 216,000 cubic feet must be divided by party walls in such manner that the contents of each division shall not exceed such number of feet. By sect. 28, rule 2, no buildings "shall be united, if when so united, they will, considered as one building only, be in contravention of any of the provisions of the Act." And by sect. 46 a justice of the peace may make an order on any builder commanding him to comply with the requisitions of a surveyor made in cases of contravention of the Act.

The appellant, by taking down one of the external walls of an old building, containing more than 216,000 cubic feet, made an addition containing less than 216,000 cubic feet.

Held, that such addition was within the statute, and that the order of a stipendiary magistrate commanding him to divide the old building from the new was good.

This was a special case stated pursuant to the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, ss. 106 and 107, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law as hereinafter stated.

1. On the 22nd July 1875, a complaint preferred by Henry Simpson Legg (hereinafter called the respondent) against William Scott (hereinafter called the appellant) under sect. 46 of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, charging that the said appellant did complete the covering in of a new building erected and united to the then present building, viz., the Anchor Brewery, Mile-end-road, without a party wall, the building so united exceeding the cubical contents allowed by the Metropolitan Building Act above-mentioned, and as required by sect. 27, r. 4 and sect. 28, r. 2 thereof, was heard before H. J. Bushby, Esq., the magistrate of the Worship-street Police Court, and upon such hearing the said magistrate made an order that the appellant should erect a proper party wall so as to divide the new building from the old.

2. Upon the hearing of the complaint the following facts were proved by the respondent and admitted by the appellant.

3. The appellant, the builder, as defined by the 3rd section of the said Metropolitan Building Act 1855, was also the clerk of the works to Messrs. Charrington, Head, and Company, of the Anchor Brewery, Mile-end-road, and the respondent was the district surveyor, under the said Metropolitan Building Act 1855, of the hamlet of Mile End Old Town.

4. The Anchor Brewery, to which the new building is an addition, is an old building erected long before the passing of the above Act, in itself containing a greater number of cubic feet than that specified in sect. 27, r. 4, and is not divided by party walls. The addition, which is roofed in, and which the appellant was making to the front of the old building, taken by itself contains less than the before-mentioned number of cubic feet, but the old and new buildings taken together greatly exceed that amount. [A ground plan and section annexed showed the new building, and the position of the appellants' machinery and plant in the old building.]

5. It was contended by the respondent that a party wall should be made between the old and new buildings, which were so united as to contravene sect. 28, r. 2 of the above Act, and were, therefore, taken together of larger cubical contents than that specified in sect. 27, r. 4. The appellant also relied upon sect. 9 of the Act, which is in the following terms:

Any alteration, addition, or other work made or done for any purpose except that of necessary repairs, not affecting the construction of any external or party wall into or upon any old building or into or upon any new building after the roof has been covered in shall, to the extent of such alteration, addition, or work, be subject to the regulations of this Act, and whenever mention is hereinafter made of any alteration, addition, or work into or upon any building it shall, unless the contrary appears from the context, be deemed to imply an alteration, addition, or work to which this Act applies.

6. It was contended by the appellant; firstly, that by sect. 9 the operation of the said Act as to alterations, additions, or other work made or done for any purpose into or upon any old building was confined to the extent of such alterations, additions, or other work so made or done; secondly, that the enactment of sect. 27 as to party walls was by sect. 7, confined to new buildings which exceed the cubical contents mentioned in sect. 27, r. 4; thirdly, that in the present case a new building having been added to an old building they do not come within sect. 28, which applies to the uniting of new buildings to each other.

7. Upon such hearing the said magistrate reserved his judgment, and on the 29th July 1875, made an order on the appellant commanding him to erect a proper party wall so as to divide the new building from the old, on the ground that the addition of the new building to the old building was an uniting them within sect. 28, r. 2. and that, therefore, the buildings taken together were in contravention of sect. 27, r. 4.

8. The questions of law for the opinion of the court were; firstly, whether sect. 28, r. 2, contemplates the union of a new with an old building, and whether even if it should so contemplate an union, an addition such as appeared by the case was within the said section of the statute; secondly, whether the defendant was rightly convicted under sect. 27, r. 4.

If the court should be of opinion that the said order was legally and properly made and was valid, and the appellant was liable, then the said order was to stand, but if the court should be of opinion otherwise then the said complaint was to be dismissed.

Benjamin, Q.C., for the appellant.

F. M. White, (with him Biron) for the respondent. Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22.—The following written judgment of the court, Cleasby, B., and Grove, J., was delivered by

CLEASBY, B.—The question in this case was whether an addition made to an old building after the passing of the Metropolitan Building Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, required to be separated by a party wall in order to comply with the Act. By the 27th section any warehouse or building used for the purpose of trade containing more than 216,000 cubic feet must be divided by party walls in such manner that no part contain a greater cubic measurement. This only applies to new buildings; old buildings are not affected by the Act. By the 9th section any addition to an old building is to the extent of such addition to be subject to the regulations of the Act. The addition made by the appellant contained by itself less than 216,000 cubic feet. It was made by taking down one of the external walls of an old building, which contained more than the contents mentioned, and was not subject to the Act, and building it up at a certain distance, so that the old building and additions contained of course much more than the measurement named. The plan may be referred to. If the addition had contained more than the prescribed contents it was not disputed that the appellant must comply with the Act, and have one or more party walls; but it was contended that as taken by itself it contained less, the 9th section did not apply, and that there were no words in the Act which fairly read could include such a case. If the case had rested on the 9th section only I should have felt great difficulty in holding that it extended to anything beyond the addition itself. But the main reliance of the respondent was placed on the 28th section, sub-section 2, by which it is provided that no buildings shall be united if when so united they shall be in contravention of the provisions of the Act. It was powerfully urged on behalf of the appellant that this was intended to meet a different state of things from the present, namely, the making into one of the two separate buildings, whether new or old, and that it would be straining the language beyond what could be intended to make it apply to so different a subject as the addition to a former building. The answer to this argument is, that the case comes within the mischief intended to be prevented, and that the following consequences will follow from holding the rule not to be applicable to additions to old buildings. A man might have a building of less than the specified dimensions, and he might add a new building also of less than those dimensions, and the two together containing perhaps 400,000 cubic feet would require no partitions, though no such building existed before the passing of the Act. Also, if one wall of the appellant's warehouse should be taken down and 200,000 feet added, he might afterwards take down the three other walls, and make further additions to the same extent, each under the specified dimensions, and so add 800,000 cubic feet without any partitions. It is certain that this could not have been intended. It seldom happens that the framer of an Act of Parliament or the Legislature has in contemplation all the cases which are likely to arise, and the language, therefore, seldom fits every possible case. Whenever the case is clearly within the mischief, the words must be read so as to cover the case, if by any reasonable construction they can be read so as to cover it, though the words may point more clearly to another case. This must be done rather than take such a case to be a casus omissus under the statute. We think that the words may be read as including not only the existing building already constituted, but the adding a new building to an old one, and so uniting them together. The appeal is therefore dismissed, and of course with costs.(a)

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. OXENHAM.

[C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. OXENHAM.

Larceny—Bailee—Bill of exchange—Fraudulent conversion—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.

Prosecutor asked prisoner if he could get bills of exchange discounted, and prisoner replied that if prosecutor was a person of credit he could get his discounted. Three bills were then drawn by prisoner payable to his order, which prosecutor accepted, and delivered to the prisoner to get discounted. The proceeds of the discounting were to be handed to the prosecutor, less the prisoner's commission, or the bills to be returned. The prisoner being pressed by a creditor for a debt, less than the amount of the bill indorsed to him, gave one of the bills in payment, representing it as his own bill, and asking the creditor to discount the balance of the bill. The bill was not indorsed upon the condition of the creditor's discounting the balance; and the jury found that it was the prisoner's intention, when he indorsed the bill, to pass the property in it absolutely to the creditor.

Held, that upon these facts the prisoner might properly be convicted of larceny as a bailee of a bill of exchange under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.

CASE stated by the Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions.

Herbert Oxenham was tried before me at the Middlesex Sessions, on the 28th July, 1876, on an indictment which charged him with having stolen "a certain valuable security to wit, a bill of exchange for the payment of 200*l.*, the property of Charles Garrett, the said sum of 200*l.* so secured and payable by and upon the said bill of exchange, being then due and unsatisfied to the said Charles Garrett." (See the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.)

It appeared that on the 3rd Dec. 1875, the prosecutor, Charles Garrett, called upon the prisoner, who is a licensed victualler, at the house of the latter, and asked him if it was true as he had been informed, that he the prisoner could get bills of exchange discounted. The prisoner answered that he had occasionally done so, and if the prosecutor were a person of credit, he had no doubt he could get his acceptances discounted. Three bills of exchange respectively dated the 3rd Dec. 1875, one of which for 200*l.*, became the subject of the present indictment, were then drawn by the prisoner, payable to his order three months after date, and were accepted by the prosecutor, and were by him delivered to the prisoner for the purpose of getting them discounted. Before the prosecutor handed these his acceptances to the prisoner, it was agreed between them that the prosecutor should call again upon the prisoner at the expiration of a fortnight, and then, as to each of the bills respectively either the proceeds obtained upon the discount of it were to be handed over to the prosecutor, or the bill itself returned to him by the prisoner. The prisoner was to be allowed 5 per cent. commission on each of the bills he might get discounted, and a further sum in the event of his getting all of them discounted. The prosecutor received no value or consideration whatever for either of these acceptances. The evidence was inconclusive as to whether the prosecutor or the prisoner paid for the stamped paper on which the bills were drawn.

On the 10th Dec. the prisoner being then indebted to Messrs. Cutler and Robson, in the sum of 62*l.* for goods which they had sold and delivered to him, and being pressed by Mr. Cutler for a settlement of their account, indorsed to them in payment thereof the bill for 200*l.*, which is the subject of the present indictment.

He then told Mr. Cutler that he had received this bill in relation to some property belonging to his wife, and said nothing as to its having been entrusted to him to get it discounted. He asked Mr. Cutler to discount the balance, and Mr. Cutler promised to consult his partner before determining whether they would do so or not, but that was to be optional with them, and the bill was not indorsed upon condition that they would do so.

The prisoner was credited with the current bill in his account with Cutler and Robson, and they afterwards declined to advance money upon the difference between the 62*l.* due to them and the amount of the bill. After the 17th Dec. the prosecutor called repeatedly upon the prisoner, and made several applications to him for the bills or the cash obtained upon the discount of them, but could on neither occasion obtain any account from him as to what he had done with them. In February the prosecutor summoned the prisoner before a police magistrate, and that proceeding resulted in the prisoner at once returning to him two of the bills, and the summons was withdrawn upon his promising to return forthwith the other bill (the one now in question), which he assured the magistrate was "in the city, but he had not a shilling on it." This, however, he failed to do, and it afterwards came to the knowledge of the prosecutor that the prisoner had previously indorsed this bill to Messrs. Cutler and Robson. The prosecutor dishonoured the bill, and the said indorsees thereupon brought an action upon it and recovered judgment against him for 62*l.* and costs. Proceedings were then taken against the prisoner, which resulted in his being committed for trial upon the present charge.

At the close of the case for the prosecution,

The prisoner's counsel objected that there was no evidence that the prisoner had fraudulently converted the bill, and cited in support of his argument Reg. v. Weeks (10 Cox's C. C. 224), but I overruled the objection, considering that there were facts in the present case which upon this point distinguished it from that one.

The prisoner's counsel then addressed the jury, and called a witness for the purpose of contradicting the evidence of the prosecutor as to the terms of the alleged bailment; but as the jury expressed their entire disbelief of her evidence, it is unnecessary to refer to it. After summing up the facts, I directed the jury that if they believed the prosecutor's statement, as to what had taken place at the meeting on the 3rd Dec., when he accepted the bill and delivered it to the prisoner, the prisoner was to be deemed a bailee of a "valuable security" within the meaning of the Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3) under which he was indicted; but that it was essential to the maintenance of the indictment that they should be satisfied not merely that he had acted contrary to his agreement with the prosecutor and misappropriated the bill, but that he had done so wilfully and knowingly, and that he had in point of fact and practical effect by indorsing the bill to his creditors, Cutler and Robson, converted it to his own use or to theirs in fraud of the prosecutor. Unless they answered all these questions in the affirmative they should acquit the prisoner. The jury found him guilty, and in answer to a question I then put to them, stated that in their opinion it was the intention of the prisoner, when he indorsed the bill, to pass the property in it absolutely to Cutler and Robson in payment of their account.

I postponed sentence. My attention was afterwards drawn by the prisoner's counsel to Reg. v. Cosser, the report of which in Cox's Crim. Cas. Vol. 13, Part 3, had in the meantime been published. In deference to the ruling of the learned Judge in that case I respited the judgment, and state this case for the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal. I liberated the prisoner upon recognizances to appear when called upon.

The questions for the opinion of the Court are:

1st. Whether upon the facts stated the defendant was a bailee within the meaning of the above enactment; and 2ndly. (If he was) whether there was evidence to go to the jury of a fraudulent conversion.

Oct. 17, 1876. P. H. EDLIN.

Sims for the prisoner.—The indictment is framed upon the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3: "Whoever, being a bailee of any chattel, money, or valuable security, shall fraudulently take or convert the same to his own use, or to the use of any person other than the owner thereof, shall be guilty of larceny, and may be convicted thereof upon an indictment for larceny." By sect. 1 (the interpretation clause), the term "valuable security" includes (inter alia) any bill, note, or order, or other security whatsoever for money, or for payment of money. It is submitted that the document in question was not a security for money at the time it was dealt with by the prisoner within the meaning of sect. 3: (sup.) Reg. v. Cosser 13 Cox, C.C. 187.) In that case the prisoner drew, and the prosecutor at his request accepted, three bills of exchange on the understanding that the prisoner was to deposit them with a third person as security for the purchase-money for the transfer of a licence of a public house, and not to negotiate them or use them for any other purpose. Instead of depositing them with the third person, the prisoner converted two of the bills to his own use. Upon these facts it was held that there was no bailment within sect. 3. [LUSH, J.—Strike out the words "valuable security to wit," in the indictment, and then the indictment charges the prisoner with having stolen a bill of exchange. Is that not sufficient?] It is submitted that it is not, for the bill was then of the value of the paper only, and the prisoner is not charged with stealing a piece of paper. In King v. Phipoe (2 Leach's Crown Cases 774), the prisoner, by threats and intimidation, compelled the prosecutor to draw a promissory note on paper, which with pen and ink were supplied by the prisoner, and the prisoner was indicted under the 2 Geo. 2, c. 25, s. 3, which enacts that if any person shall "steal or take by robbery" (inter alia) any bills of exchange or promissory notes for the payment of money, notwithstanding any of the said particulars are termed in law a choses in action, it shall be deemed and construed to be felony. In that case, Ashurst, J., said the judges were of opinion that, "as the Legislature at the time of passing the 2 Geo. 2, c. 25, s. 3, whereby the stealing a choses in action was made felony, could not possibly have had a case like the present in contemplation, it is not within that statute; that it is essential to larceny that the property charged to have been stolen should be of some value; that the note in the present case did not, on the face of it, import either a general or a special property in the prosecutor, and that it was so far from being of the least value to him, that he had not even the property of the paper on which it was written, for it appeared that both the paper and the ink were the property of Mrs. Phipoe, and the delivery of it by her to him could not, under the circumstances, be considered as vesting it in him." Here it is submitted that the document was valuable as a piece of paper only. Secondly, there was no conversion of the bill of exchange by the prisoner. For that proposition, Reg. v. Weeks (10 Cox, C.C. 224) is an authority. There the prisoner volunteered to get the prosecutor's acceptance for 30*l.* discounted, and thereupon drew a bill which the prosecutor accepted and indorsed and handed to prisoner to get discounted. The prisoner subsequently delivered the bill to a creditor of his, to whom he owed 10*l.*, that the creditor might take 10*l.* out of the proceeds after discounting it. And it was held that this did not amount to a conversion by the prisoner analogous to larceny. So in Reg. v. Jackson (9 Cox, C.C. 505), Martin, B., said: "There are many instances of conversion sufficient to maintain an action of trover, which would not be sufficient to support a conviction under this statute. The determination of the bailment must be something analogous to larceny, and some act must be done inconsistent with the purposes of the bailment. As, for instance, in case of bailment of an article of silver for use, melting it would be evidence of a conversion. So when money, or a negotiable security, is bailed to a person for safe keeping, if he spend the money, or convert the security, he is guilty of a conversion within the statute." [LUSH, J.—You have the finding of the jury here that the prisoner intended to pass the property in the bill absolutely to Cutler and Robson.]

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

COLERIDGE, C. J.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. The prisoner was indicted under these circumstances. It appears that he, being the drawer of a bill of exchange for 200*l.*, which the prosecutor had accepted and delivered to him for the purpose of getting discounted, instead of getting the bill discounted, took it to Cutler and Robson, creditors of his, to whom he was indebted in the sum of 62*l.*, and indorsed it to them as his own in payment of the 62*l.*, and the jury have found that in their opinion it was the intention of the prisoner when he indorsed the bill to them to pass the property in it absolutely to Cutler and Robson, in payment of their account. Now upon these facts we are asked to hold that the prisoner was not a bailee of a bill of exchange for payment of money, and that he did not convert it to his own use. I should have thought it impossible to doubt that the statute met this very case, and that it was intended to suppress frauds of this kind. The case of Reg. v. Cosser is inapplicable to the present case. In that case the acceptor of the bills delivered them to the prisoner to be used for one purpose, and the prisoner applied them to another. When the purpose for which they had been given failed, and the acceptor applied for the bills, the prisoner said he had destroyed them, and it was not until the acceptor was applied to for payment that he discovered what had become of the bills. Upon those facts I think it was properly held that there was no bailment of the bills within the statute. The present case is entirely different. As to the case of Reg. v. Weeks, that case, in my opinion, was rightly decided. In that case the prisoner Weeks received from the prosecutor Butty a bill of exchange for 30*l.* to get discounted. Weeks, not having got it discounted, handed it to a creditor Bailey, to whom he owed 10*l.*, that he, Bailey, might get it discounted, and keep the 10*l.* Weeks owed him, and hand over the remainder of the proceeds of the discounting to him. And that was held not to be a conversion of the bill of exchange within this statute. But the facts there were not the same as here. Here the jury have found that at the time the prisoner delivered the bill to Cutler and Robson he intended to pass the property in it absolutely to them in payment of their debt. I think, therefore, the conviction should be affirmed.

MELLOR and LUSH, JJ., POLLOCK, B., and LINDLEY, J., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. TATLOCK.

Larceny Act—Broker embezzling proceeds of securities—Marine policies—Chattel—Securities for payment of money—Valuable security—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75.

An insurance broker was employed by prosecutor to effect three policies upon a vessel, which he did, advancing the premiums. A total loss having occurred the broker received the necessary documents from the prosecutor to collect the moneys insured, and thereupon collected the amounts due upon two of the policies, by cheques payable to his order, which he paid into his own bank to his own credit. The premiums advanced by the broker and his commission on effecting the policies and receiving the losses were unpaid to him. The broker on being asked for the moneys after they had been received, said they were not due until a future day, and subsequently made excuses, and did not pay over the sums received on account of the losses to the prosecutor. The jury, in answer to a question left to them, found that the policies had been intrusted to the broker for a special purpose, viz., that he should receive the moneys due on them, and forthwith pay them over to the prosecutor. There was no evidence to support such a finding in the case.

Held, that there was a miscarriage, and as the court had no power to direct a new trial, the conviction should be quashed.

Seemle, that a marine policy of insurance upon which a loss has occurred in respect of the perils insured against is a security for the payment of money within the first branch of sect. 75 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 76.

Quære, whether such a policy is a chattel or valuable security within the second branch of that section.

CASE stated for the opinion of this court by Mr. Commissioner Kerr.

At the session of the Central Criminal Court, held on Monday, the 28th Feb. 1876, the prisoner was tried before me upon an indictment, the second count of which was founded on the second branch of the 75th section of the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, and was as follows :

Second Count.—And the jurors, &c., that the said William Ananias Cragge, trading under the style and firm of Overall, Son, and Co., heretofore, to wit, on the 27th Nov. 1875, within the jurisdiction of the said Central Criminal Court, did entrust the said William Thomas Augustus Tatlock, as his broker, attorney, and agent, with certain valuable securities to wit, two policies of insurance for 650*l.*, and 500*l.* respectively for a special purpose, that is to say, that he the said W. T. A. Tatlock should receive the said sums of 650*l.* and 500*l.*, which were then due, and payable on the said policies of insurance, and forthwith pay over to the said W. A. Cragge the said sum of 1138*l.* 10*s.*, without any authority to him the said W. T. A. Tatlock, to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge the said valuable securities, and the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said W. T. A. Tatlock, being a broker, attorney, and agent, as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction aforesaid, in violation of good faith, and contrary to the said object and purpose for which the said valuable securities were entrusted to the said W. T. A. Tatlock, as aforesaid, unlawfully did convert to his own use and benefit a certain part of the proceeds of the said valuable securities, to wit, the said sum of 1138*l.* 10*s.*, contrary to the form of the statute, &c., and against the peace, &c.

The facts adduced in evidence were these :

The prisoner was an insurance broker in the city of London, trading as Tatlock Brothers, and in November 1875, was employed by W. A. Crage (trading under the style of S. Overall, Sons and Company) to effect for him (Crage) an insurance on the cargo of a ship called the Agatha to the extent of 1650*l.* The prisoner was to pay the necessary premium. He delivered to Crage the following memorandum :

London, 17th Nov. 1875.

Tatlock Brothers

TATLOCK BROTHERS.

On the 27th Nov. prisoner was at Crage's counting house, and Crage's clerk said to him, "By the by, Mr. Tatlock, we have an account due to you" (alluding to the above). Prisoner replied, "Oh, never mind that, I shall have to give you a cheque presently." The loss of the Agatha was by this time known. The clerk, in consequence of this statement by the prisoner, did not give him a cheque for the amount of the premium. On the 27th Nov. 1875, Crage having heard of the loss of the Agatha, gave the prisoner directions to obtain the money on the policies, and wrote to him as follows :

London, 27th Nov. 1875, 102, Lower Thames-street.
Messrs. Tatlock and Brothers.

Gentlemen,—Herewith we hand you the necessary documents for recovering the amount insured on Agatha, Lerwick, and list of same, which please sign and return per bearer.—We are, gentlemen, yours truly, S. OVERALL, Son and COMPANY.

With that letter Crage sent to prisoner, and prisoner received three policies of insurance for the sums of 650*l.* in the Archangel Office, 500*l.* in the Imperial Office, and 500*l.* by underwriters, the captain's protest, and bill of lading, and a letter from Lloyd's agent.

On the 17th Dec. the prisoner received from the Imperial Office the 500*l.* on their policy by a cheque payable to his order, and he paid that cheque into his own bank, the Union, to his own credit, and it was cashed and credited to him.

On the 31st Dec. the prisoner received from the Archangel Office the 650*l.* on their policy, by a cheque payable to his order, and he paid that cheque into his own bank, to his own credit, and it was cashed and credited to him.

On the 11th Jan. 1876, prisoner wrote and sent to Crage the following memorandum :

London, 10th Jan. 1876.

From Tatlock Brothers.

To Messrs. S. Overall, Son and Co.

Cr.—By total loss per Agatha 21650 0 0
Less commission receiving 16 10 0

21633 10 0

Due 17th Jan. 1876 subject to payment by underwriters.

TATLOCK BROTHERS.

Crage called on prisoner twice for the money, and the prisoner said it was not due until the 17th Jan. Again on the 18th, Crage called upon him and asked for the money, and prisoner said he could not let him have it at present, but should be able to let him have it on Saturday, or some of it.

On the 19th, prisoner went to Crage and said he could not get the money till Saturday, and would let Crage know on the following Thursday how much he (prisoner) could get by Saturday. On the 20th Jan. prisoner wrote and sent to Crage the following memorandum :

London, 20th Jan. 1876.

From Tatlock Brothers.

To Messrs. S. Overall, Son and Co.

Agatha.

Dear Sirs,—We fear that we shall be unable to exceed 1000*l.* upon the loss for the above-named vessel on Saturday next.—Yours truly, TATLOCK BROTHERS.

Upon the receipt of that memorandum Crage called upon prisoner for the money, who said, "It would be impossible for a broker to carry on his business if he had to pay immediately." Crage replied, "Having had the money, as I presume you have, you should pay it at once. You have no business to withhold it. Let me see the policies." Prisoner thereupon went to a safe and rummaged it and then said, "I have not the policies, the office has kept them." Crage replied, "The office would not have kept them unless they had paid for them." The prisoner said, "Two of the offices have settled with me in account;" and prisoner then handed to Crage one of the three, viz., the underwriter's policy for 500*l.*, and Crage himself obtained the money on that policy.

The prisoner never paid Crage any money, and on the 27th Jan. 1876, he filed his petition for liquidation, with a statement of debts 2500*l.*, and returned Crage as a creditor for 1112*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* The trustee under the prisoner's liquidation received the balance (about 600*l.*) standing to the credit of the prisoner at the Union Bank; and five creditors only having proved under the liquidation, the prisoner's discharge under the liquidation was granted. Mr. Crage did not prove but repudiated the liquidation altogether.

It was contended by Mr. Straight, on behalf of the prisoner, that the facts as proved did not show the prisoner to have committed the offence mentioned in the statute, and that I ought so tell the jury. I, however, laid the facts before the jury, and asked them the following questions, viz. :

1. Did Crage intrust the prisoner with the two policies of insurance?
2. Did he intrust him with them for a special purpose?
3. Was that special purpose that he should receive the moneys and forthwith pay over the moneys when received to Crage?
4. Had the prisoner any authority to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge them?
5. Did he, in violation of good faith, and contrary to the purpose for which they were intrusted to him, convert any part of the proceeds to his own use?

The jury answered questions 1, 2, 3, and 5 in the affirmative, and No. 4 in the negative, and under my direction they found the prisoner guilty, and the verdict was so recorded.

The question reserved by me for the consideration of the Court above, is whether the facts as proved were sufficient to constitute the offence mentioned in the statute, or whether I ought to have directed the jury to find a verdict of not guilty.

The prisoner is in custody awaiting judgment.—
R. MALCOLM KERR, Commissioner, &c.

June 24.—Straight, for the prisoner.—The prisoner was indicted under the second branch of sect. 75 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, for unlawfully converting in violation of good faith, and contrary to the purpose for which the same were entrusted to him, the proceeds of certain valuable securities intrusted to him for a special purpose, that is to say, that he should receive the sums payable thereon and forthwith pay over the same to the prosecutor. The 75th section provides for two distinct offences. The first branch provides for the case of an agent "intrusted with money, or a security for the payment of money," with a direction in writing as to the application thereof, who shall in violation of good faith and contrary to the terms of such direction convert the same or any part of the proceeds to his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he shall have been so intrusted. The second branch provides for the case of an agent intrusted with "any chattel or valuable security, or any power of attorney for the sale or transfer of stock" for safe custody or any special purpose without any authority to sell, negotiate, transfer or pledge, who shall in violation of good faith and contrary to the purpose for which the same shall have been intrusted, sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge, or in any manner convert to his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he shall have been so intrusted, such chattel or security or the proceeds of the same or any part thereof." Upon this indictment under the second branch the conviction was wrong, for there was no dealing by the prisoner with the policies of insurance contrary to the purpose for which the same were intrusted to him. It will not do to say the offence is divisible into two parts, (1) converting the security, (2) converting the proceeds, for it is contended that to render the agent liable for converting the proceeds he must first convert the security contrary to the terms of the provision. The case of Reg v. Cooper (12 Cox, C. C. 600; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 127) is in favour of the prisoner. In the present case the prisoner was intrusted with the policies of insurance to collect what was due upon them. He was entitled to hand them over to the underwriters; and the cheques he received for the losses were payable to his order, and there was nothing wrong in his paying them in to his own bankers. Then at what moment was there any fraudulent conversion within the meaning of the section? According to the course of dealing the prisoner was entitled to deduct what was owing to him by the prosecutor for premiums and commission. There was no evidence in the case of any fraudulent conversion at the time he paid the cheques into his bankers.

He was entitled to hold the cheques according to the usage of business among insurance brokers.

Besley, for the prosecution.—First, as to the construction of the statute. The second branch of sect. 75 comprehends two cases, (1) where the agent fraudulently converts the valuable security, (2) where he fraudulently converts the proceeds of a valuable security correctly dealt with. That this is the right construction would appear to be so from the course of legislation on this subject. The first statute, 52 Geo. 3, c. 63, s. 1, did not contain the words "or the proceeds of the same." They were introduced into the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 49, apparently to meet cases like the present, and the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 76, s. 75, follows the words of that enactment. The case of Reg. v. Cooper may be reviewed. Secondly, as to the facts stated in the case. [COCKBURN, C.J.—What evidence was there to show that the prisoner was bound to pay over the proceeds by a certain day? The broker's month had elapsed when he was asked to pay over the proceeds: Besides, after verdict the court will assume that there was evidence to support the finding of the jury: (Hayman v. The Queen, L. Rep. 8 Q.B. 102). Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18.—COCKBURN, C.J.—The defendant was indicted under the 75th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. The facts are as follow: Having negotiated as broker certain policies of insurance on a ship belonging to the prosecutor, and the ship having been lost, the defendant was intrusted with the policies for the purpose of collecting the amounts due upon them. These he received in cheques payable to his own order, which he indorsed and paid into his bankers to his own credit; but he failed, either then or at any time afterwards, to pay the amount to the prosecutors, and two months later filed a petition for liquidation. The jury, in answer to questions specifically put to them by the learned commissioner before whom the case was tried, found expressly that the prisoner was intrusted with the policies for a special purpose, namely, that he should receive, and when received, forthwith pay over the moneys to the prosecutors. They further found that the prisoner had no authority to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge the policies; and that, in violation of good faith, and contrary to the purpose for which they were intrusted to him, he converted the proceeds to his own use. Upon which they were directed by the learned commissioner to find the prisoner guilty. The question submitted to us is, whether the facts as proved were sufficient to constitute the offence mentioned in the statute, or whether the jury should have been directed to find a verdict of not guilty. It appears to me plain that there has been a miscarriage in this case. But I scarcely know in what position we are placed as to the decision we can pronounce, whether our opinion is asked upon the facts as found by the jury, or on the facts as proved by the evidence; it being to my mind perfectly plain not only that the right questions have not been put to the jury, but also that the answers to the questions as put are directly contrary to the evidence. The proper remedy would be a new trial, but that we have no authority to direct. I think, however, that the form in which the question is put leaves it open to us to say whether the learned commissioner, instead of putting any questions to the jury, should not upon the evidence have directed them to acquit the prisoner; and this, I think, would have been the proper course, the evidence being, in my opinion, insufficient to warrant a conviction. The case turns on the construction of the second branch of the section referred to, which enacts that "whosoever having been intrusted either solely or jointly with any other person, as a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or other agent, with any chattel or valuable security, or any power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any share or interest in any public Stock or Funds, whether of the United Kingdom or of any Foreign State, or in any stock or fund of any body corporate, company, or society, for safe custody or for any special purpose without any authority to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge, shall in violation of good faith, and contrary to the object or purpose for which such chattel, security, or power of attorney shall have been intrusted to him, sell, negotiate, transfer, pledge, or in any manner convert to his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he shall have been so intrusted, such chattel or security, or the proceeds of the same or any part thereof, or the share or interest in the stock or fund to which such power of attorney shall relate, or any part thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." I entertain very serious doubt whether a policy of insurance comes within this section. The term "chattel" is intended, I think, to apply to objects which can be sold, bartered, or pledged, and a policy of insurance cannot be said to be a "valuable security" any more than a contract of sale or any other contract. It is simply a contract whereby, in consideration of a premium, one party insures another against a given loss. Unless the loss occurs nothing is payable. A valuable security is one on which money is payable irrespective of any contingency. Moreover, a policy of insurance upon which money is received is neither "sold," "negotiated," "transferred," or "pledged," in any sense of the word. The money due on it is paid, and the contract comes to an end, just as when money is paid on a contract of sale. I likewise entertain very serious doubt whether this enactment extends to a case in which a person intrusted with any of the instruments enumerated in the section for the purpose of disposing of it or receiving money on it, having done so embezzles the proceeds. The enactment, if the words are carefully followed, appears to me to apply, and, indeed, to be intended to apply solely to the dealing with securities without authority, and contrary to the purpose for which they were intrusted, and in so doing converting the instrument or the proceeds of it to the use of the party so violating his trust. But here the party uses the instrument for the very purpose for which it was intrusted to him, namely, that of receiving the money due on it. Let us assume, for the purpose of the argument, that he afterwards embezzled the money. He still cannot be said to have dealt with the policy "without authority," which by the express terms of the statute is an essential element of the offence. It may, however, be said, that if an instrument is intrusted to a person for the purpose of his receiving money upon it and handing over the money so received to the principal he receives it for a "special purpose," and that if the agent receives such money with the intention of applying it to his own use instead of handing it over to the person employing him, the authority being violated by the intended fraud, he is acting without authority as well as in violation of good faith. Assuming this to be so, and that a party receiving money on an instrument intrusted to him for the special purpose of his receiving the money due upon it, and forthwith handing such money over in specie, and who at the time he receives the money intends in violation of good faith, to apply it to his own use, commits the offence created by the statute, I doubt exceedingly whether that would be so, where the money having been received with an honest intention, the fraudulent design of misappropriating it afterwards arose. If this doubt be well founded, it would be a question for the jury whether the defendant at the time he received the money intended to appropriate it to his own purposes, a question which was not submitted to the jury in the present case. At all events, it is to my mind perfectly clear that unless there was at the time the money was received the fraudulent intention of keeping the money, in which case the statute may possibly apply, it cannot apply to a case in which, by the understanding of the parties, the person receiving the money is not to hand it over at once to the principal, but is to carry it to an account between them and to pay it only in settlement of such account. That such was the understanding between the prosecutors and the defendant whether as arising from the general custom of trade as between insurance brokers and their principals, or from the course of dealing between these immediate parties appears to me to result from the evidence. No evidence having been given as to any general custom, I do not think we are at liberty to take notice of the statement of such a custom occurring in any work on insurance law; but sufficient evidence of the understanding between the parties is to be found in the fact that when the defendant is applied to for the money received on the policies, he answers, while acknowledging the receipt, that it will not be due to the prosecutor for a month, and this is acquiesced in; affording, as it seems to me, at all events prima facie (and no evidence was offered on the part of the prosecution to rebut the presumption) good ground to infer that the defendant either by the custom of business, or the course of dealing between himself and his principals, was entitled, instead of paying over the money at once, to hold it and treat it as his own for a time, settling for it only in account when the time for settlement came. If such were not the terms on which the defendant was employed, it was for the prosecution to rebut the inference which arises from the facts I have referred to. Assuming such a case to be within the statute, it would be a question for the jury whether the defendant at the time the money was received intended to embezzle it. Possibly proof that a party receiving money under such circumstances was and knew himself to be hopelessly insolvent, and being aware that his account at his bankers was heavily overdrawn, paid the money in to the credit of his account, knowing that the effect of his so doing would be that it would be totally lost to the party entitled to it, might be sufficient evidence of an intention to convert the proceeds to his own use, although under other circumstances the payment of the money into his bankers might have been perfectly legitimate. But the only evidence of insolvency in the present case was that two months after the receipt of the money the defendant filed a petition for liquidation. At the time he received it he may have been solvent. It was for the prosecution to give evidence as to the state of his circumstances, if it could be shown that he was insolvent when the money was received, so as to raise the inference that in paying it into his bankers, he intended to defraud the prosecutor of the amount. No such evidence having been given, I think that even supposing the case to be within the statute, as to which I entertain great doubt, the learned Commissioner should have held that there was no case to go to the jury, and should have directed an acquittal. I am therefore of opinion that the conviction was wrong, and should be quashed.

REG. v. TATLOCK.

KELLY, C.B.—I think it is so far doubtful whether a marine policy of insurance upon which a loss has occurred and a sum of money has become payable is a chattel or a valuable security within the meaning of the 75th section of the Act, that I do not feel justified in dissenting from the judgment of acquittal upon which the other members of the Court have agreed. In addition, however, to the judgment of Baron Pollock, in which I entirely concur, I would observe that I cannot accede to the doctrine that because a man whose duty it is to pay over a sum of money to another, pays it into his bankers, and afterwards draws it out by cheques, and then goes into liquidation or becomes bankrupt, he may not have been guilty of a criminal offence within this statute, or of what under other circumstances, would have amounted to embezzlement. It appears to me that if the prisoner after he had received the money and ought to have paid it to the prosecutors, and after paying it into his bankers drew it out again, knowing that he was insolvent, and applied it to his own use, knowing that he could never make it good, he was guilty of fraudulently converting the proceeds of the policy to his own use, and that if the policy had clearly been a chattel within the statute, the conviction would have been right. But for the reasons already stated, I agree that it should be quashed.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion for the reasons given in my brother Amphlett's judgment, that these policies were not valuable securities entrusted to the prisoner for a special purpose within the meaning of the second part of sect. 75, but were securities for money within the first part of the section, and were entrusted to the prisoner for such purpose as to make the case within the first part had there been a direction in writing, and as there was none, the conviction cannot be sustained.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am of opinion that the conviction must be quashed. The indictment is framed upon the second branch of the 75th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, and the case alleged against the defendant is, that being entrusted as a broker with certain ship policies for the special purpose of receiving the monies due thereon and paying over the same forthwith to the prosecutor, he fraudulently converted the same to his own use. Now looking at both branches of the section which we ought to do for the purpose of arriving at the true meaning of either, it appears to me that the second branch only deals with the case of chattels and securities sold or converted into money without authority, and does not embrace in its provisions policies like these which were entrusted to the defendant for collection. For we must observe that the section only relates to certain classes of agents whom the Legislature has not thought fit to make amenable to the ordinary law of embezzlement, and it is only therefore under defined conditions and safeguards that such agents can be proceeded against criminally for misappropriating moneys or securities entrusted to them. The general scheme appears to be this. If moneys or securities which they are authorised to convert into money, are entrusted to agents of this character, they are only answerable criminally for a fraudulent misappropriation if a direction in writing as to the disposal of such monies was given. That is provided for by the first branch of the section, which embraces the case we are considering, for I cannot doubt, having regard to the Interpretation Clause that the policies were securities for the payment of money within the meaning of the section. There remained the case (which was supposed also to require the protection of the criminal law) of chattels or securities entrusted to such agents for safe custody, or for some special purpose without authority to sell or convert into money, and that is provided for by the second branch of the section, which makes such agents criminally liable for a fraudulent misappropriation of such last mentioned chattels or securities, or of the proceeds of the same. It has been argued that these last words can have no meaning unless they are held to refer to securities other than those which they had no authority to convert into money. I think this is a mistake; these words are not to be found in the first Act (52 Geo. 3, c. 63) on this subject, but were inserted in the subsequent Acts for the obvious purpose, as it appears to me of meeting the case, which may well happen, of such agent selling or at all events alleging that he had sold honestly though without authority, and afterwards yielding to temptation and fraudulently converted the proceeds to his own use. Without these words the agent in such a case would escape, or it might at all events be more difficult to convict him. The irrational consequences that might occur if securities dealt with by the first were also held to be comprised in the second branch of the section are numerous, and, as it appears to me, afford a strong argument that it was not so intended by the Legislature. For instance, if you gave such an agent money for a particular purpose, but not expressed in writing, he would not be criminally responsible; but, if you had given him a cheque and told him verbally to get it cashed and apply the proceeds in the same way, he would. What is the sense or meaning of such a distinction? Is he not as soon as he cashes the cheque, entrusted with the amount exactly in the same way as if it had been handed over to him directly by his principal? Again it is admitted on all hands that if a debenture or other security be entrusted to a broker with authority to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge, the case would not be within the second branch of the section; and that, in the absence of a written direction as to the disposal of the proceeds, he would be civilly, only not criminally, responsible; but according to the argument if the security were intrusted to him for the purpose of collecting the moneys due upon it, he would be criminally responsible for the misapplication of the proceeds. I confess I cannot see any reason why he should be criminally responsible in one case but not in the other. It is certainly difficult to bring a broker so authorised to collect moneys due on a security within the description of an agent authorised to sell, negotiate, transfer, or pledge, although, I think, there is little doubt but that the framers of the section by the use of the latter words imagined that they had exhausted every means of converting securities into money. I do not, however, think it necessary to deal with that difficulty, since my judgment is based not upon subtleties of language, but upon the broad ground that according to the true construction of the section, cases which, if there had been a written direction would have fallen within the first branch, do not in the absence of such written direction fall within the second branch of the section. In fact, I think that the cardinal principle of the section is that such an agent is only in the absence of a written direction to be criminally responsible for moneys which may come into his hands by some unauthorised act of his own. This construction of the section was adopted and formed the ground of an unanimous decision of the Court of Appeal consisting of five judges, in Reg. v. Cooper (L. Rep. 2 C. C. 127), and I think we are bound by that authority, even if it be the fact, as is alleged, that there was another ground unnoticed by the counsel who argued, or the Judges who decided the case, which might have supported the decision. Upon the other point argued before us as to the sufficiency of the evidence in point of fact to support the conviction, I will only say that I find it very difficult to understand what, if anything, the learned judge has referred to us beyond the legal question on which I have already expressed my opinion. If he meant to ask us whether the facts stated in the case justified the findings of the jury, I should say they did not, for I can find in the facts as stated no evidence at all of the special purpose stated in the indictment, and consequently none of the alleged conversion.

BRETT, J. and FIELD, J. acquiesced in the judgment of AMPHLETT, B., and ARCHIBALD, J. died during the Long Vacation.

POLLOCK, B.—In so far as the decision of this case depends upon the proper construction to be put upon the section of the statute under which the prisoner was indicted, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75, I entertained during the argument, and still entertain, considerable doubt. I have had, however, the advantage of seeing the judgments which have been prepared by my learned brothers, and thinking as I do that the conviction was unsatisfactory for reasons to which I will presently refer, I am not prepared to differ with the view which has been taken by the majority of the court upon the construction of a statute which is undoubtedly capable of more than one interpretation. If it could be assumed that the construction of the statute which was insisted upon by the prosecution was correct, it appears to me that having reference to the duty of the prisoner to pay over to the prosecutors the sums of money which he had received in payment of the policies, and also to the false statement made by the prisoner to the prosecutor after he had received these sums, there may have been evidence which might and ought to have been submitted to the jury with a view to their finding whether or no the prisoner, who undoubtedly had the money, had converted it to his own use or benefit within the meaning of the statute. But the prisoner was not a mere clerk of the prosecutors, he was an insurance broker carrying on an independent business.

It must be assumed that he had many other principals for whom he acted besides the prosecutors, and it does not appear what had been the previous course of dealing between the prosecutors and the prisoner as to the payment of or accounting by the latter for money received by him on the settlement of losses. These are matters having an essential bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and yet they do not appear to have been explained by the evidence or brought to the attention of the jury, who, by their answer to the third question, appear to have assumed that the duty of the prisoner was to pay over the money forthwith without having their attention called to or having entered on the consideration of the facts from which such a duty could be properly inferred. Under these circumstances, when I have to answer the question which has been submitted to us by the learned Commissioner, I cannot say that I consider the facts as proved were sufficient to constitute the offence mentioned in the statute, and therefore, in my judgment the conviction should be quashed.

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. GALE.

Embezzlement—Proceeds of cheque—For or on account of master—Indictment—24 & 25 Vict. c. 76, s. 68.

The head office of an insurance company was at L., and there were branch offices at M. and G. The local managers at M. and G. having moneys to remit to the head office, paid them into local banks, obtaining cheques thereon for the amount payable to the order of the prisoner (the chief manager, at the head office), and forwarded the cheques by letter to the head office. It was the prisoner's duty to open the letters at the head office, receive the remittances, and hand the same over to the cashier. The local managers at M. and G. remitted by letter two such cheques for 200l. and 400l. respectively to the head office, which the prisoner duly received. He indorsed the bills, got them discounted by friends of his own, instead of handing them to the cashier to pay into the company's bank, and converted the proceeds to his own use:

Held, that the prisoner received the proceeds for and on account of his masters, and that he was properly indicted for embezzling the money.

At the quarter sessions for the borough of Liverpool, James Edward Gale was tried before me upon an indictment consisting of two counts, in the first of which the prisoner was charged with having, on the 19th May 1874, when a clerk and servant to the London and Lancashire Fire Insurance Company (Limited), embezzled 400l., the property of his said masters, and in the second of which he was charged with having, when in the same capacity and on the same day, embezzled 200l., also the property of his said masters.

The evidence in support of the charge, so far as the same is material, was as follows:

The said company's head office is in Liverpool. There are branch offices at Manchester, Glasgow, and elsewhere. The prisoner was the head manager of the company, and was their clerk and servant. In ordinary course he opened all letters and received all remittances sent to the head office, and handed the remittances to the cashier, who kept the ordinary books under the superintendence of the prisoner as manager, and those books were from time to time submitted to and checked by Mr. Blenham, the company's accountant at Liverpool.

It frequently happened that the managers of the provincial offices remitted cash or cheques to the prisoner as chief manager, which it was the duty of the prisoner to hand on receipt to the cashier, and in the case of cheques it was the duty of the prisoner to indorse them, if they were payable to his order, and they were then paid into the company's bankers by the cashier, and accounted for in the books.

On the 19th May 1874, the prisoner received on account of the company, by post from Glasgow, a cheque dated the 18th May 1874, for 400*l.*, drawn by the manager of the Glasgow branch upon the Commercial Bank of Scotland, payable to the prisoner's order. On the same day the prisoner also received on account of the company, by post from Manchester, a cheque for 200*l.*, dated the 19th May 1874, drawn by the manager of the Manchester branch upon the Manchester and County Bank (Limited), payable to the prisoner's order.

The prisoner did not hand over either of these cheques to the cashier, or inform him or anyone else of their receipt, except that he acknowledged the receipt of them to the Glasgow and Manchester managers respectively.

On the same day, the 19th May, the prisoner indorsed and cashed both the cheques through private friends of his own, who gave him the cash and paid the cheques into their own banks. Later in the day the prisoner paid 600*l.* in bank notes and gold, which was probably the produce of the cheques, to the cashier of the company, saying that he wished it to go against his salary, which was then overdrawn to that amount. The cashier, supposing the money to be the prisoner's own, received it from him, and handed back to the prisoner I.O.U.s for the amount which he had received from the prisoner in respect of the overdraft.

Shortly after sending the cheques, the Glasgow and Manchester managers, according to their usual practice, sent to the prisoner financial statements, which among other things contained entries of the sending of these cheques. These statements should have been handed to the accountant by the prisoner, who, however, suppressed them both.

The prisoner's salary was 1500*l.* a year.

The fact of the prisoner having received the cheque for 200*l.* was not known to the company or the accountant till about a month later. The prisoner, when questioned, said he would put it all right, and nothing was done in respect of it at that time. The remittance of the cheque for 400*l.* was not known to the company or the accountant till about four months afterwards, when the prisoner was no longer in the company's service. The prisoner became bankrupt, and the company proved upon his estate for the amount of the cheques. The prisoner never accounted for either the cheques or the money.

At the close of the case for the prosecution, counsel for the prisoner submitted that the prisoner could not be properly convicted of embezzling either of the sums charged in the indictment, inasmuch as the cheques were sent to the prisoner payable to his order, and required his indorsement, and the prisoner was entitled to cash the cheques and receive the cash which was paid to him in respect of them, and, therefore, there was no embezzlement by him of the said sums or either of them. It was also submitted that there was no embezzlement, because the identical money received for the cheques was paid to the cashier, although it was so paid as the prisoner's own money and in discharge of so much of his own overdraft.

I ruled that there was evidence of embezzlement, but consented to reserve the questions for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

The jury convicted the prisoner. I did not sentence him, but remanded him until the decision of the Court to the borough gaol at Liverpool.

The question for the Court is, whether there was evidence of embezzlement which I was justified in leaving to the jury.

JOHN B. ASPINALL, Recorder of Liverpool.

14th Nov. 1876.

Torr, Q.C. (Kennedy with him) for the prisoner.

—The prisoner was improperly convicted of embezzlement. There was no embezzlement here, but it was a mere transference of the cheques from the master to the prisoner, and like the case where a master hands money to one servant to give to another for a specific purpose, and that other applies the money to his own use. [Cockburn, C.J.—No; here the prisoner receives a piece of paper from his master, which he is to convert into money.] The cheque was not payable until the prisoner put his name on it. [Lord Coleridge, C.J., referred to Reg. v. Keena, 11 Cox C. C., 123; L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 113, to show that where a servant has embezzled a cheque and converted it into money, he may be indicted either for embezzling the cheque or the money.] The contention is that this was not a case of embezzlement, but, if anything, one of larceny, and the prisoner was not indicted or convicted for larceny. In the present case, the prisoner indorsed the cheques, and got cash for them from his own friends, not from the banks on which the cheques were drawn. This cash was not paid to the prisoner for or in the name or on account of his masters within the meaning of the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 76, s. 68. The cheques were sent by the local managers as a means of forwarding money which was constructively in possession of the masters through them. [Cockburn, C.J.—How does this case differ from that of a servant who gives a receipt before a customer will pay?] The following cases were then referred to:

Reg. v. Wilson, 9 Car. & P. 27;

Reg. v. Beaumont, 6 Cox C. C. 269; 23 L. J. 54, M. C.;

Reg. v. Harris, 6 Cox C. C. 363;

Reg. v. Thorp, 8 Cox C. C. 29; 27 L. J. 264, M. C.;

Reg. v. Cullum, 11 Cox C. C. 469; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 23.

Again, the prisoner in this case was received on the prisoner's own account, and not, in the language of the statute, "for or on account of masters." The cheques may have been received by him by virtue of his employment, but the money was received on his own account.

Reg. v. Masters, 3 Cox C. C. 178; 2 Car. & Kir. 330.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. LANGTON.

[C. CAS. R.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I entertain no doubt that this conviction must stand. The principal facts appear to be these: The prisoner was the chief manager at the head office of a Fire Insurance Company, at Liverpool, which had branch offices at Manchester, Glasgow, and elsewhere, and when money was to be remitted from the branch offices to the principal one under the management of the prisoner, the mode of remittance was by paying the money into a local bank and obtaining a cheque upon that bank payable to the prisoner's order, and then forwarding the cheque in a letter to the principal establishment. It was the prisoner's duty to open the letters and receive all remittances sent to the head office, and hand the remittances to the cashier. That being his duty, the prisoner opened the letters containing the two cheques remitted by the managers of the Manchester and Glasgow branches, and he then indorsed them and got them discounted by intermediate parties, and then paid the amount to the cashier to go against his salary, which was then overdrawn to that amount. Upon these facts there can be no doubt that the prisoner was intrusted with the cheques with a knowledge of the purpose for which they had been received, and that he might have been found guilty on an indictment for embezzling the cheques. But instead of that he has been found guilty of embezzling the money, the proceeds of the cheques. The only difficulty in the case, which however is a superficial one, is that the cheques were cashed not by the banks on which they were drawn, but by intermediate persons. It was ingeniously argued that inasmuch as the cheques were discounted for the prisoner's convenience by intermediate persons with a knowledge that they were not his cheques, the money so obtained was not paid on account of his masters. That is not the right way to construe the matter. The question is whether the prisoner received the proceeds on account of his master? The case may be illustrated thus: A man, intrusted with a cheque to cash, meets a friend in the street and says to him, it is not convenient for me to go to the bank, will you cash this cheque for me? and the friend does cash it. That is like the present case. The moment the prisoner got the cash for the cheque it was his duty, both morally and legally, to take and hand it over to his masters. That is the common sense view: and I entertain no doubt that the money was received by the prisoner in this case on account of his masters, and that the conviction for embezzlement was right.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add that the words of the statute "for or in the name, or on account of his master," seem to refer to cases where it is the known duty of the servant to pay the money received over to the master.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. If the prisoner had received the cash from the banks there could have been no doubt that he received it for and on account of his masters, and I think it can make no difference that instead of receiving it from the banks he got it from another person. In both cases the money was obtained for his employers.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion. The words "or by virtue of such employment," which were in the previous statute of embezzlement, the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 47, were omitted in the recent statute, with the view of meeting cases where the money was obtained not by virtue of the employment, but as here, on account of the master.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. LANGTON.

Evidence—To refresh memory—Document not written by witness—Limited Joint Stock Company.

It was the prisoner's duty, as a timekeeper, to give to a clerk (not the pay clerk) a list of the number of days on which each workman had worked, and it was the clerk's duty to enter these times in the time book, and the amount of wages due to each workman according to such returns; and from the time book at the time of paying the wages it was the prisoner's duty to read out aloud the number of days each man had worked, and the wages were then paid to the workman by the pay clerk. The prisoner had wilfully falsified the list by overstating the time one of the workmen had worked, and the false statement was entered in the time book by the clerk, and wages calculated accordingly. On the pay day the entries were read out aloud by the prisoner, and the amount of wages so represented paid to the workman. On an indictment against the prisoner for false pretences, the pay clerk was called as a witness, and not remembering the particulars of the entries, he was allowed to refresh his memory by reference to the time book, because he saw the entries at the pay time when they were read out by the prisoner, and knew that the prisoner then read the entries correctly, and that he, witness, had paid the sums mentioned in those entries, although the entries were not made by himself.

Held, that the time book was properly admitted to refresh the witness's memory.

Parol evidence that a Joint Stock Company Limited has acted as an incorporated company is sufficient evidence of its incorporation as a limited company on an indictment for false pretences in which the property obtained is alleged to be the property of the A. B. Company, Limited.

THE prisoner, Edward Langton, was tried before me at the adjourned Quarter Sessions of the Peace held at Kirkdale, in the County of Lancaster, on the 11th July last past, upon an indictment charging him in the first and second counts with obtaining by false pretences from Thomas Chitson certain money of the Tawd Vale Colliery Company, Limited, with intent to defraud; and in the third count with obtaining by false pretences from Samuel Higginbottom certain other money of the said company with intent to defraud.

A copy of the indictment accompanies and is to be taken as part of this case.

The prisoner was in the service of the said company as one of their time keepers, and it was his duty to give in to another clerk fortnightly a list of the number of days on which the workmen in the employ of the company had worked during the preceding fortnight. It was the duty of the clerk to enter in the time book these numbers and the amount of the wages due to each workman

REG. v. LANGTON.

according to the number of days worked, and from this time book at the time of paying the workmen's wages it was the prisoner's duty to read out aloud the number of the days each man had worked, and the wages were then paid to the workmen by the pay clerk accordingly. Robert Aspinwall, a workman in the employ of the company, kept a provision shop on his own account, at which the prisoner dealt, and at the time when the prisoner made the false pretences charged in the indictment, he was indebted to the said Robert Aspinwall. The 14th April last past was the day on which the wages earned during the fortnight preceding the 11th April became payable. During that fortnight Aspinwall had worked twelve days and no more, and there was due to him in respect of his said work the sum of 2*l.* 1*l*s., and no more, his wages, being 4*s.* 3*d.* a day. At some time between the said 11th and 14th April the prisoner asked Aspinwall how many days he had worked during the fortnight. Aspinwall told him as the fact was, that he had worked twelve days. The prisoner then asked Aspinwall how much money he, the prisoner, owed Aspinwall in respect of provisions bought of him by the prisoner, and on Aspinwall telling him the amount, the prisoner said, "I will put it down to your time." There was no evidence of the time list handed in by the prisoner in respect of that fortnight; but the time book was made up apparently according to the same course, and in the time book the number of fifteen days and a half day was entered as the time which Aspinwall had worked during that fortnight, and the sum of 3*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, being at the rate of 4*s.* 3*d.* per day for fifteen days and a half day, was entered as the amount of the wages due to him. These entries the prisoner read out aloud at the pay time on the said 14th April, and the pay clerk, the said Thomas Chitson, then handed to Aspinwall, in the presence of the prisoner, the sum of 3*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* accordingly. The 12th day of the following month of May was the day on which the wages earned during the fortnight preceding the 9th May became payable. During that fortnight Aspinwall had worked twelve days and no more, and there was due to him in respect of such work, at the same rate of 4*s.* 3*d.* a day, the sum of 2*l.* 1*l*s., and no more. On the said 9th May the prisoner asked Aspinwall what time he had worked during that fortnight, and how much he, the prisoner, owed Aspinwall. Aspinwall then told the prisoner, as the facts were, that he, Aspinwall, had worked twelve days, and that the prisoner owed Aspinwall the sum of 18*s.* 6*d.*, which he had paid for the prisoner at his request. The prisoner then said that he would put the said sum of 18*s.* 6*d.* to Aspinwall's time. At the pay time on the said 12th May, the number of days' work entered in the time book to the credit of Aspinwall was sixteen days and a half day, and the sum of 3*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* was entered as the amount due to him in respect of such work. These entries the prisoner read out aloud at the said pay time, and the said pay clerk then handed to Aspinwall the sum of 3*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* accordingly.

The 9th day of the following month of June was the day on which the wages earned during the fortnight preceding the 6th June became payable. During that fortnight Aspinwall had worked twelve days, and no more, and there was due to him in respect of such work, at the same rate of 4*s.* 3*d.* a day, the sum of 2*l.* 1*l*s., and no more. On the said 6th June the prisoner asked Aspinwall what time he had worked during that fortnight, and what the prisoner owed Aspinwall for provisions. Aspinwall then told the prisoner, as the facts were, that he, Aspinwall, had worked twelve days, and the amount which the prisoner owed Aspinwall for provisions, upon which the prisoner said to Aspinwall that he, the prisoner, would put down to Aspinwall's time the amount so owing by the prisoner to Aspinwall. On the said 6th and 9th June, Samuel Higginbottom, the secretary of the said company, was acting as and for the pay clerk, and made up the time book for the wages which became payable on the said 9th June, and the prisoner gave in the number of fourteen days and three quarters of a day as the time which Aspinwall had worked during the said fortnight. The time book was then made up by Higginbottom according to the usual practice, and on the said 9th June the prisoner, at the pay time read out from the said time book fourteen days and three quarters of a day as Aspinwall's time, and 3*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* as the sum owing to Aspinwall in respect of such work. As to all the charges against the prisoner, Aspinwall proved the sums of money he had received on the said pay days and the number of the days for which he had been so paid wages, but in respect of the charges mentioned in the first and second counts Thomas Chitson, the pay clerk, was called as a witness before Aspinwall gave his evidence. The prisoner's counsel objected to Chitson being allowed to refer to the time book to enable him to say for how many days work and what amounts of money he had paid Aspinwall on the said 14th April and 12th May. The counsel contended that as Chitson had not made the entries in the time book he ought not to be allowed to refer to it to refresh his memory, but as Chitson proved that he had seen those entries whilst the prisoner was reading out aloud at the pay time, and that though at the time of the trial he did not remember the particulars of the entries without referring to the book, yet he knew that at the pay time the prisoner read the entries correctly, and he, Chitson, had paid the sums which were mentioned in those entries.

I allowed his evidence to go to the jury, reserving the point for the opinion of this court.

As to all the counts the prisoner's counsel contended that it was necessary in support of the indictment to prove that the Tawd Vale Colliery Company (Limited) was an incorporated company; that this could not be proved by parol evidence only, and that as there was only the parol evidence of witnesses, who swore that the company was incorporated, I ought to direct an acquittal of the prisoner.

To this the counsel for the prosecution, replied that as by virtue of sect. 88 of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, the indictment would be sufficient without alleging any ownership of the money, that the references to the company might have been omitted without vitiating the indictment, and that the allegations as to the company might, therefore, be rejected as surplusage.

I declined to direct an acquittal, and left the evidence to the jury accordingly, but I reserved a case on this point also for the opinion of this court.

The jury found the prisoner guilty.

The court sentenced him to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, subject to the opinion of this court as to whether I was right in overruling the objection raised on behalf of the prisoner by his counsel.

EDWARD GIBBON, Chairman.

No counsel appeared on either side.

COCKBURN, C.J.—As to the first point, whether under the circumstances the time book could be looked at by the pay clerk to refresh his memory, it appears to me that it could. It would be very dangerous to allow such a course where the entry has only been seen by the witness in the absence of the prisoner, but in this case the witness had actually seen the entry at the time it was read out aloud by the prisoner, and knew that the prisoner had read it correctly, and that he had paid the wages according to the entry. The witness was, therefore, properly allowed to refresh his memory from the time book. As to the second point, it was not necessary to prove strictly that the company was a limited company under the Joint Stock Companies Act. Evidence that the company had acted as such was sufficient.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by W. APPLETON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before COLERIDGE, C.J., MELLISH, L.J., BRETT, and AMPHLETT, JJ.A.)

Tuesday, Nov. 7, 1876.

REG. ON THE PROSECUTION OF HARGRAVES AND OTHERS v. STEEL AND OTHERS.

Appeal in criminal cases—Proceedings on Crown side of Queen's Bench Division—Order for costs on a criminal information—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), ss. 19, 47; Judicature Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 19, Order LXII., 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 8.

The Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 have not changed the practice and procedure in criminal cases; there is therefore no appeal in such cases unless there is error of law upon the record, or unless a point has been reserved for the consideration of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved.

An order for costs made on the trial of a criminal information is a procedure in a criminal cause, and therefore such an order made on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division cannot be the subject of an appeal.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Queen's Bench Division (on the Crown side), discharging a rule calling on the defendants to show cause why the taxation of the defendant's costs should not be reviewed. A criminal information had been filed against the defendants for an alleged libel, and the trial had resulted in a verdict of not guilty. The defendants were accordingly entitled under the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 8, "to recover from the prosecutors the costs sustained by the defendant by reason of such information," and the master had allowed the defendants certain items to which the prosecutors had objected; they had accordingly obtained the above rule, and on its being discharged they appealed to this court. On the appeal being called on

C. Russell, Q.C. with him Crompton, for the respondents, objected to the jurisdiction of the court. This case is a criminal case, and in such a case there is no appeal, therefore the Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to entertain this case. The order discharging the rule is an order made on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division, and is therefore an order in a criminal cause. A criminal information is the alternative given in the statute (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96 s. 8), for an indictment, and as on an indictment there can be no appeal save for some matter of error on the record, so on this order there can be no appeal. [MELLISH, L.J.—If there is an appeal in this case, would there not also be an appeal if the court were to refuse a rule for a criminal information?] It would seem so. The contention for the appellants would seem to be that sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873, gives a general right of appeal and that there is no provision in either of the Judicature Acts limiting that right, but it will be found that sect. 47 of the Act of 1873 expressly provides that "no appeal shall lie from any judgment of the High Court in any criminal cause or matter save for some error of law upon the records," and sect. 19 of the Act of 1875 provides that the practice and procedure in criminal cases shall be the same as it was before the passing of the Judicature Acts.

Aspinall, Q.C. (with him Sutton), for the appellants.—It is submitted that the general right of appeal given by sect. 19 of the Act of 1873, is not limited by sect. 47 of the same Act, nor by Order LXII., for they only apply to cases reserved for the Court of Criminal Appeal, and not to criminal proceedings in any other court. Further, this is not a criminal matter, it is merely a question of costs; a question which arises on the conclusion of all criminal and penal proceedings. The criminal proceedings were between the Crown and the defendants, whereas this is a civil right between the prosecutors and the defendants.

The following are the sections of the Acts of Parliament referred to in the argument:

Judicature Act, 1873, sect. 19. The said Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order, save as hereinafter mentioned, of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, or of any judges or judge thereof subject to the provisions of this Act, and to such rules and orders of court for regulating the terms and conditions on which such appeals shall be allowed, as may be made pursuant to this Act. For all the purposes of and incidental to the hearing and determination of any appeal within its jurisdiction, and the amendment, execution, and enforcement of any judgment or order made on any such appeal, and for the purpose of every other authority expressly given to the Court of Appeal by this Act, the said Court of Appeal shall have all the power, authority, and jurisdiction by this Act vested in the High Court of Justice.

Sect. 47. The jurisdiction and authorities in relation to questions of law arising in criminal trials which are now vested in the justices of either bench, and the Barons of the Exchequer by the Act of the session of the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-eight, intitled "An Act for the further amendment of the administration of the Criminal Law," or any Act amending the same, shall and may be exercised after the commencement of this Act by the judges of the High Court of Justice, or five of them at the least, of whom the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, or one of such chiefs at least, shall be part. The determination of any such question by the judges of the said High Court in manner aforesaid shall be final and without appeal, and no appeal shall lie from any judgment of the said High Court in any criminal cause or matter, save for some error of law apparent upon the record, as to which no question shall have been reserved for the consideration of the said judges under the said Act of the eleventh and twelfth years of Her Majesty's reign.

Judicature Act 1875, sect. 19. Subject to the first schedule hereto and to any rules of court to be made under this Act, the practice and procedure in all criminal causes and matters whatsoever in the High Court of Justice, and in the Court of Appeal respectively, including the practice and procedure with respect to Crown Cases Reserved, shall be the same as the practice and procedure in similar cases in matters before the commencement of this Act.

Order LXII. Nothing in these rules shall affect the practice or procedure in any of the following causes or matters:

Criminal proceedings.
Proceedings on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there is no jurisdiction in this court to entertain this appeal, and I am of this opinion on the ground that upon the true construction of sections 19 and 47 of the Judicature Act 1873, taken with the sect. 19 of the Judicature Act of 1875, there is no appeal from an order made on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench division. Section 47 of the Act of 1873 dealt in its earlier part with the court of Crown Cases Reserved alone, and it then goes on to enact as follows: "The determination of any such question by the judges in manner aforesaid shall be final and without appeal, and no appeal shall lie from any judgment of the High Court in any criminal cause or matter save for some error of law apparent upon the record, as to which no question shall have been reserved for the consideration of the judges." Now this latter clause applies to the present case, as this is a case where no question is reserved for the consideration of the judges, and doubtless it was inserted in order to save any right of appeal which did at the time of the passing of the Act exist, but it does not destroy the distinct enactment contained in the preceding sentence which is to the effect that no appeal shall lie from any judgment of the High Court in any criminal case. I asked during the course of the argument whether the words of the latter portion of section 47 must be held to be simply a repetition of, and in no way an extension of, the words which had been inserted just above, and it did not appear that any sufficient answer could be given to the question. I also observe that it is expressly provided by Order LXII. of the Rules of Court that nothing in the rules is to change the course of proceedings on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division, and that adds force to the contention that it was not the intention to give any appeal in criminal cases where there was not, prior to the Judicature Act, any right of appeal. Then it is argued that this is not a judgment in any criminal cause but that this is merely an order which follows on a side bar rule drawn up on a judgment. I am, however of opinion that the word "judgment" in section 47 of the Act of 1873 includes such an order as this, and it appears to me that section 19 of the Act of 1875 confirms this view. That section enacts that the practice and procedure in all criminal causes and matters including the practice and procedure with respect to Crown Cases Reserved shall be the same as the practice and procedure in similar causes and matters before the commencement of this Act. This is, as I think, a criminal matter, for although it is a criminal information and not an indictment, yet, speaking generally, such an information differs from an indictment only in the absence of certain forms, such as sending the bill up before the grand jury and the like, and it remains equally a criminal matter. I am of opinion that this is clearly part of a proceeding in a criminal cause or matter, that is of a cause as to the practice and procedure of which it is especially enacted that no change shall be made, and from which, by section 47 of the Act of 1873, no appeal can lie.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the clause in the latter part of section 47 means that there is now no appeal in criminal matters unless where there is error of law upon the record, in which case alone was there, prior to the Judicature Act, an appeal. If the contention of the appellant before us to-day were right, it must follow that there would be an appeal from every order made on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division. Then is this an appeal in a criminal matter? I am of opinion that if the subject matter of the proceeding is criminal, that then the matter is a criminal matter in all its stages and that there is no appeal. It seems to me that this is the effect of section 47 of the Judicature Act of 1873, confirmed as it is by section 19 of the Act of 1875, and by Order 62, all of which when construed together show that there is not now, just as there was not before the Judicature Acts, any appeal in criminal cases unless there is error on the record.

BRETT, J.A.—The argument that an appeal has been given in criminal matters might prima facie gain some support from section 19 of the Judicature Act of 1873, but the doubt, if any, is cleared up by section 47 of the same Act. The earlier portion of this section is confined to cases which come before the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, while the latter part deals with criminal matters other than those which come before that court, and then it in general words declares that there shall be no right of appeal. Now, as to whether this order is a "judgment," it may be observed that although in the interpretation clause of the Act the word "judgment" is to include decree, still it does not expressly state that it is to include such an order as this; but as according to the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 8, the costs, the subject of this order, are the inevitable result of the judgment of the court, I am of opinion that that which enforces this inevitable result of a judgment in a criminal matter is itself a proceeding in a criminal matter, and that no appeal can lie upon it now, just as no appeal could have been brought before the passing of the Judicature Acts.

AMPHLETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion.

NICHOLLS v. MARSLAND.

[OT. OF APP.]

June 13, 14, and Dec. 1, 1876.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., MELLISH, and JAMES, L.JJ., and BAGGALLAY, J.A., and ARCHIBALD, J.).

NICHOLLS v. MARSLAND.

Dangerous property—Artificial reservoirs—Act of God—Damage—Owner's liability.

The defendant was the owner of a series of artificial lakes, which had existed for a long time without causing damage. Upon a most unusual rainfall occurring, the bank at the end of the higher lake gave way and the water rushing with great violence into the lakes below caused their banks also to give way, and the aggregate volume of water from the lakes rushing down the valley, caused damage to certain county bridges lower down the stream. On the trial of an action by the plaintiff, the surveyor of the county, against the defendant to recover for the damage done to the bridges, the jury found that there had been no negligence in the construction or the maintenance of the lakes, but that if the flood had been anticipated, the effect might have been prevented.

Held (affirming the decision of the Exchequer Division below) that the rainfall being so unusual as to amount to "vis major" or the act of God, the defendant was not liable.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Exchequer Division making absolute a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff, who was the surveyor of the county of Chester, sued the defendant, the owner of some artificial lakes, for damage caused to a county bridge by reason of the bank of the defendant's lakes giving way.

At the trial, before Cockburn, C.J. at the Chester Summer Assizes 1874, the learned judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving leave to the defendant to move to have the verdict entered for her.

A rule nisi was accordingly obtained for the defendant, and on cause being shown was made absolute.

The plaintiff now appealed.

The case in the Exchequer Division below will be found fully reported 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 265.

The facts sufficiently appear in the head note to this report, and in the judgment (post) of the court.

Cotton, Q.C. and McIntyre, Q.C. (with them Cowen) for the plaintiff.—It is proposed to argue two points for the plaintiff. First, whether notwithstanding the findings of the jury, the verdict for the plaintiff ought not to stand; secondly, that the findings were against evidence. [COCKBURN, C.J.—At the trial I did not intend to convey, as seems to be supposed, that the storm in this case could not amount to "vis major," what I meant to say was that it was a question whether a person, in the position of the defendant storing up water is not liable for the result which ensues if the act of God let the water loose.] That is the point of law which it is proposed to consider first. Conceded that the rainfall was so great as to amount to what is known as the act of God, the defendant is still liable, having stored up for her own pleasure and convenience that which from its nature is a source of danger to others. She is not in the position of a carrier, who is not liable to his employers for loss occasioned by the act of God. She is rather in the position of a person who keeps a dangerous animal, as was the case in May v. Burdett (9 Q. B. Rep. 101), and who keeps it at his own peril, and is liable if by any means it escapes and injures a neighbour. Water which is stored up in great quantities is analogous to a dangerous animal, and it was held in Fletcher v. Rylands (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 220; L. Rep. 3 Eng. & Ir. App. 330; 37 L. J. 161, Ex.) that a person stores it up on his land for his own purposes at his peril. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There was no actus dei in that case.] No, and there is no case precisely in point where the defendant has alleged "vis major." [JAMES, L.J.—Supposing rioters or the Queen's enemies had broken down the bank, your argument must go the length of saying that the plaintiff would be liable.] We do go that length; it is not the letting loose which is the injury complained of, it is the having the water stored up at all. The defendant keeps it so collected at her peril. The distinction contended for is pointed out in two railway cases. Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company (5 H. & N. 679), was an action against the railway company for damage caused by the sparks flying from an engine, and there the defendants were only excused from liability on the ground that an Act of Parliament authorised them to use the engine. In Jones v. The Festiniog Railway Company (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 733) where the injury also was from sparks, it was held that as the defendants had not express power by statute to use locomotive steam engines, they were liable at common law. In the Madras Railway Company v. Zemindar of Carvetinagarum (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 770) it was held that the defendant was excused from liability, on the ground that he was under an obligation to keep and maintain the works (which were large water tanks) for the benefit of the country. This case differs from all those, and is within Fletcher v. Rylands (ubi sup.). The defendant has made a stream, otherwise innocuous, into a dangerous reservoir; she is legally in fault, and cannot protect herself by setting up "vis major." It is not the natural use of the land to keep a large quantity of water stored up. The proximate cause of the injury to the bridges was not the storm, but the bank which the defendant maintained to dam up the water. The defendant cannot have the benefit of the act of God when she herself has contributed to the causing of the damage. On the evidence, and the findings of the jury, there is not sufficient to warrant the conclusion that this rainfall, although excessive, amounted to "vis major" or the act of God.

Gorst, Q.C. and G. B. Lloyd, for the defendant.—The whole case for the plaintiff depends upon the analogy between water stored up, and a dangerous animal. The analogy fails, because the keeping of a reservoir is not in itself a wrongful act, and a reservoir is not necessarily a dangerous property. There is no property which cannot, under possible circumstances, be a source of danger, a stack of chimneys, or a field of corn for instance. But property may be in its nature so dangerous, that a man keeps it suo periculo. Where it is not, he is liable only for negligence in keeping it. The keeping of a dangerous animal is wrongful, and a person can be indicted for it. Water, no doubt, requires to be restrained, but so do the walls of a house, or they would fall outwards. As to the point whether the damage was caused by making of the reservoir, or by the act of God, it must be remembered that water is not an active agent, and has no volition of its own like a dangerous animal has. The proximate cause here was the act of God. There were culverts blown up by the water that night, and it was the rush of the flood in consequence that caused the reservoirs to give way. The defendant could not foresee the influx of this additional water. This case differs from Fletcher v. Rylands. Here there is the act of God, and the water was not stored up by the defendant herself as in Fletcher v. Rylands. The defendant has been a perfectly innocent person, and cannot be held responsible for what is occasioned by "vis major." They cited Carstairs v. Taylor, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 217.

NICHOLLS v. MARSLAND.

[Ct. of App.]

Cotton, Q.C. replied.—My argument was intended to apply to property which has a natural tendency to do mischief, when it once gets off the position it is placed in. The water has been kept on the land, and that is the same thing as if the defendant had brought it there.

Our. adv. vult.

MELLISH, L.J.—This was an action brought by the county surveyor of the county of Chester against the defendant to recover damages on account of the destruction of a county bridge, which had been carried away by the bursting of some reservoirs. At the trial before the Lord Chief Justice it appeared that the defendant was the owner of a series of artificial ornamental lakes, which had existed for a great number of years, and had never, previous to the 18th June 1872, caused any damage. On that day, however, after a most unusual fall of rain, the lakes overflowed; the dams at their end gave way; and the water out of the lakes carried away a county bridge lower down the stream. The jury found that there was no negligence either in the construction, or the maintenance of the reservoirs, but that if the flood could have been anticipated, the effect might have been prevented. Upon this finding the Lord Chief Justice, acting on the decision in Fletcher v. Rylands as the nearest authority applicable to the case, directed a verdict for the plaintiff, but gave leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendant. The Exchequer Division have ordered the verdict to be entered for the defendant, and from their decision an appeal has been brought before us. The appellant relied upon the decision of the case of Fletcher v. Rylands. In that case the rule of law on which the case was decided was thus laid down by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the Exchequer Chamber, "We think the true rule of law is that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his land and collects, and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it at his peril, and if he does not do so is primâ facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default, or perhaps that the escape was the consequence of "vis major" or the act of God, but as nothing of the sort exists here it is unnecessary to inquire what excuse would be sufficient." It appears to me that we have two questions to consider; first the question of law which was left undecided in Fletcher v. Rylands, can the defendant excuse herself by showing that the escape of the water was owing to "vis major," or as it is termed in the law books, "act of God," and, secondly, if she can, did she in fact make out that the escape was so occasioned? Now, with respect to the first question, the ordinary rule of law is, that when the law creates a duty, and the party is disabled from performing it without any default of his own, by the act of God, or the King's enemies, the law will excuse him; but when a party by his own contract creates a duty, he is bound to make it good, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity. We can see no good reason why that rule should not be applied to the case before us. The duty of keeping the water in and preventing its escape is a duty imposed by the law and not one created by contract. If, indeed, the making a reservoir was a wrongful act in itself, it might be right to hold that a person could not escape from the consequences of his own wrongful act. But it seems to us absurd to hold that the making or the keeping a reservoir is a wrongful act in itself. The wrongful act is not the making or keeping the reservoir, but the allowing or causing the water to escape. If, indeed, the damages were occasioned by the act of the party, without more, as where a man accumulates water on his own land, but owing to the peculiar nature of the soil the water escapes and does damage to his neighbour, the case of Fletcher v. Rylands established that he must be held liable. The accumulation of water in a reservoir is not itself wrongful, but the making it and suffering the water to escape, if damage ensue, constitute a wrong. But the present case is distinguished from that of Fletcher v. Rylands in this—that it is not the act of the defendant in keeping this reservoir, an act in itself lawful, which alone leads to the escape of the water, and so renders wrongful that which but for such escape would have been lawful. It is the supervening "vis major" of the water caused by the flood, which superadded to the water in the reservoir, which of itself would have been innocuous, caused the disaster. A person cannot, in our opinion, be properly said to have caused or allowed the water to escape, if the act of God or the Queen's enemies was the real cause of its escaping without any fault on the part of the defendant. If a reservoir was destroyed by an earthquake, or the Queen's enemies destroyed it in conducting some warlike operations, it would be contrary to all reason and justice to hold the owner of the reservoir liable for any damage that might be done by the escape of the water. We are of opinion, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to excuse herself by proving that the water escaped through the act of God. The remaining question is, did the defendant make out that the escape of the water was owing to the act of God? Now the jury have distinctly found, not only that there was no negligence in the construction or the maintenance of the reservoirs, but that the flood was so great that it could not reasonably have been anticipated; although, if it had been anticipated, it might have been prevented; and this seems to us in substance a finding that the escape of the water was owing to the act of God. However great the flood had been, if it had not been greater than floods that had happened before, and might be expected to occur again, the defendant might not have made out that she was free from fault; but we think she ought not to be held liable because she did not prevent the effect of an extraordinary act of nature which she could not anticipate. In the late case of Nugent v. Smith, we held that a carrier might be protected from liability for loss occasioned by the act of God if the loss by no reasonable precaution could be prevented, although it was not absolutely impossible to prevent it. It was ingeniously argued for the appellant that at any rate the escape of the water was not owing solely to the act of God, because the weight of the water originally in the reservoirs must have contributed to break down the dams, as well as the extraordinary water brought in by the flood. We think, however, that the extraordinary quantity of water brought in by the flood is in point of law the sole proximate cause of the escape of the water. It is the last drop which makes the cup overflow. On the whole, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Exchequer Division ought to be affirmed.

HOWES v. PEAKE.

HOWES v. PEAKE.

23 Vict. c. 27 s. 6—Refreshment house—"Entertainment," what is.

The appellant kept a shop consisting of one room only, open in front, and without any seats. Persons were in the habit of frequenting the shop for the purpose of obtaining lemonade and ginger beer, which they simply drank at the counter and went away.

The shop was kept open until two or three o'clock in the morning. The appellant had no licence to keep a refreshment house.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court for Appeals from inferior courts, diss. Baggallay, J.A.), that this was a shop kept open for "public refreshment, resort, and entertainment," and therefore a licence within s. 6 of 23 Vict. c. 27, was required.

APPEAL from a decision of the Divisional Court for Appeals from Inferior Courts.

The appellant was convicted (on a summons taken out by the respondent, an officer of excise) before one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, for keeping a refreshment house without having a licence for the sale of beer, cider, wine, or spirits, as required by s. 6 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 27.

The Divisional Court of Appeal (Grove and Field, JJ., Cleasby, B., dissenting) affirmed the conviction, and the appellant appealed from this decision.

The case in the court below is fully reported (ante, p. 94; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 818).

The facts sufficiently appear from the head note to this report.

M'Intyre, Q.C., and J. Thompson, for the appellant.—Selling ginger beer over the counter is not keeping a refreshment room within the Act. Entertainment must mean something more than refreshment or resort. It cannot apply where the customers take their refreshment standing and go away. In Muir v. Keay (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 594), the premises were held on appeal from the magistrates to be a refreshment house, but there the defendants' house was found open during the night, and seventeen females and twenty men were there, and were being supplied with cigars, coffee, and ginger beer. [MELLISH, L.J.—The words "public resort" are perhaps meant to exclude clubs, where only certain persons and not the public have the right of admission.] In Taylor v. Oram (1 H. & C. 370), the defendants kept a dancing saloon, and the room where the defendants were found selling beer opened into the dancing room. There the magistrates held that it was not a refreshment house within sect. 6 (ubi sup.) on the ground that entertainment means something more than mere refreshment, and his decision was upheld.

O. Bowen, for the respondents.—This case does not differ from Muir v. Keay (ubi sup.). The word "entertainment" has a double meaning. It may mean refreshment only, but the facts here show something more than mere refreshment.

M'Intyre, Q.C., did not reply.

JAMES, L.J.—I think on the whole that the judgment of the majority of the court below must be affirmed. It is very difficult to apply a meaning to the word "entertainment" which would not extend to this case. In this shop the public are received and sheltered and refreshed, and I cannot myself put any meaning upon the word "entertainment" which would not include those facts.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question arises upon the effect to be given to the addition of the word "entertainment." The main object of the Act is to deal with refreshment houses, in which refreshments are sold which are to be consumed upon the premises. In sect. 6, requiring licences to be taken out by all houses, rooms, shops, or buildings, no doubt the words "resort and entertainment" are added to the word "refreshment;" but I do not think it necessary to hold that "entertainment" must necessarily be something entirely distinct from "refreshment." I think the word "entertainment," as far as it has any meaning, qualifies the meaning of the word "refreshment," because "entertainment" has a plain and natural meaning, and it includes the receiving of a person and providing him with drink and food of an agreeable nature. If you receive a man into your house and give him drink and food of an agreeable nature you entertain him; and I do not think a man is less entertained because he is not asked to sit down while he takes his refreshment. It appears to me, therefore, the word "entertain" so far qualifies the word "refreshment" that it must be such a kind of "refreshment" as partakes of the character of "entertainment." Mr. M'Intyre referred to the case of a chemist's shop—that would be an instance of what probably would not be "entertainment." The refreshment must be such a refreshment as you would call entertainment. I think that persons who are supplied with ginger beer, there being at any rate enough accommodation furnished to the persons drinking the ginger beer to provide them with the means of drinking it comfortably, are entertained. Therefore in my opinion the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I am unable to take the same view of the case as the Lords Justices. It appears to me that refreshments supplied in the way in which they are found to have been supplied in the special case are not within these words of the Act,

[CT. OF APP.]

REG. v. FLETCHER; Ex parte BIRNIE.

[CT. OF APP.]

"houses, rooms, shops, or buildings kept open for public refreshment, resort, and entertainment." I rely upon the precise words used by the magistrate by whom this case was settled—viz., "That the appellant's shop consisted only of one room, only open in front, without seats of any kind." The persons who frequented the shop simply drank their ginger beer or lemonade at the counter and went away. I think the correct view of the construction of this Act was taken by Mr. Justice Lush in the case of Muir v. Keay, to which reference has been made, viz., that there must be something added towards the comfort of the persons resorting to the house, shop, or room, in which the refreshments are supplied. For instance, a room fitted up with little round tables might satisfy that word "entertainment." Of course I do not mean to say it is necessary to have chairs and tables to satisfy the word "entertainment;" but it appears to me that there must be something beyond the mere fact of selling the ginger beer at the counter, and the persons drinking it and going away. A similar view seems to have been taken by Mr. Justice Blackburn, who seems to take the view that some effect must be given to the word "entertainment." He says, "It is the correlative of resort—the reception and accommodation of the public who resort to the place in question." What meaning he would give to the word "reception" does not clearly appear, except from the facts which existed in that case of Muir v. Keay; in that case you have this distinct fact found, not only that cigars, and ginger beer, and lemonade were consumed on the premises, but that at one time seventeen females and twenty males were found together in the room, that is to say, they were resorting there. I entertain some doubt whether the mere going to this shop to take ginger beer at the counter, and then going straight away was a resorting to the place within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. I think what is pointed out by the Act is something more than the purchase of the article, and the consumption of the article at the counter. That is the view I take of this case; and having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, it appears to me that the conviction was wrong.

QUAIN, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed in this case. It strikes me that this shop is a shop kept open for "public refreshment, resort, and entertainment" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. It is admitted that it is kept open for refreshment, and I do not share the doubts of Sir Richard Bagge, about whether it is kept open for resort. It is kept open for the public generally who may choose to resort to it as they did in this particular case. "Entertainment" includes refreshments, and may be something more. I cannot have any doubt that the object of this Act of Parliament is to include refreshment rooms; and it seems to me that a man who is refreshed is entertained at the same time that he is refreshed. He may be entertained without refreshment, but I do not think he can be refreshed without being entertained. It appears to me that the case comes within the terms of the Act of Parliament, and a house of this kind kept open till three o'clock in the morning is within the mischief pointed out by the statute; and therefore I think the judgment of the court below is right.

APPEAL FROM QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

(Before MELLISH, L.J., BRETT and AMPHLETT, J.J.A.)

REG. v. FLETCHER; Ex parte BIRNIE.

Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction—Right of appeal in criminal cases—36 & 37 Vict. c. 66 (Judicature Act 1873) s. 47—38 & 39 Vict. c. 77 (Judicature Act 1875) s. 19—First schedule, Order LXII.

An application to the Court of Queen's Bench for a certiorari to bring up a conviction to be quashed, on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the convicting justice, is a "criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of the above sections of the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875, and there is consequently, no appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

THE appellant, Birnie, had been summoned before the respondent, one of the justices of the peace for the county of Cumberland, for an offence against the game laws. On the hearing of the summons he had asserted, as an objection to the jurisdiction of the justice, the existence of a bonâ fide claim of right to the land in question in himself. That objection was, however, overruled, and the appellant was convicted. Subsequently a rule nisi was obtained in the Queen's Bench Division, calling upon the respondent to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up the conviction to be quashed, on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the justice who tried the case. The rule, however, was discharged on the hearing by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Quain, J., sitting to hear cases on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division. This appeal was from that decision.

Before counsel for the appellant proceeded to state his case,

Ford, for the respondent, took a preliminary objection that the court had no jurisdiction to try this appeal, as it was an appeal from a decision in "a criminal cause or matter," within the meaning of sect. 47 of the Act of 1873, and sect. 19 of the Act of 1875.

Bompas for the appellant.—The case lately decided in this court of Reg v. Steel, ante p. 399, may be said to be against me, but that case is distinguishable. That only decides that there shall be no appeal from the decision of a court of the High Court of Justice, where that decision is in a criminal proceeding. But here the decision in the Court of Queen's Bench was an application for a writ of certiorari to the justices on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to convict. The conviction itself was no doubt a criminal proceeding, but not the application for the prerogative writ of certiorari. The only question before the Queen's Bench Division was whether a claim had been set up bonâ fide or not. That was not a criminal proceeding in any sense, no more than a motion in the High Court with respect to the subpoena of a witness in a criminal case would be in itself a criminal proceeding. The writ of certiorari relates to Fletcher and not to Birnie.

MELLISH, L.J.—The question is, whether we have jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench refusing a writ of certiorari to be issued against the defendant, a justice of the peace for Cumberland. Now was that decision of the Court of Queen's Bench a decision "in a criminal cause or matter," within the meaning we gave to these words, in the case of Reg. v. Steel (sup.), which was before us a few days ago. We there held that those words were not confined to cases referred to the Court of Criminal Appeal, but went to criminal cases in the Court of Queen's Bench itself. Now a further and somewhat different question arises, whether there is an appeal from a proceeding in the Queen's Bench, which is not a criminal proceeding in that court, but arises out of a proceeding before the justices, which was a criminal proceeding. Under those circumstances was that proceeding in the Queen's Bench a proceeding in a criminal matter? In my opinion it is clear that, subject to the few exceptions specified, criminal procedure was intended to remain unaltered by the Judicature Act. The words of sect. 19 of the Act of 1875 are very wide, and relate to everything substantially a "criminal cause or matter." These words must be construed according to their natural meaning. Is this "a criminal cause or matter?" Before the magistrate it is, in the Queen's Bench it is not. If any appeal lies, it must lie on both sides. Suppose, here, the certiorari had been granted and the conviction had been brought up and quashed by the court of Queen's Bench. If there is an appeal here, there must be one also under those circumstances, and so a simple question of a small fine or a few days' imprisonment might ultimately get into the House of Lords. I think that cannot have been intended to be allowed. I think this is such a criminal cause or matter as is there intended. Sect. 19 of the Act of 1875 throws light on sect. 47 in the previous Act, and it assumes that the procedure has not been altered in criminal matters. It was not the intention of the Judicature Act to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in this respect.

TAYLOR v. CORPORATION OF OLDHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

BRETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. It all turns on the 47th section of the Act of 1873. The 19th section of the later Act can only be used as it was in Reg. v. Steel (sup.), that is, as interpreting the 47th section, criminal practice is to remain as before, unless altered by Rules of Court. The Rules of Court do not alter it, and, further, Order LXII was put in for the sake of caution, to show that none of the rules should apply to proceedings on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench, and that is all. The 19th section, therefore, shows that criminal practice, inasmuch as it is not altered by the rules, remains the same. In Reg. v. Steel it was argued that s. 47 was confined to cases before the Court of Criminal Appeal, but the court said the scope of the words was much larger. It is said here that those words do not apply where the question before the Queen's Bench was not a "criminal cause or matter." Now, what is this case? There has been a conviction, and there is an application for a writ of certiorari to bring it up to be quashed. Is that not a "criminal cause or matter?" It is to decide whether a man is to be kept in prison or fined or not. The proper construction is that there is no appeal where there was not one before, therefore, this case follows Reg. v. Steel (ante, p. 399).

AMPHLETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. To oust the jurisdiction of the justices there must be a bond fide assertion of right. Before the Court of Queen's Bench what was the question? Not whether there had been poaching or not, but whether there was a bond fide assertion of right. That is whether the plea to the jurisdiction was a good one or not. The same sort of question as there was in the Franconia case. Therefore this case comes under sect. 47 of the Act of 1873, under the exact meaning of its words. And, if we are to look at the public convenience, would it not be most inconvenient that this case should go through all the courts, not to try a civil right, but whether there was a bond fide objection or not?

Reported by J. E. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 17, 1876.

TAYLOR v. CORPORATION OF OLDHAM.

Sewers — Powers of local authority — "Street" — Local Act (Oldham Borough Improvement Act 1865), sects. 16, 27, 59, 60, 62, 160, 366 — Public Health Act 1875, sects. 16, 299 — Sewage Utilisation Act 1865, sect. 4.

The term "street," both in its general meaning, and by the Oldham Borough Improvement Act 1865 (Acts Local and Personal, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 311), includes a private road, for passage over which a toll is charged, and over which the public have no right of way.

The plaintiff was the owner of a private road at Oldham, and set up a toll bar at one end, and charged tolls for passengers. The defendants, without any further notice than the erection of a board with a printed notice thereon, proceeded to dig and construct sewers in the said road. The plaintiff moved for an injunction to restrain them from proceeding with the work.

Motion refused.

Held, that the corporation was empowered to construct such sewers, both under sect. 4 of the Utilisation of Sewage Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 75), s. 16, and the Public Health Act 1875 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 55), and by their Private Act.

The special rights and powers given by a Private Act of Parliament are not taken away by the general provisions of a Public Act.

*The plaintiffs are the present trustees of an indenture dated 3rd March 1837, whereby certain plots of ground, with the appurtenances, became vested in certain persons therein mentioned upon trust for "the Higginshaw and Lower Moor Road Company," thereby constituted. The object of the said company was to maintain the said road, and for that purpose to raise a sum not exceeding 1600*l.* in thirty-two shares of 50*l.* each, and no person, with the exception therein mentioned, was to travel on or use any part of the said road without paying such toll as was therein provided.*

The said road was duly completed, and toll bars erected, and the title of the company acknowledged from time to time by the defendants.

Some time previously to Oct. 1878, the defendants caused a notice, dated 3rd May 1876, to be posted up on a part of the said road or street, headed, "The Oldham Borough Improvement Act 1865," and addressed to all persons interested in the said road, to the effect that unless certain drainage works therein specified should be commenced within the period therein limited, the defendants might remove all obstructions in, upon, or under the said road or street, and sewer and drain, or otherwise complete the said street, or such part thereof as should not have been done, in such manner as they should think fit, and might charge the several owners of buildings or lands in such street with the expense of the execution by them (the defendants) of such works or incidental thereto, in the manner alleged to be prescribed by the said Act, the same to be paid or recoverable as therein provided in that behalf.

The said notice, as the plaintiffs alleged, was not brought to the knowledge of the plaintiffs previously to 20th Sept. 1876.

On or about 20th Sept. 1876, the defendants, without the consent of the said company or of the plaintiffs, and without any further notice than that above mentioned, acting, as they alleged, under the provisions of the Oldham Borough Improvement Act 1865, caused openings and excavations to be made in the surface and soil of the said road, called Shaw-road, for the purpose of laying or constructing a sewer, and threatened to proceed in the said excavations and construction without further notice to, or the consent of, any persons whatever. The defendants had in fact already caused several holes or shafts to be opened and made in Shaw-road, and were proceeding to cause cuttings or tunnels to be made to connect the said holes or shafts to a depth ultimately attaining 30ft. or thereabouts.

The plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants against proceeding with their works, and damages for the injury done thereby to the plaintiff's road.

Ince, Q.C. and E. W. Byrne, for the plaintiffs.—This is a close of land which has never been dedicated to the public. The defendants have been trespassing on our land and digging holes in it. There is no right of way for the public, and we had put up toll bars. The defendants have no authority under their private Act. See sect. 27 of the Private Act, in which this road, though spoken of for the sake of convenience as a "road" or "street," is treated as private property. It is in effect declared to be private property, which the corporation, if they wish to exercise any rights over it, must purchase. That section is not in any way repealed by the Public Act. [JESSEL, M.R.—What do you say is the meaning of the 5th subsection? That is the only point on which difficulty arises. Does the 5th subsection include this? It gets rid of sect. 60, does it not?] I go further. The Public Act does not repeal the Private Act, which in effect says: "Your close is not a street; if the corporation wish to treat it as a street they must buy up your rights." [JESSEL, M.R.—The third subsection seems to help your argument.]

Chitty, Q.C. and Macnaghten for defendants.—This is a street within the definitions in the Private Act [read to words "commencement of the Act"]. In sect. 27 this particular road is spoken of as a street. We have proceeded regularly under sect. 16. [JESSEL, M.R.—That section hardly applies to private property.] Yes; if a man makes his private property into a street, and there are compensation clauses in this Act. (See also sect. 59, on which we rely, and sects. 60 and 65 and 62, which provide for compensation. [JESSEL, M.R.—That makes the whole thing rational. These large powers are vested in the corporation for the sake of the public health. But you cannot go under sect. 16.] We claim under sects. 16 to 21; and also under sect. 16 of the Public Health Act of 1875. [JESSEL, M.R.—I think you can go under sect. 60, but not under sect. 16. Sect. 16 gives you a power when you are continuing a sewer.] We are continuing the sewage system. The 16th and 60th sections are to the same effect, except that in one there is compensation, and not in the other. Then this is a street under sect. 16. Street has a very large definition: (See the case of the Vestry of St. Mary's, Islington, L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 278.) [JESSEL, M.R.—The 16th section of the Public Health Act 1875, helps you.] See also section 299 of the Public Health Act of 1875. [JESSEL, M.R.—My impression is that sect. 27 helps you more than sect. 16.] There was a similar clause in the Public Health Act 1848. [JESSEL, M.R.—My attention was not called to the 3rd sub-section of sect. 27. With regard to a private street, unless you have powers independently of the Act, you are prohibited from making sewers unless you buy.] There is no express prohibition in the Act. It is only implied. [JESSEL, M.R.—You cannot under sect. 27 touch this particular street.] Under the 16th section and the earlier ones we can. [JESSEL, M.R.—No; nor under the 60th. The only power there is to make sewers under streets.] That is plain by the 3rd sub-section. [JESSEL, M.R.—It is saved by sect. 366. I see by the Public Health Act of 1848 sewers are vested in the sewer authorities. It is not a mere easement. Millar, as amicus curiæ, referred to Bigg v. Corporation of London (38 L. T. Rep. N. S., 336; L. Rep. 15 Eq. 376)]. There is an express decision, (Thomson v. Nutter, 31 J. P.) which decides that a sewer is an easement. [JESSEL, M.R.—It is not so. It required an Act of Parliament to set this right. But I see the 45th section of the Act of 1848 is very like the 16th section of the Act of 1875. Were you the local board at the time of the passing of the Improvement Act of 1865?] Yes. [JESSEL, M.R.—The 366th section states the right you then had. If you had this right at the passing of the Act of 1865, you have not lost it.]

The following are the sections in the respective Acts referred to in the arguments and the judgment:—

The Oldham Borough Improvement Act 1865, Local and Personal Acts (28 & 29 Vict. c. cccxi).

Sect. 16. If at any time any street or court (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) formed, set out, or laid out, either before or after the commencement of this Act, is not sewered, drained, levelled, flagged, and paved, or macadamised to the satisfaction of the corporation, they may at any time, and from time to time, order that it be freed from obstruction, sewered, drained, levelled, flagged, paved, macadamised, and otherwise completed with such materials at such levels, with such inclinations, and with sewers and drains of such dimensions, and that the soil thereof be raised, lowered, or altered in such manner, and within such time, as the

TAYLOR v. CORPORATION OF OLDHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Order directs; and thereupon the respective owners of the buildings and lands in such street or court shall, at their own respective expense, remove all obstructions in, upon, or under, and sewer, drain, level, flag, pave, macadamise, and otherwise complete such street or court within the time and in the manner prescribed by the Order.

SECT. 27. With respect to the road or street called Shaw-road the following provisions shall take effect:

Then sub-sects. 1 and 2 give the corporation a right to purchase all private rights of way, and other rights connected with levying tolls and otherwise over the said road, and that such rights should be in the nature of land.

Sub-sect. 3. On the completion of such purchase and taking, all the rights and interests aforesaid shall be by virtue of this Act absolutely extinguished, and the corporation shall remove and abate all gates, &c., or other obstructions then existing in, on, or over any part of the carriageway or footway of the said road or street, and thenceforth the said road or street shall be and continue a street open to the passage of the public, and free from encroachment, and shall be subject to all the provisions relating to the sewerage, draining, levelling, flagging, and paving or macadamising, or otherwise completing of streets not being highways repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Sub-sect. 5. Nothing in this Act shall empower the corporation to purchase or take by compulsion any estate or interest in the soil of the said road or street.

SECT. 59. All existing and future public sewers and drains within the borough, and all existing and future sewers and drains in and under the streets and courts, with all the works and materials thereunto belonging, whether made or provided at the cost of the corporation, or otherwise, and the entire management of the same, with the appurtenances, shall vest in and belong to the corporation, and the corporation shall maintain, cleanse, and flush the same.

The 60th section gives the corporation power to construct sewers necessary for the effectual drainage of the borough, the conversion of open drains into sewers, the carrying under cellars and streets, the continuing of them to the most convenient place for the collection of sewage matter so as not to cause a nuisance; and, if necessary, to construct works within or beyond the borough, and to remove obstructions to any of the above purposes.

The 62nd provides compensation for works connected with the exercise of these powers.

SECT. 160: If any such delay or omission (i.e., on the part of the corporation in reinstating streets, &c., after the construction of sewers) as aforesaid takes place, the persons having the control or management of the street, bridge, sewer, drain, pipe, tunnel, work, or obstruction in respect of which such delay or omission takes place, may cause the work so delayed or omitted to be executed, and the expense of executing the same shall be repaid to such persons by the corporation.

SECT. 366 enacts: Nothing in this Act shall take away or abridge any right, power, or authority which the corporation have or may enjoy under the Municipal Corporation Acts, or otherwise, independently of this Act.

Utilisation of Sewage Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 75) sect. 4: Sewer authorities shall have power to construct such sewers as they may think necessary for keeping their district properly cleansed and drained, and shall, as respects all sewers constructed by them or under their control, whether the same were made before or after the passing of this Act, have all the powers that local boards have in respect of sewers vested in or constructed by them under the 45th and 46th sections of the Public Health Act 1848, and other Acts therein specified.

Public Health Act 1875, sect. 16: Any local authority may carry any sewer through, across, or under any turnpike road or any street or place laid out as or intended for a street, or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriageway of any street; and after giving reasonable notice in writing to the owner or occupier (if on the report of the surveyor it appears necessary) into, through, or under any lands whatsoever within their district. They may also (subject to the provisions of this Act relating to sewage works without the district of the local authority) exercise all or any of the powers given by this section without their district for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage.

The 299th section of the Act of 1875 provides that when complaint to the Local Government Board has been made of default on the part of the local authority in providing and cleansing sewers, the board, on being satisfied of the offence, may make an order giving the local authority a certain time to do the work, and if the latter fail to do so, the board may have the work done by its own officer, and charge the expense thereof on and recover the same from the local authority. And any person appointed by the Local Government Board to do the work shall have the same power in all respects as was vested in the local authority for that purpose.

JESSEL, M.R.—The first question I have to consider is, whether, independently of the local Act, there is any power in the corporation to do this work. Of course, if they had this power at all it must have been under the general Act, and I must say I cannot help thinking that the persons who were parties to this local Act, which received the Royal Assent on July 5th 1865, and which, following the terms of the preamble, was intended to comprise all the Acts which in any way related to the local government of this corporation with reference to streets, will be a little surprised to find that by means of another Act of Parliament, the public Act having received the Royal assent a few days before, the whole of that intention has been defeated so far, and that the corporation will, therefore, for many years, be under the control of two Acts. I think also that those persons interested in claiming special exemption, and special provisions as regards their own particular lands, will be a little surprised to find that by reason of this general saving in the local Act and all other powers, as regards the corporation then existing, in an important Act (not passed, no doubt, at the time) they assented to the provisions of the local Acts, but it had unfortunately received the royal assent a few days before. Whatever you may think of the extraordinary results, which are so caused, it is my duty to interpret Acts of Parliament as I find them. I must treat them according to the ordinary rules of construction—that is, literally, unless there is something in the context, or in the subject, to prevent that reading. I find in the 366th section of the Local Act this provision: "Nothing in this Act contained shall take away or abridge any right, power, or authority which the Corporation have, or may enjoy, under the Municipal Corporation Acts, or otherwise, independently of this Act." An argument was addressed to me to the effect that that meant Municipal Corporation Acts or other like Acts. I am unable to appreciate the argument. I do not know what Acts like the Municipal Corporation Acts are, and consequently I cannot understand what it is that is similar to a Municipal Corporation Act not being a corporation Act. As the Municipal Corporation Acts include all the Acts which are Corporation Acts, I must read "otherwise" to be "otherwise," and to have its proper meaning, and therefore it means "otherwise" independently of this Act. In other words, that all the rights, powers, and authorities which the Corporation had, independently of this Act, were preserved to them. Now this Act received the royal assent on the 5th July 1865, and consequently preserved to the Corporation, as I read it, any rights or powers they had not repealed by this Act. One of the Acts upon which great stress was laid last time, it now turns out, upon investigation, was repealed, and that another Act, only passed a few days before, was not repealed (I suppose, accidentally, nobody knowing anything about it), and had received the royal assent on the 29th June 1865. So that on the 5th July this other Act was in force, and if I am to read the section of the Local Act, as I do read it, to be general, then the Corporation had the power under the Public Act to make the sewer under this street. That there can be no question about. At least, I think not, because they are to have power to construct "such sewers as they think fit." Now by sect. 4 of the Sewage Utilisation Act 1865, the powers of which are similar for this purpose to those of the Public Health Act 1875, the sewer authority, which this Corporation was, have all necessary powers "for keeping their district properly cleaned and drained." [His Lordship read down to the words "Public Health Act 1848."] There is no substantial difference. The result therefore is, that under this particular Act they have the powers vested in them for constructing a sewer under the street which are vested in authorities of this kind by the other Public Act. That being so, the only question which remains is whether that power has been taken away. Now the actual Public Act in question was repealed by the Public Health Act of 1875. It was repealed by what is called a Consolidation Act, that is it was repealed for the purpose of having its provisions consolidated into one Act. For the purpose for which I am now dealing with the Public Health Act of 1875, I take the Public Health Act of 1848 to have been substantially copied, because there is no appreciable variation. Therefore, in considering the effect of the Act of 1875 on the Local Act, I really must treat the Public Health Act of 1875 as a mere continuation of the powers of the Sewage Utilization Act of 1865, not that it was really so in form, but that it was so in effect. In other words, if the intention of the Legislature in passing the Local Act was to preserve the general powers under the Sewage Utilisation Act, which I am bound to rule it was (whatever my own opinion may be upon the subject not being judicial), then I am of opinion that the rule which says that ordinary general legislation does not override special legislation, has no application to the case before me. General legislation was expressly reserved by the Local Act; and the Consolidated Act, being a mere continuance of that general legislation, is not in substance a new power conferred on the corporation, but simply a continuation of their old powers. It is in no way interfered with by the provisions of the Local Act. Now that brings me to the next point, viz., what is the power? If the power is contained anywhere, it is contained in the 16th section of the Public Health Act 1875: "Any local board may carry any sewer through, across, or under any turnpike road or any street, or place laid out or intended for a street." The question I have to consider is this: Is the place in question "a street or a place laid out as or intended for a street?" In considering that, I must also take into account the interpretation clause of this Act of Parliament, which says that a "street includes any road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not." I must also take into consideration that the Act expressly calls places "streets," whether they are on public property or private property, and whether the public have any rights over them, or have no rights over them.

There is a series of sections beginning with the 150th, the marginal note of which explains what I mean: "power to compel paving, &c., of private streets." The word "streets" in the Act of Parliament clearly extends to places which are in all respects private, and over which the public have no right. If it is anything, therefore, this is a private street. Now, what is it? It is a strip of land which seems to have been sold for the purpose of being made or turned into a road. What exact rights the owners of the land reserved to themselves, except that it is said they reserved some, I do not know. The fact is, they built houses on each side of this private road, and these houses exist, and have been used by the occupiers from that day to this, and these houses are within the borough of Oldham. Now, the first question I have to consider is, Is it a street or not? I have no doubt it is a street. In the first place I was told that it could not be a street at all, unless the owners of the houses had a right of way along it. In this particular instance there is no evidence at all as to whether there was or was not a right of way. As I said before, all I know is, that there were some exceptions, but it is not denied that they do exercise such a right of way, and do pass and repass, and therefore I shall presume, in the absence of express evidence to the contrary, that they have some right of way, and if it is necessary, which I do not think it is, I shall assume that the owners of the houses have some sort of right of way in the street. That appears sufficiently for the purpose of this motion. I do not think it is necessary. The definition of a street is correctly laid down in the Imperial Dictionary, which I have sent for. "The street itself is no doubt the properly paved or prepared road, that is, the street. It sometimes includes the houses along each side of it. But that is not its proper meaning. It is called a street even without houses. There are some streets with no houses. But the usual common meaning of the word street, is a road with houses on one or both sides of it." Now, tried by that test, this is a street. It has houses on both sides of it. Therefore, in common parlance, it is a street. There is no need of a definition, because street is to include "street" according to this interpretation clause. It is really a street; supposing that were wrong, I find "street" is to include "road," and it certainly is a road. But not only that, it is to apply to any "place laid out as, or intended for, a street." It is laid out as a street, and distinguishable from any other street, so that in every way that you can define it, it appears to me to be within the section. Is it the common sense of the section? The learned counsel pressed upon me that we must have some regard to common sense, in the meaning of the section. I by no means wish it to be thought that I disregard it. It would be monstrously absurd to interpret the Act in any other way. What is the Act for? It is a Public Health Act with regard to the owners of these private courts and alleys, who are the worst people in the world for laying out money, because in these places the poor live, the people whose tenements are not provided with sewers and drains, are the very people who suffer from the want of sewage and drains, which are so requisite for public health. Is it to be imagined that the Legislature intended to except the very worst places from the operation of the powers of the Act? I should say, if the Act was passed for anybody, it must have been meant to include these people, who for the sake of gain, and requiring high rents in proportion to the wretched tenements they allow the poor to occupy, have neglected these ordinary and necessary sanitary precautions. If I am to interpret it by what I might think to be the mind of the Legislature, I should suppose that the first people to be included would be the owners of these crowded courts and alleys, on which the public have no strict right whatever, but which are intended to be used as streets and houses for the dwellings of the poor, without providing them with what, according to modern science, is known to be absolutely necessary for their well being. Looking at it in that way, common sense is entirely in accordance with what I conceive to be its true legal meaning. That being so, in my opinion, this is a street within the meaning of the Act, and the defendants have power to make the sewer under it, without any notice whatever. Now it must not be omitted to be mentioned, that if they do take property under these Acts, they must make compensation, consequently no injury is done to any one by their exercising these powers. They give health to the inhabitants, and they pay for the property which they take for a purpose which is a gain, and which common sense would dictate. It is on the same principle that when roads and canals and other public works are to be executed, there are powers given to take private property for that purpose, making due compensation. That gets rid of the argument on that Act. Now with regard to the local Act. I must say (and this may have hereafter a bearing on the question of costs) that I think the corporation was entirely mistaken in the course they pursued, because, as I read the 27th section (and if it was necessary I might call in aid that the very local Act calls these places a street or road, but I do not think it is necessary, and it is very difficult to describe it in any other way), as regards this particular road, I cannot help thinking that the corporation made a bargain on the 27th section which they did not intend to repudiate, by giving notice under the 16th section; the corporation, by the 27th section, obtained the right to purchase the private rights over this road. They were to do it within a year. And when they completed the purchase, then it was to be subject to the provisions relating to sewerage, &c., which affect streets not being highways. When we come to look at the 16th section, which is the section in question, it obviously applies to a private street—a street not being a highway, and, consequently, according to all ordinary rules of interpretation, when you find this particular power is to be subject to those provisions in the completion of the purchase, you import into it a negative: that is, that until completion it is not to be so subject. On that ground I have no hesitation in saying that the advisers of the corporation were mistaken, and their counsel have given up that point. Then there is another point of much more difficulty, on which I have heard a great deal of argument, as to whether, introducing this 3rd sub-section of sect. 27 of the Local Act, they might do it under another section of the same Act of Parliament—the 160th. No doubt it is not very easy to reconcile all the clauses in this Act, and I am very far from saying that there is not a good deal to be said in favour of the view which has been presented to me with a great deal of energy; but I think in all these Acts of Parliament the first thing you have to consider is, that when you have general provisions, whether contained in the same Act, or another Act of Parliament, and when you have special provisions as to a particular property, in the ownership of an individual, you must read the special provisions as excepted out of the general. That is the only way of reconciling these Acts of Parliament. It is the practice of Parliament (as those who have the misfortune of going before parliamentary committees know), to insert the clauses which are agreed on, and then these persons who have obtained their insertion leave the room, and have nothing further to do with the Act of Parliament. The committee would not listen to them on the general clauses. They would only say: "It is no business of yours. You have been provided for, and you have had all your clauses put in." If you once admit the doctrine, that the general provisions are to override the special ones, anybody who could get a clause in the Act ought to be heard on every clause of that Act. I can only say I think it would be simply impossible to conduct private legislation at all, if any such doctrine were admitted, or prevailed. I consider it to be the established rule, that when you find general provisions of this sort, either in the same Act or in other Acts, they are not to control or repeal the special provisions, which are considered to provide for the particular property. I should, therefore, on that ground, not be disposed to hold that the 59th and 60th sections were intended to override the 27th. It is said they do not override them at all. The 60th clause enables the corporation to make from time to time the sewers which are necessary for the effectual drainage of the borough. That is general—"under any street." It cannot, properly speaking, affect the 16th section, because the meaning of the section is that where it is a private street the corporation is not to make the sewer; that is, not at the public expense. The owners of the houses are to make the sewer, and it is only on their refusal that the corporation is to make it. Then what is to happen? The owners of the houses are to pay for it. They have no business to throw the burden of making the new sewers in their private streets on the whole of the town, which they would do if the 60th section was intended to apply. But it is not, because it is a general provision, and you must except out of it the special provision, on the principles which I have mentioned. Then it goes further, because the 59th section makes the corporation owners of the sewers when once made. The words are: "All existing and future public sewers and drains within the borough, and all existing and future sewers and drains," and so forth, are to vest in the corporation, whether made or provided at the cost of the corporation or otherwise." Now, that is a very useful provision. It was found under the old law, and it was sometimes held that the sewer authorities (they were not sewer authorities in those days) had only an easement, and it was found to be very inconvenient, and consequently, therefore, in the modern Acts the property in the sewers has been vested in the sewer authorities, that is to say, that instead of allowing the subsoil to remain in the owner of the soil, subject to an easement, or right of sewage or drainage, the absolute property in the sewer (which means not merely the brick barrel, or whatever it may be made of, forming the sewer, but the whole interior of the sewer, that is the whole of the soil included in it, and, if I may say so, the barrel of the sewer), is now vested in the sewage authorities, and if the sewer is a large one, it amounts in substance, for all useful purposes, to the whole of the subsoil, and that is absolutely vested in the corporation. That being so, what would follow if I am to allow the 60th section to apply? They would make the sewer under the private street, and then become the owners, for all substantial purposes, of the subsoil; of course making compensation to the owners. But I find that the 5th sub-section of sect. 27 is this: "Nothing in this Act shall empower the corporation to purchase or take by compulsion any estate or interest in the soil of the said road or street." If I am right as to the meaning of the 59th and 60th sections, they do acquire it by compulsion, because they make compensation for the interest in the soil of the road or street. Why should I depart from the literal meaning of the words when I find that they exactly accord with what I should describe as the common sense of the arrangement—viz., that you shall not make a sewer under this street, and shall not interfere with it at all, unless you pay for it. That is the meaning of the arrangement between the parties, and that the literal meaning of the Act. The words are: "Nothing in this Act shall empower." It is not "nothing in this section." I asked the learned counsel who argued it so strenuously for the plaintiff, what possible meaning there could be to it, if that was not it. The answer, which was more ingenious than successful, was that it was a saving clause, and that he did not feel bound to put any meaning on it at all, and that a saving clause does not necessarily import that the thing that it is saving was included in any of the provisions. That, at all events, is not a satisfactory answer, when you do find something that does affect the property in question. It would be available, if it was desired to press the saving clause, to say, as has sometimes been tried, that you must import a provision in the Act, affecting the subject matter to which the saving clause applies. If that were so, then it might be well to say this was put in ex abundanti cautela, and you cannot imply from the effect of the saving clause that there is an enactment affecting the thing saved, when the saving clause is not there. But when you have a saving clause and find another enactment which does directly affect the subject matter of the saving clause, then I think the natural construction, and the proper one, is to say that the saving clause was intended to be an exception out of the Act, and not to say that it was put in ex abundanti cautela, when it is really wanted for the very purpose which by the terms of the saving clause itself it does effect. I think, therefore, if it stood on the local Act alone, or on the local Act independently of the Sewage Utilization Act, I should have been in favour of the plaintiff, but as it is, and for the reasons I have given, I am in favour of the defendants. I therefore enforce the motion, making the costs costs in the cause.

Re THE METROPOLITAN BUILDING ACT 1855; Ex parte McBRYDE.

Party-wall—Metropolitan Building Act 1855 s. 85—Appointment of third surveyor—Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 12—Pending action.

Where "a difference arises" between a "building owner" and the "adjoining owner" with reference to a party-wall, and the two surveyors appointed by the parties refuse to appoint a third surveyor, the court has power, under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 12, to appoint a third surveyor to act with the other two in settling the matters in dispute between the parties under the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, s. 85, sub-sect. 7, although an action be then pending to restrain the building owner from interfering with an ancient light of the adjoining owner in the party-wall.

ADJOURNED summons. This was an application by James Montgomerie McBryde and Thomas Workman Orr (the building owners of the premises known as No. 10, Jewin-crescent, in the City of London), that an umpire or third arbitrator might be appointed to act with the surveyors appointed by them and Mr. Warner (the adjoining owner of the premises known as No. 9, Jerwin-crescent) to settle the matters in dispute between such building and adjoining owners respectively under the Metropolitan Building Act 1855.

On the 19th Nov. 1875, Messrs. McBryde and Orr served on Mr. Warner, pursuant to sect. 85 of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, a notice with reference to the party wall separating the premises known as No. 10 from the premises known as No. 9, Jewin-crescent, stating (amongst other things) that they proposed "to brick up all openings in such wall," and that they had appointed "Messrs. Herbert Ford and R. Lempriere Hesketh, of 21, Aldermanbury, City," as their surveyors to superintend the work, and to settle on their behalf all matters of difference that might arise in relation thereto.

On the 29th March 1876, Mr. Warner wrote to Messrs. McBryde and Orr, informing them that he had appointed Mr. Frederick Todd as his surveyor.

On the 20th April 1876, Mr. Warner commenced an action against Messrs. McBryde and Orr and the Goldsmiths' Company, claiming, amongst other things, an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting any building on the site of No. 10, Jewin-crescent, and from doing anything to darken or interfere with the windows or lights in the premises No. 9, Jewin-crescent.

On the 25th May 1876, Mr. Warner moved for an injunction, which the Vice-Chancellor refused to grant. Mr. Warner then took the matter to the Court of Appeal, who affirmed the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, and refused to grant the injunction.

On the 1st Aug. 1876, Messrs. McBryde and Orr wrote to Mr. Warner (with reference to their party-wall notice of the 19th Nov. 1875) to inform him that the surveyor appointed by them was Mr. Frederick Todd, and that Mr. R. Lempriere Hesketh, mentioned in such notice, was not to act.

On the same day Messrs. McBryde and Orr

served upon Mr. Herbert Ford (as their surveyor) and Mr. Frederick Todd (as the surveyor of Mr. Warner) a notice requiring them to appoint an umpire or third arbitrator, pursuant to the 12th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, in consequence of differences having arisen between Messrs. McBryde and Orr (as building owners) and Mr. Warner (as adjoining owner) with regard to the party wall.

Mr. Todd, acting on Mr. Warner's instructions, refused to concur with Mr. Ford in the appointment of an umpire.

The main question in argument was whether, under the above circumstances, the court had power, under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 12, to appoint a third surveyor.

The Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 12, is as follows: "If in any case of arbitration the document authorising the reference provide that the reference shall be to a single arbitrator, and all the parties do not, after differences have arisen, concur in the appointment of an arbitrator . . . or if, where the parties, or two arbitrators, are at liberty to appoint an umpire or third arbitrator, such parties or arbitrators do not appoint an umpire or third arbitrator . . . then in every such instance any party may serve the remaining parties, or the arbitrators, as the case may be, with a written notice to appoint an arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator respectively; and if within seven clear days after such notice shall have been served, no arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator be appointed, it shall be lawful for any judge of any of the superior courts of law or equity at Westminster, upon summons to be taken out by the party having served such notice as aforesaid, to appoint an arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator, as the case may be; and such arbitrator, umpire, and third arbitrator respectively, shall have the like power to act in the reference, and make an award as if he had been appointed by consent of all parties."

John Pearson, Q.C. and Ferrers, in support of the summons.—On the 19th Nov. 1875, Messrs. McBryde and Orr gave Mr. Warner a proper notice of what they proposed to do to the party wall. The informality (if any) in the notice in naming Messrs. Ford and Hesketh (who are partners) as our surveyors, was set right by the letter of the 1st Aug. 1876, appointing Mr. Ford alone as our surveyor. Mr. Todd was duly appointed by Mr. Warner as his surveyor before the commencement of the action. Our surveyor is willing to concur with Mr. Todd in selecting a third surveyor, pursuant to the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, sect. 85, sub-s. 7; but Mr. Todd, acting on Mr. Warner's instructions, refuses to concur. We have served the two surveyors with a proper notice under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 12, to appoint a third surveyor, and, as no such surveyor has been appointed, we are now entitled to ask the court to make the appointment under that section.

Glasse, Q.C. and Nalder for Mr. Warner.—The main object of the action of Warner v. McBryde, which is now pending, is to restrain the defendants from interfering with an ancient light of Mr. Warner's house by raising the party wall; and Messrs. McBryde and Orr are now seeking, by an application to raise their party-wall, under the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, to interfere with one of our ancient lights; this they have no power to do under that Act, which has reference only to structural damage:

Titterton v. Conyers, 5 Taunt. 465;
Wells v. Odry, 1 M. & W. 452;
Crofts v. Haldane, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 116; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 194.

The "difference between" the parties not being a matter within the scope of the Building Act, the court has no power, under sect. 12 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, to appoint a third surveyor. A subsequent Act of Parliament cannot be "a document authorising the reference" within the meaning of that section. They also referred to

The Metropolitan Building Act 1855, sect. 85, sub-s. 9.

J. Pearson, Q.C., in reply.—The third clause of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 12, refers to any case of arbitration whatever, where "two arbitrators do not appoint a third arbitrator:"

Re Lyon, 1 K. & J. 90.

MALINS, V.C. said.—I will first take the case as if there had been no pending suit between the parties. The Metropolitan Building Act 1855, sect. 85, sub sect. 7, provides that "In all cases not hereby specially provided for, where a difference arises between a building owner"—here Messrs. McBryde and Orr are the building owners—"and adjoining owner"—here Mr. Warner is the adjoining owner—"in respect of any matter arising under this Act, unless both parties concur in the appointment of one surveyor, they shall each appoint a surveyor, and the two surveyors so appointed shall select a third surveyor, and such one surveyor, or three surveyors, or any two of them, shall settle any matter in dispute between such building and adjoining owner, with power by his or their award to determine the right to do, and the time and manner of doing, any work, and generally any other matter arising out of or incidental to such difference." Under these circumstances, a difference having arisen, Messrs. McBryde and Orr, on the 19th Nov. 1875, appointed Messrs. Ford and Hesketh as their surveyors. They may have been right, or they may have been wrong, in appointing two instead of one; but that was set right by the notice of the 1st Aug. 1876, which withdrew the name of Mr. Hesketh, and stated that Mr. Ford was alone to act. In the meantime, on the 29th March 1876, Mr. Warner had appointed his surveyor, Mr. Todd. Mr. Ford, on the one side, and Mr. Todd on the other side, being thus appointed, it was their obvious duty to appoint a third surveyor. Mr. Ford is perfectly willing to do so now, but Mr. Todd is not, because he is forbidden to do so by the gentleman who has named him as his surveyor. Under these circumstances what is to be done? This is an arbitration. But it was gravely argued by the plaintiff that sect. 12 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 does not apply because there is here no "document authorising the reference" within the meaning of that section. I was about to decide that the Act of Parliament is a "document" within the meaning of that section; or at all events, that the section applies to every case where there is an arbitration between parties, whether the reference to arbitration be by parol or by a document in the strict sense of the word, or (as in the present case) by an Act of Parliament. The plain object of the Legislature is that, whenever the parties refuse to appoint an arbitrator the court may do so. I am glad to find that the view which I had entertained has already been entertained by Vice-Chancellor Page Wood in Re Lyon. That decision meets with my entire concurrence. I am, therefore, of opinion that the case is within sect. 12 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. That section provides by the third clause that "if, where the parties or two arbitrators are at liberty to appoint an umpire, or third arbitrator, such parties or arbitrators do not appoint an umpire or third arbitrator . . . then in every such instance any party may serve the remaining parties." This evidently means that one party to the arbitration may serve the other party. I am very sorry that the plaintiff should have thought fit to take the technical objection that the arbitrator and not Mr. Warner was the person to be served. Then the Act goes on—"In every such instance any party may serve the remaining parties or the arbitrators, as the case may be, with a written notice to appoint an arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator respectively; and if, within seven clear days after such notice shall have been served, no arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator be appointed, it shall be lawful for any judge of any of the Superior Courts of law or equity at Westminster, upon summons to be taken out by the party having served such notice as aforesaid, to appoint an arbitrator, umpire, or third arbitrator, as the case may be." Therefore, assuming that no suit is pending, the case is, in my opinion, of the simplest description. The surveyors, appointed by each party, refuse to appoint a third surveyor; and it therefore falls upon the court, under the third clause of the section which I have just read, as a matter of simple justice, to do for the parties that which they refuse to do for themselves. But then it is said that the court must not interfere, because there is a pending suit. It is quite true that, on the 20th April last, Mr. Warner commenced an action against Messrs. McBryde and Orr and the Goldsmiths' Company, to restrain interference with a small window which was in the old party wall. On the 25th May last I decided that the plaintiff had not made out a case for the interference of the court by injunction in regard to that window. The case went from me to the Court of Appeal, who came to the same conclusion, that there was no case for the interference of the court; and so the matter stands at present. I quite agree with the plaintiff that neither my decision, nor the decision of the Court of Appeal is conclusive, because the matter may be decided a different way at the hearing. If I were to accede to the argument that the court must not interfere because there is a pending suit, it would follow that whenever "the adjoining owner," wishing to vex his neighbour and to impede his building operations, refuses to concur in appointing an umpire, he has only to file a bill and let the court see that there is a pending litigation; and then the mere fact of the pending of such litigation (however ridiculous the litigation might be) would paralyse the arm of the court. I cannot accede to any such argument. And it is unnecessary for me to do so, because the cases cited by Mr. Glasse (and concurred in by Mr. Pearson) decide that the surveyors so appointed cannot decide any question between the parties as to the existence of ancient lights. All that these surveyors are to decide is in what manner and under what circumstances the party wall is to be built; and if they should fail in their duty, and make any order with regard to this ancient light, such order would be entirely disregarded by the court, as being beyond their powers, and entitled to no consideration. If Messrs. McBryde and Orr go on, and erect this wall, with full notice of the claim of the plaintiff in the suit now pending, and stop up a window which ought not to be stopped up, I shall have no hesitation in ordering them (at the hearing) to undo that which they have improperly done. I shall, therefore, accede to this application. The substance of the order will be as follows: It appearing that the surveyors appointed by the parties refuse to appoint an umpire, the court, in pursuance of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, appoints Mr. Christopher, if he will act, as third surveyor to settle the matters in dispute between the parties under the Metropolitan Building Act 1853, s. 85, sub-sect. 7: and Mr. Warner must pay the costs of the adjournment into court.

REG. v. ASPINALL AND OTHERS.

Conspiracy to obtain quotation on Stock Exchange
—Terms of indictment.

It is an indictable offence to conspire to induce the committee of the Stock Exchange to allow a quotation of the shares of a joint-stock company, whereby to persuade persons who should buy and sell shares of the company, that the company has been duly constituted, and has so complied with the rules of the Stock Exchange as to entitle the company to have its shares quoted in the official list of the Stock Exchange.

THE defendants, being six in number, had been tried at the London Hilary Sittings 1875, before Cockburn, C.J., and a special jury, on an indictment for conspiracy to defraud. The indictment contained twelve counts, the defendants being found guilty on the first and second counts only.

The first count set out at great length the establishment, constitution of the committee of the London Stock Exchange, and that the said committee had formed certain rules and regulations for the management of the Stock Exchange, and had power to expel any member of the Stock Exchange who should break such rules; that two of the defendants had been directors, and one of them secretary, of a new joint-stock company called the Eupion Fuel and Gas Company, Limited, and three of them had aided in the establishment of such company; that all persons dealing in the shares of a new company, required, according to the rules of the Stock Exchange, that a "special settling day" should be fixed by the said committee for delivery of and payment in respect of all shares in such new company theretofore bought and sold; that the defendants applied for a special settling day; that it thereupon became necessary that the company should comply with the following rules of the Stock Exchange committee:

Q.B. Div.]

REG. J. ASPINALL AND OTHERS.

[Q.B. Div.]

127. The committee will appoint a special settling-day for transactions in the shares of a new company, provided that no allegation of fraud be substantiated; that there has been no misrepresentation or suppression of material facts; that sufficient scrip or shares are ready for delivery, and that no impediment exists to the settlement of the account.

128. The secretary to the share and loan department shall give one week's notice to the Stock Exchange of any application for a special settling-day for transactions in the shares of a new company, previously to such application being submitted to the committee, and shall require the production of the following documents, viz.:—

The prospectus, the Act of Parliament, the articles of association, or a certificate that the company is constituted upon the cost book system, under the statutory laws.

The original applications for shares, the allotment book, signed by the chairman and secretary to the company, and a certificate verified by the statutory declaration of the chairman and the secretary, stating the number of shares applied for and unconditionally allotted to the public, the amount of deposits paid thereon, and that such deposits are absolutely free from any lien.

The banker's pass-book, and a certificate from the bankers, stating the amount of deposits received.

That the defendants had conspired to induce certain members of the committee of the Stock Exchange, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the rules above set forth, to grant a special settling-day; and that the defendants falsely pretended to the said members of the said committee (inter alia), that the number of shares of the said company applied for by the public was 34,365, whereas the number of shares applied for by the public was not 34,365, nor any number whatsoever.

The second count stated that the defendants were directors, &c., of the said company, and that application had been made on behalf of the company to the committee of the Stock Exchange, to order the quotation of the new company in the official list of the Stock Exchange, in pursuance of the following rule of the Stock Exchange:

129. The committee will order the quotation of a new company in the official list, provided that the company is of bond fide character, and of sufficient magnitude and importance; that the requirements of Rule 128 have been complied with, and that the prospectus has been publicly advertised, and agrees substantially with the Act of Parliament, or the articles of association, and in the case of limited companies contains the memorandum of association; that it provides for the issue of not less than one-half of the nominal capital, and for the payment of ten per cent. upon the amount subscribed, and sets forth the arrangements for raising the capital, whether by shares fully or partly paid up, with the amounts of each respectively, and also states the amount paid, or to be paid, in money or otherwise to concessionaires, owners of property, or others on the formation of the company, or to contractors for works to be executed, and the number of shares, if any, proposed to be conditionally allotted;

That two-thirds of the whole nominal capital proposed to be issued have been applied for and unconditionally allotted to the public (shares reserved or granted in lieu of money payments to concessionaires, owners of property or others, not being considered to form part of such public allotment); that the articles of association restrain the directors from employing the funds of the company in the purchase of its own shares, and that a member of the Stock Exchange is authorised by the company to give full information as to the formation of the undertaking, and be able to furnish the committee with all particulars they may require.

That the defendants had authorised Sir Robert Carden and others, being a firm of stockbrokers, and members of the Stock Exchange, to apply to the committee to order the quotation of the shares of the company in the official list of the Stock Exchange; and that the defendants conspired to deceive the members of the said committee, and to induce them, contrary to the intent of the three rules above set forth, to order a quotation of the shares of the company in the official list of the Stock Exchange, and thereby to persuade divers liege subjects who should thereafter buy and sell the shares of the said company, to believe that the said company was duly formed, and had complied with the said three rules, so as to entitle the company to have their shares quoted in the official list of the Stock Exchange.

At the trial it appeared that the defendants were connected with the company as alleged in the indictment, and it was also proved that none of the shares of the company had been unconditionally allotted to the public, and that the Committee of the Stock Exchange had granted a special settling day and a quotation, under the belief that all the provisions of the three rules above set forth had been complied with. The manner in which the false representations charged were made by the defendants sufficiently appears from the judgments below. The defendants having been convicted, a rule was obtained on their behalf for arrest of judgment, or to enter the verdict for the defendants, or for a new trial on the ground that the facts proved did not amount to a conspiracy.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.) (Poland and Beesley with him), now showed cause, and cited

British American Telegraph Company v. Albion Bank, L. Rep. 7 Ex. 119; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 257; Rej. v. De Berenger, 3 M. & S. 67.

Ballantine, Serjt., and W. Ballantine, Pope, Q.C., and Metcalf, Q.C., and A. Collins and Hudson, for the defendants, severally supported the rule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I have entertained considerable doubts as to the sufficiency of the counts upon which the defendants have been found guilty, and am still of opinion that the first count is insufficient. It alleges that the defendants entered into a conspiracy by means of false and fraudulent representations to induce the Committee of the Stock Exchange to grant a "settling day" and a "quotation" on the Stock Exchange. If it had gone on to allege that the object was to defraud the public, it would have been sufficient, but it does not in terms allege that. Even as to the second count, I confess that it is not without much hesitation and doubt I have come to the conclusion that it is sufficient. That count states, in substance, that the defendants entered into a conspiracy in order to obtain a quotation of the shares, in order to induce persons who should thereafter buy and sell the shares to believe that the company was duly formed, and that it had duly complied with the rules of the Stock Exchange, so as to get the shares quoted in the official lists. If it had gone on to state that the purpose for which this was done was to injure those in whose minds this belief was produced by inducing them to buy the shares, believing them to be of more value than they really were, then I should have had no hesitation in holding that the count was sufficient according to law, though, if the object was to induce them thus to believe without inducing them to purchase the shares under that belief, it would be otherwise. But looking at the words used, "Intending to induce those who should thereafter buy the shares" to believe that they were what they were represented to be, on the whole I think it is sufficient; for it is difficult to see how that belief could be engendered in the minds of persons buying and selling the shares without inducing them to buy and sell under such belief; so that a conspiracy to induce them to entertain that belief must be taken to be a conspiracy to induce them to deal in the shares under that belief, as they would not otherwise have done. On the whole, therefore, though not without considerable doubt, I have come to the conclusion that the charge in this count is sufficiently stated. That it was proved in fact I can entertain no doubt at all. I cannot accede to the proposition that the facts as proved were not sufficient to constitute the offence. The facts undoubtedly were that persons were induced to apply for and appear to take shares they never meant to take, which shares were at once handed over to the defendant Aspinall—that the allotment of shares was fictitious, and that the funds of the company were fictitious, a small sum being obtained by way of advance from the Midland Bank, which was manipulated so as to represent the capital of the company as paid up, when, in point of fact, the whole thing was a fiction from beginning to end. This was done for the purpose of obtaining a settling day and a quotation on the Stock Exchange. That there was a fraud and a very serious fraud on the Stock Exchange committee no one can doubt. Then the question is, as the company had nothing but its shares and had no real capital at all, and the only object one can conceive in getting the shares quoted on the Stock Exchange was that they should be dealt in, whether such a conspiracy sustains the charge on which the defendants have been found guilty, and I think there can be no doubt that it does.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also am clearly of opinion that on the evidence an indictable offence was amply proved, supposing it sufficiently stated in the indictment. Ever since R. v. De Berenger it has been established that where parties conspire together by false representations and pretences—in short, by telling lies—to raise the price of any vendible commodity—for though it was a case of dealing in the funds, the doctrine laid down extends to all vendible commodity—and with the intent to produce the belief in the minds of men that they may give a higher price for the commodity than they otherwise would do, such a conspiracy is an injury to the public, and is an indictable offence. Here it was proved beyond all doubt that there was a conspiracy to procure a settling day and a quotation of the shares on the Stock Exchange, to induce those who should deal on the Exchange, and should see the quotation, to believe that the company had been formed to the satisfaction of the Stock Exchange, and was a real or bona fide company, and, in consequence of that belief, to think the company better than it really was, the company, in fact, not being real, the shares not having really been allotted, and the deposits not having really been paid, and the company altogether being one which, if its nature had been known, would not have been allowed to be introduced on the Stock Exchange at all. All this was done in order that, the quotation of the shares being thus obtained, persons dealing on the Stock Exchange might be induced to believe that the shares were of greater value than they really were, and that they should thus be influenced in the prices they should pay for them. I cannot doubt that, all this being clearly proved, there was a criminal and indictable conspiracy on the part of the defendants. Then, was it properly stated and charged? Now, as to the first count, I will not say whether it is good or bad; but the second goes further and is clearer than the other, and I cannot understand how it should not be sufficient. After alleging that a quotation of shares upon the Stock Exchange imports a representation that the Stock Exchange committee has authorised them to be so quoted, and, therefore, has been satisfied that the company was duly formed, it proceeds to state that the defendants combined together, by false pretences and artful and subtle devices, to deceive the committee of the Stock Exchange, to induce them to allow a quotation of the shares, and thereby to induce and persuade those who should thereafter buy or sell the shares—that is, future dealers in the shares—to believe that it was duly formed and constituted, and had in all respects complied with the rules. If it had gone on to state, “and consequently, believing that it was better than it was, to induce persons to buy at higher prices than they otherwise would have given,” the charge would have been identical in its terms with that in R. v. De Berenger. These words, however, are not inserted, and the question is whether the effect is not in substance the same, and whether it does not really mean that the defendants represented the shares to be of greater value than they really were, and thus induced other persons to give higher prices for them than they otherwise would have done. Now, as Lord Ellenborough said, in R. v. De Berenger, “It is an universal principle that when a man is charged with an act of which the natural and probable consequence is a certain injury, the intention is an inference of law.” We should be carrying critical nicety to a greater extent than ever before known, and wresting words from their plain and natural meaning, if we were to say that the intention to obtain a quotation of the shares in order to induce persons who may buy or sell shares to believe that the company is a real and good company, whereas it is not so, is not doing that, the necessary consequence of which is not injurious to those buying and selling the shares. It must be taken, therefore, that the offence—which was proved—is stated sufficiently, and is in substance the same as that in Reg. v. De Berenger. It was argued that the question of the intent ought to have been put specifically to the jury. But if that were necessary, few verdicts in such cases could stand good. When everything is beyond doubt except a certain question, and that is put to the jury and they find it distinctly, then they really find a verdict including and implying all the rest. Here the intention expressly found by the jury—that is, the intention to obtain the quotation of the shares by false pretences—necessarily involves the intention to defraud, and it would be monstrous to say that we must grant a new trial because the formal question whether the quotation would have the effect suggested and would affect the price of the shares was not in terms put to the jury. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the second count is sufficient to support a judgment, and that the verdict upon that count ought not to be disturbed.

FIELD, J.—I also am of opinion that there ought to be judgment for the Crown. After the doubt the Lord Chief Justice has expressed, it would be presumptuous in me, perhaps, to say that I am

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. INGALL AND ANOTHER.

clearly of opinion—but I certainly am of opinion—that the second count is good. As to the first count, it is based on the allegation that the frauds undoubtedly committed were committed for the purpose of inducing the committee of the Stock Exchange to appoint a special settling day. It appears that in all cases of new companies, the Stock Exchange committee, before they appoint a settling day, require certain vouchers to be laid before them as to the position of the new company; and, among other things, they require that they should be satisfied that the proper amount of capital was subscribed, and that the shares have been bond fide applied for and allotted, and the deposits upon them actually paid; and they are not satisfied with the mere statements of the parties, but require vouchers to be produced, as the banker's book, to prove the payments made; and the result is that not only are the committee satisfied that the new company is good, but the public, on seeing the quotation of its shares in the official lists, believe that the proper authorities have been thus satisfied of it. In the first count, the fraud alleged is that, by means of false pretences, the Stock Exchange committee were induced to appoint a settling day—that is, a day on which all transactions in shares would be settled, and the amounts due paid or secured. Now, as to put a company on the market without the sanction of the Stock Exchange would be difficult, I think that count contains all the elements of a grave offence, for thereby the public would naturally suppose that as the committee of the Stock Exchange had fixed a settling day, all the requirements had been complied with, and the brokers and others might safely deal in the shares. And as to the second count, it is alleged that the object was to obtain a quotation of the shares in the Stock Exchange lists, and there can be no doubt that the public resort to those lists for the purpose of knowing where they may safely put their money. Then the count alleges that this was done for the purpose of inducing those who should thereafter deal in the shares to believe that the company was duly formed and constituted and had complied with the rules of the Stock Exchange. It does not, indeed, in terms allege that it was with intent to induce people to buy and sell the shares. But the question is, whether it is not fairly to be inferred that such is the meaning; and to me it seems that it is so, and that it would be a mere barren fraud if it was not done with a view to induce people to buy or sell the shares on the Stock Exchange. That being so, I think that meaning ought to be put upon it, and therefore, that our judgment ought to be for the Crown.

NOTE.—On a subsequent day two of the defendants were sentenced to twelve months and two of them to two months' imprisonment, in each case without hard labour. And the judgment of the court was during the present (Hilary) sittings affirmed by the Court of Appeal. As to the jurisdiction of that court to hear the appeal, see sect. 47 of the Judicature Act of 1873.

REG. (ON THE PROSECUTION OF THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE POPLAR UNION (resps.), v. INGALL AND ANOTHER (apps.).

Rating in Metropolis—Making valuation list, statutory time for—Whether statute imperative or directory—Valuation of Property Metropolis Act 1869, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, s. 42.

By sect. 42 of the Valuation of Property Metropolis Act 1869, the overseers "shall make and deposit the valuation list" before the 1st June, and the assessment committee "shall hold a meeting for hearing objections to the list" before the 1st Oct., and "shall finally approve the list" before the 1st Nov.

Held, that the section was directory and not imperative, and that a valuation list deposited on 27th Sept., and finally approved on 21st Jan., was good.

THIS was a case stated by the Justices of the Court of General Assessment Sessions, holden under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, at the Guildhall, Westminster.

1. The appellants are the occupiers of premises used as oil and turpentine stores, and situate in the West Ferry-road in the parish of All Saints', Poplar.

2. Previous to the valuation made as hereinafter stated, the appellants were rated at 445*l.* gross, and 371*l.* rateable value.

3. Upon the 27th Sept. 1875, the overseers of the said parish of All Saints', Poplar, made and deposited a valuation list for the said parish in which the appellants' premises were assessed at 666*l.* gross and 555*l.* rateable value.

4. Upon the 18th Oct. 1875, the said list was transmitted to the Assessment Committee of the Poplar Union.

5. Upon the 7th Dec. 1875, at a meeting of the Assessment Committee to hear objections to the said list, the appellants appeared by counsel, who said that on behalf of the appellants he reserved their right to dispute the validity of such list, and of the proceedings then being and about to be taken thereon, and objected to the valuation of their premises contained in such list, but notwithstanding such reservation, urged objections and adduced evidence in support thereof, and after duly weighing and considering the same, the Assessment Committee altered the valuation of the said premises, and fixed 550*l.* gross and 460*l.* rateable as the value thereof.

6. The said Assessment Committee approved the valuation list as altered by them upon the 4th Jan. 1876, and sent the said list to be re-deposited upon the 7th Jan. 1876.

7. By the 3rd of the General Orders made at the General Assessment Sessions holden on the 23rd June 1870, it is required that all appeals to the Assessment Sessions shall be entered by petition to be lodged with the clerk to the Assessment Sessions on or before the 14th Jan. next following the final approval of the valuation list by the Assessment Committee.

8. The appellants duly gave the required notice of appeal to the Assessment Sessions before the 14th Jan. 1876.

9. Upon 21st Jan. 1876, the Assessment Committee held a meeting to hear objections on behalf of persons or parties other than the appellants to the alterations made by the Assessment Committee in the said valuation, but no objections were made to the alteration of the valuation of the appellants' premises.

REG. v. INGALL AND ANOTHER.

10. Upon the hearing of the appeal the said valuation list was produced, and it appeared that the same had been finally approved upon the 21st Jan. 1876.

11. Between the hearing of the Assessment Committee of objections to the said valuation list and the holding of the court of general assessment sessions, no special sessions had been held to which the appellants could appeal against the decision of such assessment committee in accordance with the directions and provisions of the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act 1869; neither appellants or respondents took any steps to obtain the holding of any special sessions for hearing an appeal.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the said valuation list is null, void, bad in law, and of no effect, by reason of such valuation list not having been made and deposited by the overseers of the parish of All Saints, Poplar, nor transmitted by them to the assessment committee, nor by the said assessment committee finally approved and signed within the time limited by the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, judgment is to pass for the appellants, and the said valuation list shall be dealt with as to the court shall seem fit.

If the court should be of opinion in the negative, judgment is to pass for the respondents.

E. Clarke, for the appellants, argued that the result of the delay had been to extinguish the appellants' right of appeal, and that therefore sect. 42 of the Valuation of Property Act 1869, ought to be construed as imperative.

Tindal Atkinson and W. English Harrison, for the respondents, argued that the present case fell within the rule that where public convenience required it, a statute as to time would be construed as directory on this point; they cited

The following sections of the Valuation of Property Metropolis Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), were referred to in the course of the arguments and judgments:

Sect. 13. If the overseers of any parish fail to transmit such a valuation list as is required by this Act, the assessment committee shall appoint some person to make a valuation list, and may allow such person such remuneration in addition to his expenses as they think fit; and all expenses incurred by the assessment committee in pursuance of this section shall be paid by the guardians, and charged to such parish. The person so appointed shall have for the purposes of this section the same powers and duties as overseers, and the valuation list so made shall be dealt with in like manner as if it had been duly made and transmitted by the overseers.

Sect. 32. Any ratepayer and any surveyor of taxes, and any overseer, with the consent of the vestry of his parish, who may feel aggrieved by any decision of the assessment committee on an objection made before them to which he was a party, or by any decision of special sessions, whether he was a party or not, may appeal against such decision to the assessment sessions. Any assessment committee in the metropolis, or in the county in which the parish to which the appeal relates is situate, any overseers in the metropolis, or such county with the consent of the vestry of their parish, any ratepayer in the metropolis or such county, and any body of persons authorised by law to levy rates, or require contributions payable out of rates in the metropolis or such county, may appeal to the assessment sessions, if they or he feel aggrieved by reason,

- (1) Of the total of the gross value of any parish being too high or too low.
- (2) Of the total of the rateable value of any parish being too high or too low.
- (3) Of there being no approved valuation list for some parish.

Sect. 35. If it appears to the justices in assessment sessions, on any appeal that there is no approved valuation list for some parish, they may appoint some proper person (with such remuneration as they may appoint) to make a valuation list. Such person shall have for that purpose the same powers and duties as overseers. The valuation list so made shall be deposited and otherwise made known to the persons interested in such manner as the court may direct, but in manner as near as may be as is provided in this Act, with respect to the list originally made. The costs of making such valuation list shall be paid by the assessment committee, who failed to approve the list, and shall be deemed part of their expenses under the principal Act.

Sect. 42. With respect to the times within which proceedings under this Act, and the Acts incorporated herewith, are to be done, the following provisions shall have effect, that is to say:

- (1) The overseers shall make and deposit the valuation before the 1st June, in the first year after passing of this Act.
- (2) The overseers shall transmit the valuation list to the assessment committee, not sooner than fourteen and not later than seventeen days after notice is given of deposit of such list.
- (3) Notice of any objection by any person other than the surveyor of taxes and the overseers, shall be given before the expiration of twenty-five days after the list is deposited.
- (4) The assessment committee shall revise the valuation list before the 1st Oct., in the same year, and, before the same day, but not less than sixteen days after the transmission of the list to them by the overseers, shall hold a meeting for hearing objections to such list.
- (5) The assessment committee shall give notice of a meeting for hearing objections to a list not less than sixteen days before such meeting.
- (6) Notice of objection with respect to any list by the surveyor of taxes and by the overseers, shall be given not less than seven days before the meeting at which objections to such list will be heard by the assessment committee.
- (7) The assessment committee shall send the valuation list to be re-deposited within three days after it is approved by them, and shall appoint a day not less than fourteen nor more than twenty-eight days after such re-deposit for hearing objections to the alterations of which objections seven days notice shall be given by the objector.
- (8) The assessment committee shall finally approve and send the valuation list to the overseers and the clerk of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum district before the 1st Nov. in the same year.
- (9) Notices of appeal to special sessions shall be given on or before the 21st Nov. in the same year.
- (10) The justices may hold the special sessions at any time after the 30th Nov. in the same year, which will enable them to determine all appeals before the ensuing 1st Jan.
- (11) The clerk of the said managers shall send out the printed totals before the 1st Dec. in the same year, and shall return the valuation list to the assessment committee not sooner than fourteen, nor later than twenty-one, days after the totals are sent out.
- (12) Notices of appeals to assessment sessions shall be given on or before the 14th Jan. in the same year.
- (13) The justices may hold the assessment sessions at any time after the 1st Feb. in the same year, which will enable them to determine all appeals (except where a valuation list or valuation is ordered) before the ensuing 31st March.

- (14) Notices of the times at which the assessment sessions will be held at each place shall be given by the clerk ten days at least before the first court is held.

MELLOR, J.—My mind has fluctuated much during the progress of the argument, but on the whole I am of opinion that section 42 is directory, and that this valuation list was in time. It was intended by the Legislature that the valuation list should be made up in time for the assessment sessions, in order that it might be discussed there whether it was good or bad. It has, indeed, been very plausibly argued before us that the valuation list was too late, on the ground that certain things were not done. But on the whole I think that these arguments ought not to prevail. Mr. Clarke's clients have full power of appealing to sessions on the merits of their case, but it would seem as if they appealed against the list because they had no case upon the merits. The sessions having confirmed the list, the only question for us is whether it is bad on the ground of its being out of time, and I am of opinion that it is not. It is, I think, absurd to suppose that the Legislature could have intended these sections to be other than directory. Perhaps, however, the Legislature may have intended that if a party should suffer any damage by the delay of the overseers in making up the list, he should have a remedy against the overseers by action.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to interpret sections of an Act of Parliament which require certain things to be done within a certain time, we must look to the object of the Act in which those sections occur. Now the object of this Valuation Act is clearly to secure a valuation of property every five years, in order that the valuation list may be quite uniform. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that the whole list be completed every five years, and a machinery is provided by the statute for bringing objections and hearing appeals. The 42nd section is framed to effect this purpose. [The learned judge read the section and proceeded.] It appears from this section that a time is limited for every stage of the process until the appeal is arrived at, and it also appears that the Legislature contemplated that all the stages should be gone through before the 5th April. Next in order we come to the provision for certain failures. "If the overseers," says the 13th section, "fail to transmit the required valuation list," the committee shall appoint some person to make a valuation list. The assessment committee, therefore, have power to intervene and to fine a defaulting parish. The appeal is not against the valuation list as a whole, but against a particular decision of the assessment committee. [The learned judge then read the 35th section, and proceeded.] Mr. Clarke says that before the words "for some parish," we must read in the words "or no list signed within the time hereinbefore mentioned." Now can we insert these words? I think not. If the Legislature had intended the insertion of such a provision it would have been inserted expressly—especially in a statute of this kind, which is by no means an elliptical one, but is rather too full in its terms than otherwise. Consider too, the consequences of reading in the provision suggested. All the delay and expense of making a fresh list would have to be incurred. I cannot think that the Legislature ever intended such a consequence. But then it is asked—what is to be done if the overseers delay so long as to deprive a party of his power to appeal. This would be a defect in the statute, for which it would be for the Legislature to provide a remedy, but the existence of such a defect cannot make the statute other than directory. If, however, a party be deprived of his appeal by the neglect of the overseers, it may well be that those who undertake public duties, and fail in them, would be liable to an action at the suit of the party aggrieved.

REG. (ON THE PROSECUTION OF BAXTER AND ANOTHER)
v. GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Compensation to tenant for longer term than a year whose term has less than a year to run—Whether justices have jurisdiction to determine—8 Vict. c. 18, s. 121.

Justices under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18, s. 121) may award compensation in respect of any interest being less than that of a tenant from year to year, although such interest arises out of a lease originally created for a longer term.

In August 1871, A. demised to the prosecutors for one year a piece of land by an agreement, giving option of renewal for a further two years afterwards. In August 1873, the defendants served the prosecutors with a notice to treat, and in the same month of that year the prosecutors served the defendants with a notice of claim, requiring them to proceed to arbitration. An arbitrator was appointed by the defendants under protest, and an award was made, which the defendants refused to take up.

Held, upon a special case stated in an action by the prosecutors for a writ of mandamus, that the claim was one for the determination of justices under the 121st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

THE pleadings in this cause raised certain issues on a claim by the prosecutors for a writ of mandamus to the defendants. The issues in fact came on to be tried before Cleasby, B., at the Guildford Summer Assizes, when, by consent, a verdict was found for the Crown, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case which set out the facts at great length, and raised other questions between the parties not material to this report. The facts are sufficiently stated in the head note. The 121st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18) is as follows:

If any such lands shall be in the possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as tenant for a year or from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein, he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands and for any just allowance which ought to be made to him by an incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury he may sustain, or if a part only of such lands be required, to compensation of the damage done to him in his tenancy by severing the lands held by him or otherwise injuriously affecting the same; and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by two justices in case the parties differ about the same; and upon payment or tender of the amount of such compensation all such persons shall respectively deliver up to the promoters of the undertaking or to the person appointed by them to take possession thereof any such lands in their possession required for the purposes of the special Act.

Philbrick, Q.C. for the prosecutors of the writ.

Reginald Brown, for the defendants, was not called upon to argue.

MELLOB, J.—This is clearly a case provided for by sect. 121 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. The very object of that section was to send small and insignificant—I do not say unfounded—claims for compensation to justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate, a tribunal which is just as likely to be right as an arbitrator or a jury.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have the impression that the point has been decided on a former occasion, but, however, that may be, I do not entertain the slightest doubt in relation to it. The intention of the 121st section was to give compensation for every species of interest being less than the interest of a tenant from year to year, and I observe that the justices have full powers to award compensation in respect of the tenant having to give up possession before the expiration of his term.

REG. ON THE PROSECUTION OF OWEN v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF WELCHPOOL.

Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 76) s. 52—Debtors Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62) s. 21—Disqualification of town councillor by composition with creditors—22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8, subsect. 4—Retiring councillor—Election of town councillor—Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60), s. 12—Avoidance of elections—Election petition—Mandamus.

By sect. 52 of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4), c. 76, it is enacted that a town councillor who becomes bankrupt or compounds with his creditors by deed shall "thereupon immediately become disqualified, and shall cease to hold the office of such councillor, and the council thereupon shall forthwith declare the office void, and shall signify the same by notice, under the hands of three or more them, countersigned by the Town Clerk, to be affixed to some public place within the borough, and the said office shall thereupon become void," but that "every person so becoming disqualified and ceasing to hold such office on account of his being so declared bankrupt or having compounded with his creditors aforesaid, shall, on obtaining his certificate, or on payment of his debts in full, be capable of being re-elected to such office." And by sect. 21 of the Debtors' Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62) those provisions are extended to persons who have compounded with their creditors "whether by deed or otherwise."

By 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8, subsect. 4, it is enacted that if at any election of councillors to be held for any borough or ward, no person be duly nominated for election, "the retiring councillors shall be deemed to be re-elected, and the mayor, &c. shall publish a list of the names of all the persons so elected."

J., a town councillor of the borough of Welchpool, whose term of office would expire by lapse of time on the 1st Nov. 1876, on the 29th June in that year filed a petition for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement. On the 29th July a statutory majority of his creditors by special resolution declared that his affairs should be liquidated by arrangement, and his discharge was granted to him on the 29th Sept. No declaration was made by the council under sect. 52 that the office held by him was void under that section, but he did not, in fact, act as town councillor after the institution of these proceedings with his creditors until after the 1st Nov.

On the 1st Nov. the offices of three other councillors besides that of J. would become vacant by lapse of time, and for these four vacancies seven candidates presented themselves for election. In consequence of all the candidates being nominated by one and the same person, contrary to the provisions of the Act regulating the elections, the mayor declared no one to be duly nominated. Thereupon the returning officer, under 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8, subsect. 4, declared that the retiring councillors, among whom he included J., had been re-elected to their offices. Upon a rule for a mandamus calling upon the mayor, &c. of Welchpool to declare the office of councillor lately held by J. void, as required by 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, s. 52, and to proceed to the election of another person to supply such vacancy, -

Held, on the first part of the rule, that the office "lately held by J." was in fact filled up, and that the time had, therefore, passed when it could be declared void.

Held also that the mandamus would not lie for a fresh election, for inasmuch as the council had not declared J.'s office void under sect. 52, the office was still full on the 1st Nov.; that J. was, therefore, a retiring councillor within the meaning of 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8, subsect. 4, and under that section was properly declared to be re-elected to his office.

By the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60), s. 12, it is enacted that the election of any person at an election for a borough may be questioned by petition before an election court constituted under that Act on the ground that the election was wholly avoided because "he was, at the time of the election, disqualified for election to the office for which the election was held," and that "an election shall not, except in the manner provided by this Act, be questioned upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto or by or in any other process or manner whatsoever for a matter for which it might be questioned under the provisions of this Act."

Held that if there were any remedy, it would have been under this section by petition and not by mandamus.

Quere, whether the mandamus should not have been addressed to the town council, instead of to the mayor, &c.

RULE calling upon the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Welchpool in the county of Montgomery to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them and every of them having a right so to do to declare the office of councillor of the said borough, lately held by Thomas Pugh Jones, void as required by the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, s. 52; and

REG. v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF WELCHPOOL.

[Q.B. Div.]

further commanding them, and every of them having a right to vote at or to do any act necessary to be done in order to the election of a councillor of the said borough, to proceed to the election of another qualified person as a councillor to supply such vacancy.

On the 1st Nov. 1873, Mr. Thomas Pugh Jones was elected a councillor of the borough of Welchpool for the term of three years; in due course, therefore, his term of office would expire on the 1st Nov. 1876.

On the 29th June 1876, at which time he was still a councillor of the said borough, Thomas Pugh Jones filed a petition for liquidations of his affairs with his creditors by arrangement and composition. On the 29th July a general meeting of his creditors was held, in which the statutory majority then assembled by special resolutions pursuant to sect. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 declared that his affairs should be liquidated by arrangement and not in bankruptcy, and also that his discharge should be granted to him on the 29th Sept. His affairs were in consequence so liquidated, and he obtained his certificate of discharge, but through some delay or inadvertence his certificate was not granted him until the 6th Nov. No point, however, was raised on that, and in the argument of this rule it was taken that he had obtained his certificate on the 29th Sept.

On or about the 16th Aug., after these proceedings of Thomas Pugh Jones had been begun, D. Owen called upon the town council of Welchpool to declare the office held by Thomas Pugh Jones void under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 52.(a)

The town council, knowing that the term of office of Thomas Pugh Jones would of itself expire on the 1st Nov. took no action under sect. 52 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, but simply proceeded

(a) Provided always and be it enacted, that if any person holding the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor for any borough shall be declared bankrupt, or shall apply to take the benefit of any Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, or shall compound by deed with his creditors, or, being mayor, shall be absent for more than two calendar months, or, being an alderman or councillor, for more than six months, at one and the same time (unless in case of illness), from the borough from which he shall be mayor, alderman, or councillor, then and in every such case, such person shall thereupon immediately become disqualified and shall cease to hold the office of such mayor, alderman, or councillor as aforesaid; and in the case of such absence shall be liable to the same fine, to be recovered in the same manner, as if he had refused to accept the said office; and the council thereupon shall forthwith declare the said office to be void, and shall signify the same by notice in writing under the hands of three or more of them, countersigned by the town clerk, to be affixed to some public place within the borough, and the said office shall thereupon become void; but every person so becoming disqualified and ceasing to hold such office on account of his being declared a bankrupt, or of his applying to take the benefit of any Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, or having compounded with his creditors as aforesaid, shall, on obtaining his certificate or on payment of his debts in full, be capable (if otherwise qualified) of being re-elected to such office.

And by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 21, it is enacted that The provisions of the Act of the session of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, for the regulation of municipal corporations, sects. 52 and 53, as to the disqualification of mayors, aldermen, and town councillors having been declared bankrupt, or having compounded by deed with their creditors, shall extend to every arrangement or composition by a mayor, alderman, or town councillor with his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, whether the same be by deed or otherwise.

to the nomination of candidates to fill up the vacancies consequent upon the retirement of Thomas Pugh Jones and three other councillors whose term of office also expired on the 1st Nov. For these four vacancies seven candidates presented themselves; but in consequence of one nominator nominating all the candidates, contrary to the provisions of the Act regulating the elections, the mayor declared all the nominations bad, and that no one was duly nominated (b).

The returning officer, on the 1st Nov., declared the four retiring councillors, Thomas Pugh Jones being of the number, to be all re-elected to the office of town councillors, and made the following declaration to that effect:

Borough of Welchpool—Municipal Election 1876.

I, the undersigned Edward Thomas David Harrison, returning officer of the said election, hereby declare that Mr. Edwd. Maurice Jones, solicitor, Mr. Saml. Davies tailor and draper, Mr. Willm. Beattie, farmer, and Mr. Thos. Pugh Jones, chemist and druggist, were this day elected councillors of the said borough.

Dated 1st Nov. 1876.

E. T. D. HARRISON.

After the said Thomas Pugh Jones had been so declared to be re-elected under the provisions of 22 Vict. c. 35, sect. 8, sub-sect. 4, D. Owen called upon the council to declare this election void, and to proceed to the election of another councillor in his place, upon the ground that he was not a retiring councillor within that section, seeing that by his proceedings in liquidation his office had become void, and that he could not therefore be re-elected under that section; and a rule nisi for a mandamus was afterwards obtained.

Mellor, Q.C. and Channell, now showed cause against the rule, nominally on behalf of the defendants, but virtually on behalf of Thomas Pugh Jones.—The election of Mr. Jones was in every way valid and cannot be impeached. The mere fact of his entering into an arrangement with his creditors does not make the office void, but simply disentitles him to act. The office is not void until the council have declared it to be void; "thereupon" it does become void, but not until that is done. It has been held that the fact of a man becoming bankrupt within sect. 42 of the Municipal Corporations Act does not make the office void, but that it remains full until it is declared void: (Hardwicke v. Brown, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502; L. Rep. 8, C. P. 406.) As no such declaration was made, Mr. Jones's office remained full until the 1st Nov., although no doubt he could not, nor did he, act in his capacity of town councillor after he had begun his proceedings with his creditors. That being so, Mr. Jones—during the whole time up to the 1st Nov., on which day his term of office expired by lapse of time, and on which day the new election was held—was a "retiring councillor" within the meaning of 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8, sub-sect. 4. There being then no one duly nominated at the fresh election, he would by that section be deemed to have been duly re-elected, and was so declared to be re-elected by the returning officer. Therefore the election was good and this rule for

(b) 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 4, enacts as follows: At any election of councillors to be held for any borough or ward, if no persons be so nominated, the retiring councillors shall be deemed to be re-elected, and the mayor or alderman and two assessors, as the case may be, shall publish a list of the names of all the persons so elected, not later than eleven o'clock in the morning of the said day of election a mandamus should be refused. But then again this application is too late. It is an application for a rule for a mandamus to the Mayor, &c., of Welchpool to declare the "office lately held by Thomas Pugh Jones," void. But that office which they seek to have declared void is already a thing of the past. It has expired and has been filled up. What would be the use, if this mandamus were allowed to issue, of declaring that office void? Thirdly, a mandamus is not the proper remedy. If there be any remedy it is by a petition under the Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections Act, 35 & Vict. c. 60, s. 12, which is as follows:

The election of any person at an election for a borough or ward may be questioned by petition before an election court constituted as hereinafter in this Act provided, and hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "court," on the ground that the election was as to the borough or ward wholly avoided by general bribery, &c., or on the ground that he was at the time of the election disqualified for election to the office for which the election was held, or on the ground that he was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes.

An election shall not, except in the manner provided by this Act, be questioned upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, or by or in any process or manner whatsoever for a matter for which it might be questioned under the provisions of this Act.

The effect of this section is to substitute a petition for any other process in cases within the section, which this obviously is; seeing that if they can impeach this election at all, it must be on the ground that "he was at the time of the election disqualified for the election." On this point he cited

Reg. v. Chitty, 5 A. & E. 609.

Charles and McIntyre, Q.C., in support of the rule. [KELLY, C.B.—Is this mandamus rightly addressed? Ought it not to be to the town council?] It is rightly addressed to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting by their council. The town council are described in sect. 6 of the Act. In the analogous case of a mandamus to churchwardens it is addressed in a similar way. The practice always is to address a mandamus in this way. The corporation can do nothing without the town council, and in this case the mandamus is directed to "such of the burgesses who have a right to do the act." In Reg. v. Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Oxford (6 A. & E. 649), the mandamus was so addressed, and no objection taken. Now, as to the other points. In August Thomas Pugh Jones became disqualified to hold the office of town councillor. The town council ought to have declared the office void, and proceeded to a further election to fill the vacancy so caused. A substantial injustice has been done to the burgesses, which requires a remedy. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that this case may now be argued just in the same way as it could have been argued in September, and no act of the returning officer can affect that right. It is said the court will not make this rule absolute on account of what took place on 1st Nov. But there is no particular time mentioned in which the proceedings under sect. 52 are to be taken, and the town council can even now declare the office lately held by Jones void. Jones was not a retiring councillor at all within the meaning of sect. 8, sub-sect. 4 of 22 Vict. c. 35, but that is not enough to entitle them to proceed to a fresh election; they could not do so until they declared his office void. A retiring councillor within that section must mean one who is in reality a retiring councillor, and if the returning officer inserts in the list of retiring councillors the name of a man who is not a retiring councillor, we are entitled to ask for a mandamus. The election on 1st Nov. was only a colourable election, and the result of these proceedings will be to set it aside. As to the last point, there is nothing in the Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections Act which precludes us from raising this question by mandamus. That Act applies only where the burgesses are assembled, and an election held, and a person is disqualified at the time of election. But it is not contended that Jones was disqualified on 1st Nov.; on the contrary, it is admitted that at that time he was qualified to be re-elected by a new election: but there was in fact no new election, the only election being the declaration by the returning officer that the retiring officers, among whom he named Mr. Jones, were duly elected. But we challenge that, in that he was not a retiring councillor. That being so, as Mr. Jones was not disqualified at the time of election, the Corrupt Practices Act does not apply, and we are entitled to proceed by mandamus. [KELLY, C.B.—But there has been an election in fact. Have you any authority for saying that a mandamus will lie where there has in fact been an election, and where the office is full, on the ground that the election was void?] Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Leeds (11 A. & E. 512.) [CLEASBY, B., referred to Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Chester (25 L. J. 61, Q.B.) to the contrary.] They also referred to Corner's Practice, 206, 207.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged. It is an application for a mandamus calling upon the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Welchpool to declare the office of councillor of the said borough lately held by Thomas Pugh Jones void as required by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 52, and to proceed to the election of a new councillor. It may be doubted, perhaps, whether this mandamus is properly addressed to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, instead of being addressed to the town council, but I should be sorry to decide this case upon such a technical ground as that, even if it were quite clear that such was the case, and I therefore pronounce no opinion as to whom it should of right be addressed. The council are first called upon to declare the office of councillor lately held by T. P. Jones void. Now I am clearly of opinion that that part of the rule cannot be maintained. First, upon the ground that the time has passed; sect. 52 enacts, that upon the happening of the events in that section contained, the person doing them shall cease to hold the office, and "the council thereupon shall forthwith declare the said office to be void, and shall signify the same by notice in writing under the hands of three or more of them, countersigned by the town clerk, to be affixed to some public place within the borough, and the said office shall thereupon become void." But of what use or consequence could such a declaration be now, when the office which the declaration is to make absolutely void is already an office which has ceased to exist? The power conferred on the town council, as provided for in sect. 52, is where the office has become vacant by reason of bankruptcy, &c., on the part of him who held the office, but now though he has ceased to have power to act in the office, yet the town council are called upon to make public declaration that it is void in order that, as provided by sect. 47, the borough may proceed to a fresh election. The office lately held by Jones, if not void, yet ceased to exist on the 1st Nov. It would be superfluous to allow a mandamus to issue for the purpose of having that office declared void. But, again, upon the terms of the Act, the office was an office which was conferred on Nov. 1, 1873; and it is the office conferred on him on that day that the council are called upon to declare void, not the office which he now holds, and which he was elected to on Nov. 1, 1876. Yet the terms of the mandamus would refer to that office. Therefore it is clear if the office had ceased already, it would be useless to declare it void. I think, on the ground that the time has passed when it is competent for the town council to give a declaration, the application for the mandamus cannot be maintained. But then comes the question whether the mandamus will lie to declare "that the office is void, and further commanding them and every of them having a right to vote at or to do any act necessary to be done in order to the election of a councillor of the said borough to proceed to the election of another qualified person as a councillor to supply such vacancy." I am clearly of opinion that it cannot. Let us see what are the facts. First of all was this gentleman a town councillor, or had he ceased to be so on the 1st Nov.? If he still was a town councillor, then he was properly put among those who had retired under the provisions of the statute; and consequently no person being duly nominated, he, as well as the other retiring councillor by the terms of the Act, was deemed to be duly elected. The question then first arises, whether Jones did continue to be a town councillor on that day. Sect. 52 begins as follows: "If any person holding the office of town councillor for any borough shall be declared bankrupt, or shall apply to take the benefit of any Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, or shall compound by deed with his creditors, &c., then and in every such case such person shall thereupon immediately become disqualified, and shall cease to hold the office of such councillor." Now if the provision had stopped there it might very reasonably have been contended that the office was at an end, and that he ceased to hold that office, but it goes on, "and the council thereupon shall forthwith declare the said office to be void, and shall signify the same by notice in writing under the hands of three or more of them, countersigned by the town clerk, to be affixed to some public place within the borough, and the said office shall 'thereupon' become void." How can it be contended that looking at the meaning of the word "thereupon" the office can be said to become void until all these acts have been done? For the statute says not only that the man shall cease to hold the office, but that a public notice is to be given that the office is void, and that "thereupon" the office shall become void. Therefore it does not become void until there has been a public declaration to that effect. When we look to the object of it all, it becomes clear. Sect. 47 provides that occasional vacancies of councillors shall be filled up by fresh election. Therefore, taking the sections together it really comes to this: if the man cease to hold the office, the council shall declare the office void, and that then within ten days a new election shall be held. The office here still existed until and on Nov. 1. The effect of this is that the term of office then ceased, and by the legal effect of that the officers retired, and on Nov. 1, a new election was held. I am clearly of opinion that all four still continued in the office of town councillor on Nov. 1, and the office only became vacant so as to authorise a new election on Nov. 1. But then there is this further question; supposing by reason of the words in sect. 52, it could be held that Jones had ceased to hold the office before Nov. 1, and was not a retiring officer on Nov. 1, and consequently this election might be questioned, can the validity of this election be impeached by mandamus, or must it be under the old law by a quo warranto, and now under the Corrupt Practices Act by petition? I asked the counsel for the applicant in the course of the argument if they could show me any authority for the proposition that a mandamus will lie to declare an election void, when there has been in fact an election. I was not aware that the contrary of that proposition had been so well put as it is in the case of Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Chester (25 L. J. 61, Q. B.), to which my brother Cleasby has called my attention. There it was held that "it is an inflexible rule of law that where a person has been de facto elected to a corporate office, and has accepted and acted in the office, the validity of the election and the title to the office can only be tried by proceeding on a quo warranto information; and that a mandamus will not lie unless the election can be shown to be merely colourable." It appears to me, therefore, that where there has been an election de facto, an election in fact acted on, that there is no authority for holding that it is impeachable by mandamus, but if can only be impeached by quo warranto under the old law or now by petition under the Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections Act. If authority were wanting the case of Hardwick v. Brown (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 406) would be sufficient on the point whether the office was still full on Nov. 1. The facts in that case were totally different to those now before us, and were in substance as follows: B., a town councillor of Newcastle, in July, 1872, made a composition with his creditors under sect. 126 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, under which a resolution was come to, and registered on the 23rd Sept. On the 4th Nov. B. placed the resignation of his office of councillor in the hands of the town clerk, and announced the resignation by advertisement on the 6th Nov., and by the same advertisement offered himself for re-election at the annual meeting of the town council. On the 9th Nov. B.'s resignation was accepted, and on the 18th, there having been no declaration by the council that the office was void, he was re-elected a town councillor. It was held that B., having by reason of his having compounded with his creditors, ceased to hold the office of councillor, was incapable of resigning it; and the council not having pursued the course pointed out by sect. 52 of the Municipal Corporations Act, the election was void. It will be seen, therefore, that though the facts were different, it was necessary to decide whether the office was void or not; and it was held that it was not void until so declared by the council, under sect. 52. Bovill, C.J. in his judgment expressly holding this. As there was no such declaration in this case, I am of opinion that this office was full up to the date of the new election, and that Mr. Jones was among the retiring officers on Nov. 1, and was re-elected on that day. His office, therefore, cannot be impeached.

Q.B.. Div.]

REG. v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF WELCHPOOL

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. If the only application were for a mandamus calling upon the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Welchpool, to hold a fresh election, I cannot think it could be granted. Everything connected with this election was done quite regularly. The case is entirely distinguishable from that of Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Leeds (11 A. & E. 512). In that case the election was complete. The facts of that case appear to have been shortly these. On an election of councillors for a ward in the borough, the presiding aldermen and two assessors, before two in the afternoon of the day next but one after the election, published under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 35, a declaration containing a list of the councillors elected, which declaration included the name of P.; after two o'clock the aldermen and assessors, on the discovery of a supposed error in counting the legal votes, signed and published a second list, omitting the name of P., and substituting that of R. P. afterwards made the declaration required, and R. did the same afterwards; upon P. claiming to act, the mayor and town council refused to permit him to do so, and allowed R. to act. On application by P. for a mandamus to receive and count his vote, it was held that the office was not full; and that the proper remedy was by mandamus, the second publication and subsequent acting by or on behalf of R. being merely void, and P. being in de facto. The Attorney-General (Sir John Campbell) in showing cause cited Reg. v. Mayor of Oxford (6 A. & E. 349), where it was held that if a councillor be ousted and another elected, and such election be merely colourable, a mandamus will go to permit the ousted party to exercise his office, not to restore him to his office; though if the ousting and election be bonâ fide, the proper remedy is, not by mandamus to restore the ousted party, but by a quo warranto against him who is in de facto. To this Patterson, J. replied, "There the regular forms had been gone through. According to that the town council might admit a party who had not a single vote, and then say that the office was full. Potts was in de facto, and the quo warranto should have been against him." That was the real ground of their decision. I think, therefore, the mandamus to compel a fresh election will not lie. But that is not all. The mandamus also seeks to compel the town council to do this ministerial act, viz., to declare the office lately held by Mr. Jones to be void, or in other words to declare that on Nov. 1, this gentleman could not succeed to the office by virtue of being a retiring councillor. Now, in the first place, it is quite clear that this can only have reference to a declaration arising from Mr. Jones's bankruptcy during the period of his holding his office, and can have no reference to the election which took place afterwards. In fact the object of this mandamus is to compel the town council now to make a declaration which they ought to have made before. I quite agree with what has been said by the Lord Chief Baron, that this office was in contemplation of law full up to the 1st Nov. Now it is to be taken that before the 1st Nov. Jones had obtained his certificate, and therefore was capable of being elected on that day to his own vacant office, and therefore if, previous to the 1st Nov., the town council had in fact declared his office to be void, he might have been re-elected to the vacant post. Under these circumstances, there being no new nominations, the retiring councillors are by the statute declared to be deemed re-elected. Now I will not repeat what has been said by the Lord Chief Baron as to Mr. Jones's office being continuing and full up to 1st Nov., but will content myself by referring to the case of Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Leeds (7 A. & E. 963), where the point appears to have arisen, and been discussed. For these reasons I think this rule ought to be discharged.

FINCH AND ANOTHER v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE YORK UNION.

Pauper lunatic—Lunatic Asylums Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, ss. 96, 97, 98, 121)—Maintenance—Power of justices to make retrospective order.

Under sect. 96 of the Lunatic Asylums' Act 1853 a retrospective order may be made by the justices for the maintenance of a pauper lunatic for a longer period than twelve months.

J. P. was convicted of felony at York on the 18th Oct. 1869. He was removed to plaintiffs' asylum on the 28th Sept. 1870, and his sentence expired 18th Feb. 1871, when he became a lunatic wandering at large. The corporation of York paid for his maintenance up to June 1873 when they refused to do so any longer. In Oct. 1875 plaintiffs obtained an order from two visiting justices upon the defendants for maintenance for J. P. for two years and a quarter. This defendants refused to pay.

Held, that under sect. 96 of the Lunatic Asylums Act 1853, the justices had power to make such an order.

This was a special case stated by order of the court before whom the action was originally tried, and was as follows:

The action is brought by plaintiffs upon an order made by two visiting justices of plaintiffs' asylum at Fisherton near Salisbury, and dated the 23rd Oct. 1875 by virtue of powers conferred upon them by the Criminal Lunatics Act 1867, and the Lunatic Asylums Act 1853, for the sum of 102l. 14s., that being the balance due for the support of one James Powell, from the 23rd June 1873, to the 23rd Oct. 1875, and for a further sum of 11l. 18s. for the support of the said James Powell from the 23rd Oct. 1875 to the 29th Jan. 1876, being at the rate of 17s. a week.

James Powell was convicted of felony at York on the 18th Oct. 1869, and sentenced to sixteen months' imprisonment with hard labour.

He became insane, and was removed to the plaintiffs' asylum on the 28th Sept. 1870, by an order of the Secretary of State, made under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 29, amending 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54.

James Powell's sentence expired on the 18th Feb. 1871, when as he was still insane he became in the position of a "lunatic wandering at large in the place where the offence was committed," that is York.

The corporation of York, through their treasurer, paid for the maintenance of James Powell in plaintiffs' asylum until the expiration of his sentence, and afterwards until June 1873, when they refused to pay for his support any longer.

Plaintiffs, on the 23rd Oct. 1875, applied to two visiting justices of their asylum, and obtained the order mentioned.

The said order was duly served upon defendants, who refused to pay the sums therein ordered to be paid by them.

The plaintiffs, after the expiration of twenty days from the date of the order, brought this action under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 121.

The question for the opinion of the court is, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover the whole or any and what portion of their claim.

Herschell, Q.C. (Bromley with him) for the plaintiffs.—The questions for the determination of the court is whether the justices had power to make a retrospective order for a longer period than one year. This order is for two years and three months, and the defendants contend that it ought not to extend beyond twelve months and is, therefore, pro tanto bad. But the words of the sections are clear: "It shall be lawful . . . for two justices, being visitors of such asylum (in which the pauper lunatic is confined) to make an order upon the guardians of the union or parish from which . . . such lunatic is or has been sent for confinement for payment to the proprietor of the asylum of the reasonable charges of the lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care of such lunatic in such asylum, and any such order may be retrospective or prospective or partly retrospective and partly prospective; and the guardians upon whom such order shall be made shall from time to time pay to the said proprietor the charges aforesaid" (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 96). The Legislature have not limited the time to which a retrospective order may extend—where they intended so to limit it they have done so in terms, as will be seen by reference to the two following sects. 97 and 98 of the same Act. This is a strong argument in favour of plaintiffs' claim.

Poland (Grain with him) for the defendants.—If plaintiffs' contention is correct an order may be made which will cause the ratepayers of one year to pay for the maintenance of a pauper for fifty years; such could not have been the intention of the Legislature. Sects. 95, 96, 97, 98 are a series of enactments intended to be read together. Sect. 95 makes the parish in which a lunatic is confined primarily liable for his maintenance, and sect. 96 gives the proprietor of an asylum the right to recover from such parish. But such liability is only in force until the proper settlement has been discovered as authorised by sect. 97, and if the parish of settlement cannot be discovered then the charge is to fall upon the county under sect. 98. The innocent parish, so to speak, is only made temporarily liable by these provisions, but if the plaintiffs are correct, the proprietor of an asylum might lie by for fifty years, and then upon an order such as the one in question, might recover from the innocent parish all the charges incurred during that time, whereas the innocent parish could only recover back from those who ought strictly to pay the whole amount, the charges for a single year as limited by sects. 97 and 98. This would be a very great hardship. The Legislature have used the word retrospective in sect. 96, and we give due weight to that if we read it as retrospective to the extent of the other sections, i.e., for twelve months. He then cited

Bradford Union v. Clerk of the Peace for Wills, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 604.

Kettering Union v. Northampton Asylum, 13 W. R. 894.

Mellor, J.—There may have been some mistake or omission in drawing up this Act, but I do not see my way to add to it. The words of the sections are clear in themselves, and it may be that the Legislature thought that self interest would prevent a proprietor of an asylum lying by for any length of time, whereas it might be quite necessary to limit the time allowed to a public body for making a retrospective demand. However, that may be our duty is simply to interpret the Act, and that being so our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

Lush, J.—I am of the same opinion. To give any other interpretation to the section would be to make law rather than to expound it.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. OVERSEERS OF WALSALL.

Railway, raising of to improvement rate—Quarter rating under Local Act—Effect of Public Health Acts upon local Act.

By the Walsall Improvement and Market Act 1848, commissioners had power to levy an improvement rate within a district not comprising the whole municipal borough as afterwards constituted, but the Act contained a proviso that the occupiers of land used as a railway should be assessed in proportion only of one-fourth part of the net value. The Public Health Acts 1872 and 1875 formed the whole municipal borough of Walsall into an urban sanitary district.

Held that the assessment ought to be made under the local Act and not under the Public Health Acts.

THIS is a case stated on an appeal against a borough rate laid on that part of the foreign of Walsall which is situated within the municipal borough of Walsall.

The said rate was made on the 12th Nov. 1875, and on the hearing of the appeal by the recorder of the borough at the quarter sessions held on the 31st Jan. 1876, the court, after hearing the arguments on both sides, decided in favour of the respondents, and confirmed the said rate subject to a special case stated by consent for the opinion of this court on the points hereinafter raised.

CASE.

1. The appellants are the London and North-Western Railway Company. The respondents are the parish officers of the township of the foreign of Walsall and the corporation of the borough of Walsall.

2. The borough of Walsall is an ancient borough in Staffordshire having a separate court of quarter sessions. It forms a part of the parish of Walsall, and comprises the whole of the township of the borough of Walsall, and a part of the township of the foreign of Walsall. Each of the said townships has its own overseers and maintains its own poor.

3. The appellants are the owners and occupiers of land within that part of the foreign of Walsall which is within the borough, part of which land is used as a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance.

4. By an Act of Parliament passed on the 31st Aug. 1848 called the Walsall Improvement and Market Act 1848, commissioners were appointed for improvement and sanitary purposes over a district consisting of the whole of the said township of the borough, a part of the said township of the foreign lying within the borough, and part of the adjoining parish of Rushall lying without the said borough, but it does not include the whole of the municipal borough.

5. The 7th section appointing such commissioners is as follows :

And be it enacted that the mayor and town council of the borough of Walsall aforesaid together with three such other person, as shall be elected by the owners of property and ratepayers within such part of the limits of this Act, as are situated within the parish of Rushall in respect of the same part of the said limits shall be and are hereby empowered to act as commissioners to carry this Act and the several Acts incorporated therewith, and the several powers thereof respectively into execution.

6. By the 40th section it is enacted as follows :

For the purposes of defraying the costs and expenses of carrying this Act and of the powers and provisions thereof into execution (except the purposes to which any rates to be made for sewers, drains, and private improvement are hereby or by any Act incorporated herewith directed to be applied), and including the costs and expenses of making and maintaining and promoting such gas works as are herein mentioned and of defraying the expenses of and incidental to the obtaining of this Act which shall be charged on the improvement rate, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners from time to time to make, assess, and levy such equal rate to be called the improvement rate, as may be necessary for the purposes aforesaid not exceeding in any one year 3s. in the pound of the full net annual value of the property included in such rate, Provided always that the occupiers of any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and the occupier of any land used as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance shall not be assessed to any rate or assessment made by virtue of this Act or any Act incorporated therewith in any greater proportion in respect of the same than in proportion of one-fourth part only of the net value thereof.

7. By an Act of Parliament passed on the 31st May 1850 called "The Walsall Improvement and Market Amendment Act 1850," certain modifications were made in the powers of the commissioners appointed under the Act of 1848 which do not affect the questions in dispute in the present case.

8. Up to the passing of the Public Health Act 1872 improvement rates were levied under the above-mentioned local Acts for the purpose of meeting the expenses of their execution, and to all such rates, the railway of the appellants was rated at one-fourth of its full value in accordance with the 40th section of "The Walsall Improvement and Market Act 1848."

9. By the Public Health Act 1872, urban and rural sanitary districts were constituted throughout England, and the 4th section of that Act provides what places shall be urban sanitary districts, and who shall be urban sanitary authorities in such districts respectively.

10. By the 7th section it is provided :

Subject to the provisions of this Act the Local Government Acts shall be deemed to be in force within the district of every urban sanitary authority, and from and after the first meeting of an urban sanitary authority in pursuance of this Act there shall be transferred and attach to an urban sanitary authority to the exclusion of any other authority which may have previously exercised or been subject to the same, all powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations within such district exercising or attaching by and to a local board under the Local Government Acts, and by and to the sewer authority under the Sewage Utilization Acts and by and to the nuisance authority under the Nuisances Removal Acts, and by and to the local authority under the Common Lodging Houses Act, the Artizans and Labourers' Dwellings Act, and the Bakehouse Regulation Act, or by and to any of the said authorities under any of such Acts or any Acts amending such Acts.

11. By the 16th section it is provided as follows :

All expenses incurred or payable by an urban sanitary authority under the Sanitary Acts shall, if the Local Government Acts or the provisions of those Acts with respect to rating were at or immediately before the passing of this Act in force throughout the district of such authority, or within a local government district wholly within such district, be defrayed in manner provided by those Acts ; and if the Local Government Acts were not so in force at or immediately before the passing of this Act, be defrayed as follows, that to say :

1. In the case of a council of a borough out of the borough fund or borough rate.

2. In the case of improvement commissioners out of any rate in the nature of a general district rate leviable by them, as such commissioners throughout the whole of their district.

Provided that where an urban sanitary authority had, before the passing of this Act, power to levy within its district a rate or rates for paving, sewerage, or other sanitary purposes, all expenses incurred by such authority in the performance of its duties under the Sanitary Acts shall be defrayed out of such rate or rates except where at the time of the passing of this Act any such expenses were chargeable upon the borough fund or borough rate in which case such expenses shall continue so chargeable.

12. By the Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874, s. 3, it is provided as follows :—

Whereas doubts have arisen as to the extent and meaning of the 7th section of the principal Act, Be it therefore declared and enacted that the provisions of the said section shall be deemed to have applied to every authority acting at the time of the passing of the principal Act under the powers conferred upon them by a local Act with respect to any sanitary purposes, and that all the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of any authority having jurisdiction under a local Act in the district of an urban sanitary authority at the time of the passing of the principal Act so far as they or any of them related to such purposes were transferred to and became attached to the urban sanitary authority therein referred to.

13. By the Public Health Act 1875, ss. 5 & 6, further provision is made for the constitution of urban sanitary districts and urban sanitary authorities to execute the powers of the Sanitary Acts within such districts.

14. By sect. 10 of the Public Health Act 1875, it is provided that

When any local Act other than an Act for the conservancy of any river is in force within the district of an urban authority conferring on any commissioners, trustees, or other persons, powers for purposes the same, as or similar to those of this Act (but not for their own pecuniary benefit) all the powers, right, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of such commissioners, trustees, or person in relation to such purposes shall be transferred and attach to the said urban authority.

By the 20th section of that Act it is enacted as follows :

All expenses incurred or payable by an urban authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged on and defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate leviable by them under this Act, subject to the following exceptions (namely): That if in any district the expenses incurred by an urban authority being the council of a borough in the execution of the Sanitary Acts were, at the time of the passing of this Act, payable out of the borough fund or borough rate then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of this Act shall be charged on and defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate, and that if in any district the expenses incurred by an urban authority being improvement commissioners in the execution of the Sanitary Acts were at the time of the passing of this Act payable out of any rate in the nature of a general district rate leviable by them, as such commissioners throughout the whole of their district, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of this Act shall be charged on and defrayed out of such rate, and for the purposes of this section the council of the borough of Folkestone, shall be deemed to be improvement commissioners, and that where at the time of the passing of this Act the expense incurred by an urban authority in the execution of certain purposes of the Sanitary Acts were payable out of the borough fund and borough rate, and the expenses incurred by such authority in the execution of the other purposes of the said Acts were payable out of a rate or rates leviable by that authority throughout the whole of their district for paving, sewerage, or other sanitary purposes, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of the same or similar purposes respectively under this Act, shall respectively be charged on and defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate and of the rate or rates leviable as aforesaid.

15. By the 21st section of that Act it is provided with respect to the assessment, and levying of general district rates under that Act as follows:

The owner of any tithes or any tithe commutation rentcharge, or the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and the occupier of any land covered with water or used only as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof.

16. At a meeting of the town council of the borough of Walsall held on the 9th Nov. 1875, an estimate was presented of the expense to be incurred during the ensuing six months in carrying into effect the powers of the Local Improvement Act and other Sanitary Acts as well as for the purposes to which the borough fund it applicable under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 and the amending Acts, and it was resolved that a borough rate of 2s. 3d. in the pound should be made and assessed upon all rateable property within the borough to meet those expenses, and that the sum of 7267l. 10s. should be levied in that part of the foreign of Walsall which is situate within the borough as the proportion of the said borough rate assessable on that part.

17. It was also resolved that the mayor should issue his warrant to the parish officers of the foreign of Walsall, commanding them to pay the said sum of 7267l. 10s. so rated and assessed on the part of the foreign of Walsall within the borough.

18. The overseers of the foreign of Walsall upon receiving the mayor's warrant in pursuance of the before-mentioned resolutions made a rate upon the rateable property in the part of the township with the borough by which they assessed certain land and buildings of the appellants, including the land used as a railway at 2202l. 10s., its full rateable value taking as their basis the valuation list then in force made by the union assessment committee.

19. The appellants gave all necessary notices of appeal, but they had not when the said valuation list was published made any objection thereto before the assessment committee, or sought relief from them, having no objection to make to such list, and the assessment committee having no power to give any relief in respect of the matters now in dispute.

20. It is necessary to set out at length the appellants' grounds of appeal, the ground of objection to the said rate or assessment being that they are thereby rated on the full value of their railway to the expenses of carrying into execution the improvement and sanitary Acts; whereas they contend that they ought only to be rated to such expenses in respect of their said railway on one-fourth part of the full value thereof.

21. It was agreed, for the purposes of this case, that one-half of the amount leviable by the said rate is to meet expenses under the sanitary Acts and expenses for which under the local improvement Acts, rates would have been levied to which the said railway was only rateable at a fourth part of its value.

22. It is further agreed, for the purposes of this case, that the annual rateable value of the land used as railway is one half of the said sum of 2202l. 10s.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, Was it a condition precedent of the appellants' right of appeal that they should have objected to the valuation list before the assessment committee; and, secondly, Were the appellants liable to be assessed upon the full value of their railway towards all the expenses for which the said rate is made? If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative on either of these questions, the rate is to be confirmed. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative on both questions, the order of the court of quarter sessions is to be quashed, and the rate is to be remitted to the said court to be amended.

Austie and Jelf, for the respondents, submitted, first, that the appeal could not be heard, as no notice had been given to the assessment committee, under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1, which makes notice to the assessment committee a condition precedent to the right to appeal to the quarter sessions. [Lush, J.—But by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, s. 36, no person not aggrieved can appeal to the assessment committee, and here the railway company were not aggrieved by any act of the committee.] On the main point, they submitted that sect. 4 of the Public Health Act of 1872 made the respondents the sanitary authority within the borough, and that they only had power to levy a borough rate to meet the sanitary expenses, and that the local Acts were now impliedly repealed by the Public Health Acts of 1872 and 1875.

Bosanquet and Neville, for the appellants, argued that although the respondents were constituted the urban sanitary authority, they were only so constituted to carry out the powers of the commissioners under the local Acts, and that the incidence of the rating remained unaltered. That if not, this would be an imposition of a new liability upon the appellants by the Legislature, and that clear words are necessary to impose a new burthen, and that an exemption from rating cannot be abolished by implication. [Q.B. Div.]

The COURT (Mellor and Lush, JJ.) were of opinion that the exemption contained in the local Acts is not affected by the Public Health Acts. Sect. 23 of the Public Health Act of 1872 clearly contemplates the continuance of the local Acts, unless certain steps are taken which have not been taken in this case. Sect. 43 also assumes their validity. That being so, the respondents must levy their rates in the same manner as the commissioners under the local Acts, and subject to the same exemption.

DARGAN v. DAVIES.

Impounding—Neglect to supply impounded animals with provender—Whether pound-keeper or party impounding liable to penalty—12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 5.

By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 5, "every person who shall impound or cause to be impounded any animal, and shall neglect to provide such animal with food and water, is liable to a penalty of 20s."

Held (upon a case stated by justices who had dismissed an information against the keeper of a common pound under this section), that the section did not apply to the keeper of the pound, but to the party bringing the animal to the pound.

THIS was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by John Lort Stokes, Vice-Admiral, and Peter Phelps Clerks, two of the justices of the peace for the county of Pembroke, and the following are the material parts of such case:

An information had been preferred by Thomas Dargan, the appellant, against Martha Davies, the respondent, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, charging that the respondent did impound forty-eight sheep in the common pound on the 6th Jan. 1876, and on that and the two following days did unlawfully neglect to provide and supply the said sheep with a sufficient quantity of fit and wholesome food and water contrary to that statute. The justices had dismissed the information with costs. It was proved that one D. Williams, between 10 a.m. and 11 a.m. on the 6th Jan. 1876, impounded forty-two sheep, which he had theretofore seized damage feasant. They were confined until their release as follows: thirty-four were taken out at midday on the following Friday, and the remaining eight on the next Tuesday. During the whole time the thirty-four sheep were so confined the said D. Williams did not provide any of the forty-two with food or water, but after the release of the thirty-four the remaining eight were about 7 a.m. on Saturday the 8th Jan. provided with hay. The respondent was at the time of the said sheep being so impounded and confined the keeper of the pound, but she did not provide or supply the sheep with any food or water or in any way interfere beyond receiving and keeping them in such pound until their release. The key of such pound was in the sole possession of the respondent during this period, and she in her capacity of pound-keeper had the sole control over such pound.

The justices having dismissed the information on the ground that 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 5 "did not, under these circumstances, apply to or include the respondent, but to the person or persons who delivered or caused to be delivered the said sheep into her custody," the question for the opinion of this court was "whether under the above circumstances the said information was legally and properly dismissed."

Morton Smith referred to the Acts in pari materia (being 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 59, s. 4; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 1), and argued that the section in question extended to the respondent.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

MELLOR, J.—This case has been extremely well argued by Mr. Smith, but I have come to the conclusion that the keeper of the pound is not within the terms of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 5. That section provides that "every person who shall impound or confine, or cause to be impounded or confined, in any pound or receptacle of the like nature any animal, shall provide and supply during such confinement a sufficient quantity of fit and wholesome food and water to such animal; and every such person who shall refuse or neglect to provide and supply such animal with such food and water as aforesaid shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a penalty of 20s." It appears to me that this section applies to the real actor, to the person who delivers the animal to the pound-keeper, and not to the pound-keeper himself. The Legislature has made no special provision as to the keeper of the pound, and, from the absence of such a provision, the Legislature must be taken to have considered that the imposition of the 20s. penalty on the person employing the keeper of the pound was sufficient to ensure the object in view. The providing of food and water for twelve hours is left to such person, and if such person omits to provide the food and water during such twelve hours, any person of a benevolent mind may, by the 6th section, enter the pound, supply the food and water, and recover the cost of the food and water from the owner of the animal.

LUSH, J.—I also am of opinion that these statutes contain no words to embrace the keeper of the pound within their sanction. The recital contained in the preamble of the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, is very strongly in favour of the respondent. From that preamble it appears that the history of the law is as follows: First, by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 59, every person impounding any animal was required to supply such animal daily with good and sufficient food and nourishment while impounded. By the same Act every such person so providing the animal with food and nourishment was authorised to recover from the owner of the animal not exceeding double the value of the food and nourishment supplied. Such person was also at liberty, instead of proceeding for the value of the provender, to sell the animal after seven days from the time of the impounding. Then came the Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, which repealed the Act 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 59, and the 5th and 6th sections contained the provisions which my brother Mellor has referred to. Finally comes the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60. This recites, after summarising the two previous Acts, that "it is doubtful whether the Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 49, gives any remedy to the person impounding for the recovery of a compensation for the food and water supplied for any animal, and no power is given to sell the animal, although full provisions for these purposes were contained " in 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 59. The Act then provides that every person who has impounded an animal, and supplied him with food and water, may recover double the value of the food and water supplied from the owner, or may, if he please, sell the animal and pay himself, rendering the overplus, if any, to the owner. I think the mention of the "person impounding," in this section, and the absence of any mention of the keeper of the pound, is conclusive to show that the keeper of the pound is not subject to the penalty imposed by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 5.

Sunday trading—Refreshment-house licence—Hours of closing where no wine licence—29 Car. 2, c. 7, sect. 1—23 Vict. c. 27, sects. 6, 7, & 27—27 & 28 Vict. c. 64, s. 5.

A licensed refreshment-house keeper, although he does not hold a wine licence, may not sell articles for consumption off the premises on Sundays.

CASE stated by the magistrates of Yarmouth.

The appellant was convicted at the petty sessions of the borough, held on 19th July 1876, under 29 Car. 2, c. 7, sect. 1, for having exercised the worldly business of his ordinary calling, between the hours of 3 and 6 p.m., on Sunday, 16th July 1876.

He was a baker and confectioner, and held a refreshment licence under 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 6; but did not hold a wine licence under sect. 7.

The question for the decision of the court was whether sect. 27 of the latter Act, which enacts that the house of a person holding a wine licence "shall not be open for the sale or consumption therein of any article whatever at any time during which the houses of licensed victuallers shall be closed on Sunday," . . . &c., applied to the present case.

Poland, for the appellant.—The words of the Act (23 Vict. c. 27), apply to a refreshment house keeper who does, and not to one who does not, hold a wine licence. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 64, sect. 5, only enacts that a refreshment house must not be open between 1 and 4 a.m. The cakes were sold for consumption off the premises. The Statute 29 Car. 2, c. 7, is suspended by the limited licence obtained.

No counsel appeared to support the conviction.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion this conviction ought to be confirmed. The observance of the Lord's Day Act is enforced or neglected according to the public opinion of the moment, or to the zeal of the informers. In this case the appellant sold cakes and sweetmeats to grown-up people and children; and from the fact that he carried on his trade Sunday after Sunday, there is good reason to infer that he knew the articles he sold would not be consumed on the premises. Prima facie the statute of Charles II. is against him. Is there anything that takes his case out of its provisions? Does the license to keep a refreshment house do so? I am clearly of opinion that it does not. The statute 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 6, permits a person who keeps a house for the purpose of selling refreshment to be consumed therein to procure a licence for his house; and, having done so, he may proceed to take out a wine licence under sect. 7, when he will come within the provisions of sect. 2. But the later statute contains nothing to exempt the appellant from the penalty of breaking the statute of Charles II., for the trading of which he has been convicted, that is, the selling of articles to be consumed elsewhere, is not part of the calling of a refreshment house keeper, as defined by the statute mentioned above, under which the license was granted.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I hold that the construction of the statute as permitting the sale in licensed houses on Sunday of refreshments to be consumed on the premises to be a reasonable one; but it must not, in my judgment, be extended to make a licensed refreshment house an ordinary trading one in such articles. The other part of the case is matter of police regulation. Since the legislature has fixed closing hours for public houses, I cannot see why closing hours should not be fixed for other refreshment houses; and that has been done. As to 27 & 28 Vict. c. 64, s. 5, it distinctly says that nothing therein contained shall authorise any person to keep open any refreshment house, or to sell refreshments otherwise than at the times and upon the conditions prescribed by the Acts of Parliament in that behalf made.

Conviction upheld.

APPEALS FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

Monday, Jan. 29, 1877.

TYNE COAL COMPANY (LIMITED) v. OVERSEERS OF WALLSEND PARISH.

Rating appeal—Colliery drowned out—Value to a tenant of pumping machinery—Principle of assessment.

A colliery, the pumping engines of which only were at work, and which appeared to be a hopeless loss, was assessed to the relief of the poor at a rate calculated upon the land and machinery as a going concern, having a prospective value.

Held, that the land must be rated at its value to a tenant for year to year, and the machinery at its value independently of the land.

CASE stated by the justices of the County of Northumberland.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the Tyne Coal Company (Limited), the appellants, were rateable for certain reservoirs, buildings, engine, railway and colliery.

The appellants are under-lessees of the Wallsend Colliery at a rent of 200*l.* a-year certain. They have power to work existing shafts, and to take surface lands, paying compensation for them. Upon this surface land they have constructed two large reservoirs, boiler sheds, and an engine house, with a large chimney. A railway has been laid from the colliery to a wharf on the river Tyne. The greater part of the buildings, reservoirs, plant, and railway, are substantially constructed. All of them are intended for permanent use, and are used with the sole object of getting coal. The boiler shed contains twelve boilers set in masonry.

The mine was drowned out many years ago, and no coal has been got since 1854. The water was considerably reduced before 1870, but since then, notwithstanding continual pumping, it has remained at about the same level.

The appellants have been assessed to the relief of the poor of the parish in respect of "land, shafts, buildings, engines, pumps, and fixed plant" at the rateable value of 1250*l.*, upon a gross estimated rental of 1500*l.* They admit that they are rateable in respect of the lands taken by them; but they contend that, as the mine is totally unproductive, they are not rateable in respect of any of the other particulars, which are used solely for the purpose of unwatering the mine.

Herschel, Q.C. and E. Ridley, for the appellants, admitted that the principle is well established that in valuing mining property for rating purposes, the value of the plant may be taken into consideration; and that, in estimating the plant and buildings, an extra value may be put upon them because of the mine beneath them. They contended that this principle should work the opposite way when the mine is valueless.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. and Webster, for the overseers.—The mine is not rated. What is rated is the land, with what is upon it, which includes the shaft or opening in the land. The reservoirs also, and the railway and wharf, used for bringing coal to the pumping engines, are not exempted. They are all beneficially occupied, and the fact that they do not produce any return is immaterial. The machinery, &c., are there for the purpose of pumping out water; and making the mine a valuable property. Suppose the pumping were done by a contractor, his works would be rateable. This case stands upon the same footing; here the owner is his own contractor. [LORD COLERIDGE.—The question in these cases is always what would a person give for the tenancy?] The working of the mine has been beneficial in the sense that the water in it has not been allowed to increase. [LORD COLERIDGE.—The time will come when the engines will be rateable.] Then the duty of the engine and its rateability will be at an end. You cannot levy a rate for past years. The engines are now worked in the hope of future profits. Why do the appellants continue to pump if they consider the mine of no value?

Talargoch Mining Company v. St. Asaph, L. Rep., 3 Q. B., 778; Kittow v. St. Cleer, 44 L. J. 23, M. C.

Herschel, Q.C., in reply.—None of the cases cited support the claim of the respondents. They have failed to show any case in which property not capable of being let to a tenant from year to year, and not producing any profit, has been held to be rateable. The case of Staley v. Castleton was that of a cotton mill which, owing to the scarcity of cotton during the American war, was idle, and used as a warehouse. There the rate allowed was that of a warehouse. In Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, the pumping station, &c., had an occupation value as land. The board must have rented them if it had not been proprietor, and a tenant might easily have been found to take them off its hands. That is not our case. The case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham (40 L. J. 30, M. C.) applies the principle of the last case to the buildings upon the land; that is, they were capable of being let, and had an independent value apart from that of the land. Neither is that our case. Harter v. Salford (6 B. & S. 591), was a case where the owner of a silk mill, having ceased to work it, was rated for a building used as a warehouse for machinery. In Reg. v. Bilston (5 B. & C. 851), the pumping engines of a mine were exempted from rating.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case our judgment must be for the appellants. This is an appeal against a rate assessed upon certain machinery, and buildings in connection with the machinery, all of which are occupied and used to drain a coal mine drowned out, and yielding no profits. In order to bring myself within the authority of the decided cases, I must decide that the surface of the land is rateable at whatever it would be worth in the hands of a tenant from year to year; and that the engine-house, pumps, &c., are to be assessed separately, if they have any independent value, upon the authority of the case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham. If there be any independent value in them apart from that of the worthless mine, upon the principle of that case, to that extent they ought to be rated. This fact was not raised by the case, and so I express no opinion upon it. I decide upon the assumption that these engines, &c., are of value only in connection with something at present valueless, and that they have no separate and independent value; that they are part of a valueless whole, which has been valuable at some time now past, and may be so again, when they will be rated at the value which they may then be ascertained to have. When they do so become valuable, either the land will be rated at an additional value, or the mine itself, or perhaps the subjects of this appeal themselves, will be rated. In deciding as I do, I desire to conform to the cases which have already been decided.

GROVE, J.—I concur in the opinion expressed by my Lord. It is not disputed that the land is rateable, or that if it has any adjuncts which increase its value they may be rated; but the appellants contend that besides the land there is nothing in this case rateable. The facts stated show that the mine is absolutely valueless, that it has no value for which a person would give anything. It was argued that a rent might be obtained from a speculator. But that is not the principal upon which rating should be settled. If there were a house to live in upon the land, then there might be some reason for assessing the rate higher than the actual value of the land. At the most the work going on now could only give the property a prospective value, and that we cannot value for rating purposes. The case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham is inconsistent with such a principle. You do not rate land because it may have a contingent value, any more than you reduce a rate because there may possibly be a loss upon the rated property in the future; you take its present value. I should be prepared to decide this case upon that ground only. But the case goes further. My brother Lush, J., in the case of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, held that the rateable quality of the land and buildings of the defendants was not affected by the particular use to which it was applied. Here is a stronger case. The mine has no reasonably prospective value. It has been in the same position for six years, during which time the engines have done no useful work. It would not be right to rate them, because they may at some future time have some value, whilst there is no probability of their having a future, or any, value. I conceive nothing would induce a tenant to give 1s. more rent for the land because the engines were on it. The only cases at all supporting the contention of the respondents, but falling far short of it, are the case of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, from which it would appear that there was a rateability upon pumping engines, because they had a value, explained by the case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, which shows that the sewage works had a value, not because they were sewage works, but because they might be valuable in the hands of a tenant, and might be used by him for some other purpose. The only utility of the pumps, &c., in question, is in respect of the mine, and the same remark applies to the wharf and the railway. They are so unprofitable that they would even be a drawback to a tenant.

WARDEN v. TYE—BULLOCK v. DUNLAP.

Rate ordered to be amended in terms of the judgment. No costs.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Thursday, Jan. 18, 1877.

WARDEN v. TYE.

Drunkenness, penalty for—Licensed person drunk on his own premises—The Licensing Act 1872, ss. 12 and 13.

A publican cannot be convicted under sect. 13 of the Licensing Act 1872, for being drunk on his own premises.

CASE stated by the justices of Northamptonshire.

The appellant was summarily convicted under sect. 13 of the Licensing Act 1872, which enacts that "if any licensed person permits drunkenness, or any violent, quarrelsome, or riotous conduct to take place on his premises, or sells any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person," he shall be liable to a penalty, &c.

It appeared that the appellant was a licensed person, and that he was found drunk by the respondent, a policeman, upon his own licensed premises. He was fined 5s. and costs, and the conviction was ordered to be indorsed upon the licence.

Poland, against the conviction.—The conviction is under the wrong section. Sect. 13 makes it an offence for a licensed person to permit a person to be drunk on his premises; but the drunkenness must be that of another person—the landlord cannot be the person drunk. The section goes on to say that if any licensed person "sells any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person." This shows that the person must be another than the person, for he cannot sell to himself. Sect. 12 is the one applicable to this case, by which every person found drunk is liable to a penalty of 10s.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I come to the conclusion that the case does not fall within the section under which the conviction has been made, and that it cannot be sustained. The Licensing Act 1872, is divided into heads, one of which, entitled "Offences against public order," consists of several sections, numbered 12 to 18 respectively, all except the first regulating the duty of licensed persons in relation to others. Except sect. 12, every one of them is clear in this respect; and sect. 13 in particular says that "if any licensed person permits drunkenness, &c., on his premises, or sells any intoxicating liquor," &c., he shall be liable to conviction. He cannot sell to himself in his own house. Part of the section, therefore, cannot apply to the licensed person; and, using a fair construction of the whole of the Act, I think the rest of the section cannot. I come to the conclusion, therefore, reluctantly but clearly, that the words of sect. 13 do not include the publican himself, but reserve his case to be dealt with in another way.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Sect. 13 clearly points to the conduct of the landlord with relation to others; for he must take care persons do not get drunk, &c., &c., but it does not relate to a licensed person himself getting drunk. There is another provision made for that case. By sect. 12 any person found drunk is liable to punishment. However much we may regret it, we cannot uphold this conviction. The court has only to construe an Act as it finds it, and in my opinion sect. 13 was not intended to apply to this case.

BULLOCK v. DUNLAP.

Detinue and trover—Property found on a person suspected of having stolen it—Trial and acquittal of suspected party—Property detained by constable—Application by constable to magistrate for order, under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 29, as to disposal of property—Adjournment by magistrate to a day not yet expired—Action by acquitted party against constable—Demurrer.

The plaintiff being found by a police constable wearing a diamond pin and diamond ring, was taken into custody and charged by him with stealing them, and being committed by a police magistrate for trial on such charge, was afterwards indicted and tried thereon and acquitted. The defendant, a superintendent of police into whose possession the pin and ring had lawfully come in the course of the proceedings, did not deliver them up to the plaintiff upon the latter's acquittal, but, before action and within a reasonable time after such acquittal, applied to a magistrate for an order under sect. 29 of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, "for the delivery of the said goods to the party who should appear to the magistrate to be the rightful owner thereof, or such other order as to the magistrate should seem meet." The magistrate entertained the application, and, after hearing evidence in support of it, and the evidence of the plaintiff in support of his claim to the goods, adjourned the hearing to a day which has not expired, and no order has yet been made.

In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for the detention and conversion of the said pin and ring, in answer to which the defendant stated the facts as above set forth, and alleged that he detained the goods as a constable in the performance of his duty, it was Held by the Exchequer Division (Cleasby, B.), overruling a demurrer to the statement of defence, that the action was not maintainable, and that the defendant having within a reasonable time applied to the magistrate for an order under sect. 29 of the statute, and done all that the Act of Parliament called upon him to do to render up possession of the goods in question, and the matter being still in the hands of the magistrate, the defendant was not responsible because he was not able before action to relieve himself of the possession of the goods.

THE statement of claim in this case was as follows:

The plaintiff is a dealer in jewellery, in Church-street, Soho, and the defendant is a superintendent of the metropolitan police.

1. The plaintiff, in the month of Oct. 1875, was in possession, as his own property, of a certain diamond pin, which he was then wearing in his cravat scarf, as well as of a certain diamond ring, which was also in his possession as his own property.

2. One Charles Butcher, a metropolitan detective police constable, on seeing the plaintiff and observing the said diamond pin being so worn by him as aforesaid, charged him with stealing the same, as well as the diamond ring, and took him into custody upon such charge, and then took from him both the said pin and the ring.

3, 4. The plaintiff was, thereupon, subsequently taken before Mr. Newton, a metropolitan police magistrate, who, after various repeated remands, committed him for trial on such charge, upon which he was subsequently indicted and tried, and acquitted.

5. The said Charles Butcher delivered the said pin and ring to the defendant, as his superior officer.

6. The defendant detains from the plaintiff the use and possession of the plaintiff's goods and property, that is to say, the diamond pin and ring, and has also converted to his own use and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of his said goods and property.

The plaintiff claims a return of the said goods or their value, and 20*l.* for their detention, and in respect of the conversion of the said goods, the plaintiff claims 100*l.*

The statement of defence:—

1. That the said goods and property were not the plaintiff's, as alleged.

2. As to the alleged conversion of the said goods and property, the defendant denies the statement in paragraph 6 of the plaintiff's statement of claim.

3. As to the alleged detention of the said goods and property, and depriving the plaintiff of the use and possession thereof, the defendant says that, after the plaintiff had been charged with stealing the said goods and property, and had been tried and acquitted (as alleged), the said goods and property were in the lawful possession of the defendant, as and being a constable, within the meaning of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 29; and the defendant, as such constable, being ignorant as to who was the rightful owner thereof, before the commencement of this suit, and within a reasonable time after he became possessed thereof, duly made an application to a magistrate then having jurisdiction in that behalf, under the said section of the said statute, to make an order for the delivery of the said goods to the party who should appear to be the rightful owner thereof, or such other order as to such magistrate should seem meet.

4. That the said magistrate entertained the said application, and heard evidence in support thereof, and the plaintiff appeared before the said magistrate in the matter of the said application, and gave evidence in support of his claim to the said goods and property.

5. That the said magistrate afterwards adjourned the hearing of the said application to a day which has not yet expired.

6. That the said application is still pending before the said magistrate, and no order has yet been made therein by the said magistrate, under the said section of the said statute.

7. That the defendant, as such constable as aforesaid, and in the performance of his duty in that behalf, and not otherwise, detained, and still detains, the said goods and property, and the possession thereof from the plaintiff, until an order has been made under the said section of the said statute, as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid.

Demurrer to the 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th paragraphs of the statement of defence as bad in law, on the ground that the matters therein contained do not disclose any legal defence.

Sect. 29 of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, referred to in the above statement of defence, enacts "That if any goods or money charged to be stolen or fraudulently obtained, shall be in the custody of any constable, by virtue of any warrant of a justice, or in prosecution of any charge of felony or misdemeanour in regard to the obtaining thereof, and the person charged with stealing or obtaining possession as aforesaid, shall not be found, or shall have been summarily convicted or discharged, or shall have been tried and acquitted, or if such person shall have been tried and found guilty, but the property so in custody shall not have been included in any such indictment upon which he shall have been found guilty, it shall be lawful for any magistrate to make an order for the delivery of such goods or money to the party who shall appear to be the rightful owner thereof, or, in case the owner cannot be ascertained, then to make such order with respect to such goods or money as to such magistrate shall seem meet. Provided always, that no such order shall be any bar to the right of any person or persons to sue the party to whom such goods or money shall be delivered, and to recover such goods or money from him by action at law, so that such action shall be commenced within six calendar months next after such order shall be made."

The plaintiff's points for argument. — First, that the paragraphs demurred to disclose no facts which in law disentitle the plaintiff to maintain and continue this action; secondly, that the plaintiff being no party to the said proceedings before the magistrate, the said statute does not take away his right to maintain and continue an action in a court of law; thirdly, that the statute referred to, although enabling a magistrate under certain circumstances to make an order as to the property, does not interfere with the liability of

BULLOCK v. DUNLAP.

[Ex. Div.]

the constable; fourthly, that even if an order by a magistrate within the meaning of the said statute would prevent an action being brought against the constable, yet nothing less than an order (and not the pending of the proceedings) would have that effect; fifthly, that the statute could only have reference to a case in which the application to the magistrate was made before action commenced; sixthly, that the facts disclosed in the statement of defence admit that the adjournment has taken place for the purpose of the continuance of the action, and therefore the magistrate in his discretion must be taken to have declined to adjudicate while the said action is pending.

The defendant's points: First, the defendant, on the argument of the demurrer, will contend (amongst other things) that the statements in the paragraphs demurred to, show that the goods were in the lawful possession of the defendant as a constable, and that such lawful possession was not determined at or before the commencement of the action; secondly, that if the magistrate were now to order the goods to be given up to another person than the plaintiff, the defendant would be obliged to comply with such order; thirdly, that the plaintiff, by submitting to the jurisdiction of the magistrate, and giving evidence in support of his claim, authorised the detention of the goods by the defendant as such constable as aforesaid, until the ownership was determined; fourthly, that it appears from the statement of defence that the defendant only performed his duty as a constable, and is not liable to be sued for the detention of the goods from the plaintiff.

Talfourd Salter, Q.C. (with whom was L. Glynn), for the plaintiff, supported the demurrer, and submitted that even if an order had been made by the magistrate under the 29th section of the statute for the delivery of these articles, or that they should remain in the custody of the constable, it would have been no answer to the present action, nor have afforded any protection against a person claiming the goods from the person having possession of them. The decision of the magistrate as to the ownership under sect. 29 could in no way affect the plaintiff's title or his right to bring that action, nor could the proceeding under that section determine the right of property. The object and intention of the statute was to relieve and protect persons in the position of police officers encumbered with the custody of property under such circumstances by providing a place of deposit for the property, but not thereby in any way to affect the title to it. The question is not whether a reasonable time elapsed before the application to the magistrate, but whether a reasonable time had elapsed before the commencement of the action. All that the defendant could want a reasonable time for was to find out the title and obtain the magistrate's order, but that did not affect the plaintiff's right. It is possible that the magistrate delays making any order until this action has been decided, and should the court now give judgment against the plaintiff a deadlock may occur, and the constable be placed in peril from which the statute was intended to protect him. The plaintiff's action and the proceedings before the magistrate are for two different purposes, the former is to try the right of property, the other is to ascertain and define a place of deposit for it. The Solicitor-General (Sir H. S. Giffard, Q.C.), with him were F. M. White and Paine, for the defendant contra.—It is not disputed by the other side that the defendant is a police constable, and that the plaintiff had been charged and indicted for stealing the goods in question which are therefore clearly within sect. 29. That section assumes such goods to be in custodia legis, and the constable is not to be disturbed or vexed in his possession by an action like the present. He was bound to take possession of the goods and not to allow them to be put under the control or in the possession of the accused, nor to part with them except under the order of the magistrate. The fact that the plaintiff was acquitted at his trial for stealing the goods makes no difference. The section does not direct the goods to be delivered to the acquitted party, but expressly enables the magistrate to exercise his discretion with respect to an order for their disposition notwithstanding such acquittal. The order of the magistrate is only an adjudication on the right to present possession; it cannot affect the ultimate right or bind the title to the goods, or estop the plaintiff from asserting his right to them hereafter; but, until an order is made, the constable's possession is lawful. The matter is still sub judice, and should the plaintiff succeed in this action the defendant would be thereby prevented from obeying an order of the magistrate to deliver the goods to some other person than the plaintiff. The plaintiff must show both a right to the present possession and an ultimate right to the property, and that he has not done. He cited

Vaughan v. Watt, 6 M. & W. 492; 9 L. J., N.S., 272, Ex.

Talfourd Salter, Q.C. in reply submitted that the keeping of the goods by the constable after the plaintiff's acquittal was totally unlawful. A reasonable time was of course allowed to a constable under such circumstances to ascertain the facts, but he was bound to exercise his judgment upon them in a reasonable time, and not to withhold property from the owners of it.

CLEASBY, B.—It appears to me that the statement of defence in this case is a good defence to the action, and that, therefore, the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court upon this demurrer. The case turns entirely upon the 29th section of the Act of Parliament that has been referred to, viz., the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. Now, what was the object of that section? It was to protect a person who is placed by virtue of his office in possession of the property of some other person, to which he himself has no title. That is always a dangerous position for a person to be in, because although he may take time to make up his mind what to do, he is eventually bound by what he does do, and renders himself responsible if he does not deliver the property to the right person. The object of this section obviously was to protect a constable from that difficulty, and to enable him to go to the magistrate and say, "Tell me what I am to do with these goods, which do not belong to me; let me know who is the person to whom I am to deliver them." The Act says that it shall be lawful for the magistrate to make the order; and the person who obeys that order will be protected in obeying it, without any reference to the title of the person claiming the goods. That being so under the circumstances of this case, which comes within the Act of Parliament, the defendant applied to the magistrate to know what he was to do with these goods. The application was not disposed of by the magistrate at the time, but was adjourned by him for further and future consideration. He may possibly entertain a doubt in his own mind whether the plaintiff, the person who has been tried and acquitted on the charge of stealing the goods, is or not the person to whom he ought to order them to be delivered. It is hardly contended that had an order been made at once the plaintiff could have maintained this action. Indeed, it seems to be almost admitted that under that state of things it would be impossible for him to do so. That being so, and the matter being in the hands of the magistrate, what difference can it possibly make that he takes some time in order to enable him to make up his mind what his decision ought to be before he gives it? Is it possible, in construing a clause of an Act of Parliament which is made for the protection of an officer, to hold that the officer becomes responsible for the way in which the magistrate, the judge to whom by law the officer is to apply, deals with the case, the matter being within the magistrate's jurisdiction? The magistrate may say, "I cannot dispose of this case now, it requires further consideration, and I desire to have the proper persons to attend me upon it again." I do not suppose otherwise than that a judge or magistrate in dealing with a case is influenced by proper motives, and that he will deal with the case properly, so long as it is pending before him. That being so, it appears to me that the defendant here has done all that the Act of Parliament calls upon him to do to render up possession of the goods in question, and that therefore he cannot be responsible to the plaintiff, because he was not able, before the commencement of this Act, to relieve himself of the possession of them. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the court must be for the defendant with costs.

HILL (app.) v. HALL (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

DIVISIONAL COURT FOR APPEALS FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 24 and May 25, 1876

HILL (app.) v. HALL (resp.)

Repeal of statute by implication—Inconsistent provisions—Different penalties—Conviction.

By 3 & 4 Vict., c. 85, s. 6, all partitions between any chimney or flue shall be of brick or stone, and at least equal to half a brick in thickness; every chimney or flue in any wall, or of greater length than four feet out of the wall, not being a circular chimney or flue twelve inches in diameter, shall be in every section not less than fourteen by nine inches; no chimney or flue shall be constructed with any angle therein which shall be less obtuse than an angle of 120 degrees; and every salient or projecting angle in any chimney or flue shall be rounded off four inches at the least, upon pain of forfeiture by every master builder or workman making such chimney or flue of any sum not less than 10*l.* or exceeding 50*l.*

The Huddersfield Improvement Act 1871, makes no mention of the said general Act; but by section 111 enacts that the chimneys and flues of every new building shall be constructed in such mode and of such materials and dimensions as shall be determined or approved by the corporation. Unless otherwise prescribed or ordered every chimney or flue shall be constructed of good brick or stone work, and if circular, must be formed of earthenware pipes of not less than ten inches diameter; and if not circular, must be pargeted with mortar, and not less than fourteen by twelve inches clear interior measurement. No chimney or flue shall have angles less obtuse than 120 degrees, except when proper iron or stone doors or openings are left for cleaning purposes. Other provisions are made about materials, but nothing is said about the other matters provided by the general Act. Section 150 makes the penalty for breach of the local Act any sum not exceeding 5*l.*

Held, upon a case stated by justices, that the local Act did not impliedly repeal the general Act with respect to new chimneys in Huddersfield; but that the appellant, who had there made a partition less than half a brick in thickness, and had not rounded off a projecting angle four inches, was rightly convicted and fined 10*l.* for each offence, under the general Act.

THIS was an information preferred by Peter Hall against John Hill for that he the said John Hill did unlawfully make or cause to be made a certain chimney or flue, the salient or projecting angle of the same not being rounded off four inches at the least. Two of the justices of the peace for the borough of Huddersfield ordered that the said John Hill should for the said offence forfeit and pay the sum of 10*l.* The following case was stated for the opinion of the court:

At the hearing of the said information it was admitted before the said justices that the said John Hill, who is a master builder, had built a chimney or flue, the salient or projecting angle of the same not being rounded off four inches at the least, and that he had in that respect contravened the provisions of the 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict., c. 85. At the close of the complainant's case, the solicitor for the said John Hill was heard in answer to the matter of the said information, and he then contended before the said justices—

1. That the sum which an offender under sect. 6 renders himself liable to forfeit, viz., a sum not less than 10*l.* nor exceeding 50*l.*, is not a penalty upon conviction, but a forfeiture only, and that there was no power on the part of the justices to direct the payment of any such sum; and that the remedy was only before a civil tribunal, the jurisdiction of the justices being limited to convictions for penalties only, and the appeal given by the statute not applying to forfeitures.

2. That the provisions of 3 & 4 Vict., c. 85, had been impliedly repealed, so far as respects the borough of Huddersfield (within the limits of which the chimney or flue complained of is built), by the Public Health Act, and by "The Huddersfield Improvement Act 1871," and the bye-laws made thereunder.

3. That the building, of which the chimney or flue complained of formed part, had been erected in accordance with plans which had been prepared and submitted to the Huddersfield Corporation for their approval in pursuance of sect. 103 of the said Huddersfield Improvement Act 1871, and which plans had been approved by them.

The questions upon which the opinion of the court is desired, are :

Whether the said justices had upon the above statement of fact power to order and adjudge that the said John Hill should forfeit and pay the sum of 10*l.*; and whether the statute under which such penalty was inflicted was impliedly repealed; whereupon the opinion of the said court is asked upon the said questions of law.

Whether they were correct in their determination as aforesaid; and if not, what should be done or ordered by the said court in the premises.

A second case was stated by the same justices, between the same parties and in the same words, mutatis mutandis, the information alleging that John Hill did unlawfully make or cause to be made a certain, or partition of a certain, chimney or flue, less than half a brick in thickness, to wit, one and a half inch.

The two cases were separately argued, the first before Cleasby B. and Field J., on the 24th Feb.; and the second before Cleasby B., Grove, and Field, JJ., on the 25th May.

Manisty, Q.O. (with him Beresford), for the appellant.—No doubt at the time of its passing, the statute 3 & 4 Vict., c. 85, which is called An Act for the regulation of chimney sweepers and chimneys, had a general application, even to the borough of Huddersfield; section 6 is—"And whereas it is expedient, for the better security from accidents by fire or otherwise, the improved construction of chimneys and flues provided by the said Act, viz. (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 35) be continued: Be it enacted that all withs and partitions between any chimney or flue, which at any time after the passing of this Act shall be built or re-built, shall be of brick or stone, and at least equal to half a brick in thickness; and every breast-back and with, or partition of any chimney or flue, hereafter to be built or re-built, shall be built of sound materials, and the joints of the work well filled in with good mortar or cement, and rendered or stuccoed within; and also that every chimney or flue hereafter to be built or re-built in any wall, or of greater length than four feet out of the wall, not being a circular chimney or flue twelve inches in diameter, shall be in every section of the same not less than fourteen inches by nine inches; and no chimney or flue shall be constructed with any angle therein which shall be less obtuse than an angle of one hundred and twenty degrees, except as is hereinafter excepted; and every salient or projecting angle in any chimney or flue shall be rounded off four inches at the least, upon pain of forfeiture by every master builder or other master workman, who shall make or cause to be made such chimney or flue, of any sum of not less than ten pounds nor exceeding fifty pounds." The provisions of the local Act however on this particular subject, differ so much that they impliedly repeal, within the limits of the borough of Huddersfield, the general Act. By section 111 of the Huddersfield Improvement Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 151) "The chimneys and flues of every new building shall be constructed in such mode, and of such materials and dimensions as shall from time to time be determined or approved by the corporation. Unless otherwise prescribed or ordered, every chimney or flue shall be constructed of good brickwork or stone work, and mortar well grouted, and if circular must be formed of earthenware pipes of not less than ten inches diameter set in mortar, and if not circular must be pargeted with mortar, and not less than fourteen inches by twelve inches clear interior measurement. No chimney or flue shall have angles less obtuse than 120 degrees, except when proper iron or stone doors or openings are left for cleaning purposes. No timber or woodwork shall be placed within nine inches, or wooden plugs driven nearer than six inches of the inside face of any chimney or flue, and no opening shall be made in any chimneys or flues for any purpose nor pipe for conveying smoke, heated air, steam, or hot water, fixed in any new building, except of the materials and in the manner to be submitted to and specially approved by the corporation." The byelaws under this Act merely repeat the provisions of this section upon this subject. The enactments in these two statutes are so inconsistent that the latter must be interpreted to repeal the earlier, so far as the latter applies. The general Act absolutely requires the various proceedings imposed by it, the local Act gives full discretion to the corporation to determine and prescribe rules concerning the matter, and in case of the corporation making no different rules, the things required are by no means the same as in the general Act; for instance, by the general Act a circular chimney must be twelve inches in diameter, by the local Act it may be ten inches; by the former a chimney not circular may be fourteen inches by nine inches, by the latter Act it must be fourteen inches by twelve inches; and there is no provision in the local Act in respect to either of the two matters for which the appellant has been convicted. Moreover, the penalty for breach of section 6 of the general Act must be between 10*l.* and 50*l.*, whilst the penalty for breach of the local Act must by section 150 be under 5*l.* These distinctions all tend to show that the general Act is not meant to apply any longer to the borough of Huddersfield. Special provisions, different from those of the Chimneys Act of 1840, are now in force throughout the Metropolis by section 20 of 18 and 19 Vic. c. 122.

J. F. Clerk, for the respondent.—With respect to the Metropolis, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 85, is expressly repealed by the Metropolis Building Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 84), Schednle A. The general Chimneys Act 1840, and the Huddersfield Local Act 1871 are quite consistent, and their provisions concerning the construction of chimneys must be read together and jointly applied to all chimneys within the borough of Huddersfield. With the exception of the diameter of a circular chimney, all the provisions of the local Act merely extend the limiting legislation of the general Act. The ten inches apply to earthenware pipes which apparently were not in use in 1840; but even if that single provision be inconsistent with the twelve inches permitted by the general Act, it is not sufficient to impliedly repeal all the other provisions of the general Act on that subject. Lord Hardwicke laid down the law on this subject in Middleton v. Crofts (2 Atkins 650, at p. 675), "The rule touching the repeal of laws is leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant; but subsequent Acts of Parliament in the affirmative, giving new penalties, and instituting new methods of proceeding, do not repeal former methods and penalties of proceeding, ordained by preceding Acts of Parliament, without negative words." Again, "Besides, a later Act of Parliament hath never been construed to repeal a prior Act, without words of repeal, unless there be a contrariety and repugnancy between them, or at least some notice taken of the former law in the subsequent one, so as to indicate an intention in the law makers to repeal it." It was also held in Dr. Foster's case (Co. Reps. P. xi), 56b, that an affirmative statute shall not repeal a precedent affirmative law, unless the subsequent statute is contrary to the precedent law.

[Div. App.]

HILL (app.) v. HALL (resp.).

[Div. App.]

Manisty, Q.C. in reply.—The words "Unless otherwise prescribed or ordered," in sect. 111 of the local Act, can only be construed to give the corporation power to abrogate the existing law. Those words are sufficient to make this provision an exception to the ordinary rule of law.

CLEASBY, B.—My mind has fluctuated considerably during the argument of this case, but upon the best consideration I can give the matter I have, like my learned brethren, come to the conclusion that there is not enough in the words of sect. 111 of the Huddersfield Improvement Act 1840 to repeal by implication the provisions of the general Act (3 & 4 Vict.) c. 85, s. 6, on the same subject. The rule of law is well laid down in Foster's case (Co. Reps. vol. 6, p. 119), and although it appears that the contrariety sufficient to repeal by implication a previous statute, may be of different kinds, as for instance in quality, in matter, or in respect of the form prescribed, "only it must be known that forasmuch as Acts of Parliament are established with such gravity, wisdom, and universal consent of the whole realm, for the advancement of the commonwealth, they ought not, by any constrained construction out of the general and ambiguous words of a subsequent act, to be abrogated." For myself, I must say I cannot lose sight of the fact that the later Act has but a local application; and when we look at the object of the general legislation as appears by the preamble of the 16th section of the Act for the regulation of chimney sweepers and chimneys, and when we consider that the better security from accidents by fire is of so universal an advantage, we may well take it that the policy of the Legislature was to apply these provisions even to places where further enactments of the same kind are in force. It seems to me to be most essential that chimneys should be at least a brick and a half apart, and that every projecting angle in a chimney should be rounded off four inches at the least; and although neither of these matters is required expressly in the local Act before us, I cannot think their mere omission is conclusive of an intention to repeal the enactments about them in the general Act. I can come to no other conclusion than that the Legislature in passing this local Act meant to adopt the general Act as part of its provisions on this subject. Sect. 111 is not inconsistent with sect. 6 of the Act of 1840, except as to the matters of slight importance mentioned by Mr. Manisty. Sect. 103 and following sections provide the means by which notice is to be given to and consent obtained from the corporation, but they contain nothing further about chimneys and flues. I do not, therefore, consider this local Act contains enough contrariety to repeal the previous general Act, or to set aside the existing legislation. The two Acts must if possible be read together, and the implication of repeal in the second falls short of any abrogation of the previous law. Our judgment, therefore, will be for the respondent.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. In considering the question whether one Act of Parliament impliedly repeals another, we must remember it may have that effect by the necessary inconsistency of the provisions, or if they are irreconcilable in their scope or language. Much importance should be attached to the fact of any mention made concerning the previous Act, and all these considerations should be more strictly applied when the alleged repeal is contained in a special Act of only local adaptation. It would be very dangerous if an inconsistency in something unimportant, as for instance a mere matter of measurement, should be enough to imply the repeal of an earlier Act. The question for us is whether there is anything substantially irreconcilable between sect. 6 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 85, and sect. 111 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 151. Reliance has been placed upon the early words of the latter, by which it is said power is given to the corporation to make any provisions concerning chimneys in Huddersfield which they may think fit; but it appears to me that this power may well be subject to the previous general Act, and that the corporation can only make bye-laws and give consents within the limits allowed by that Act. Then come the directions which are to be in force with reference to chimneys, if not otherwise prescribed by byelaws. There is no reason that I can see why they should not be read together with the directions contained in sect. 6 of the general Act. There is nothing at all inconsistent in the provisions of the two, unless it be the required diameter of a circular chimney. The old Act seems to contemplate a diameter not less than 12 inches, and the new Act authorises a diameter of 10 inches; but the latter is required, if of that size, to be of earthenware, which is a better material for the purpose than brick or stone, which the old Act refers to. It may be that a circular chimney of the new material need not in the borough of Huddersfield be of more than 10 inches in diameter, but there is no other provision in this sect. (111) which cannot be carried out at the same time as the provisions of the general Act. This slight distinction between the two Acts is not enough to imply a repeal of the earlier general provisions. Such a construction would be contrary to the ordinary canons concerning repeal by implication.

FIELD, J.—There are here in fact two appeals from convictions under the 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 85, but they both turn on the one point whether the provisions of that section are impliedly repealed by sect. 111 of the Huddersfield Improvement Act, 1871. I think that both Acts are in force within that borough, and that the later does not repeal the earlier Act. To establish an implied repeal there must be a clear contrariety in the provisions. The application of this rule is not always clear, but there seems to me to be no difficulty here. They may well be read together, and it would be most dangerous to hold that the slight inconsistencies between the two Acts was sufficient to abrogate one of them. I think Huddersfield has a protection against accidental fire

PASHLER (app.) v. STEVENITT (resp.).

Adulteration—Gin—Water—Evidence—38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 6.

Appellant sold, as a bottle of gin, liquid composed of 26 per cent. alcohol, 70 per cent. water, and 4 per cent. sugar. Evidence was adduced that gin was sold by retailers at varying strength from proof to 20 per cent. under proof. This liquid was 44 per cent. under proof, but the analyst said he should call it "gin whose alcoholic strength was exceedingly low." Justices convicted the appellant under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.

Held, upon a case stated, that the facts justified the justices' finding that this liquid was not of the quality of gin, but that the excess of water was a fraudulent increase of the measure of the article within the enacting part of the said section.

This was a case stated by the two justices of the peace for the parts of Kesteven in the County of Lincoln, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 24th Jan. 1876, the respondent, who is a superintendent of police, and the proper officer appointed under "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875" (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), for carrying into execution the said Act, laid information in due form of law against the appellant, for that he the said Baxter Pashler, on the 2nd Dec. last, at the parish of New Sleaford, in the said parts and county, did unlawfully sell to the prejudice of the said Thomas Stevenett, the purchaser, a certain article of food, to wit, gin, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

The appellant is a licensed victualler carrying on business at Sleaford in the County of Lincoln.

On the 31st Jan. 1876, the said information came to be heard before one of the said justices alone, when both parties appeared; the hearing was adjourned to the 14th Jan. 1876, when both parties again appeared.

The evidence on the part of respondent consisted of that given by the respondent and by George May Lowe, M.D., the public analyst for the County of Lincoln. The respondent proved that he visited the ordinary place of business of the appellant and asked for a bottle of gin, with which he was furnished by the appellant and for which he was charged, and paid 2s. 6d. He did not ask for any particular quality or strength of gin, nor did the appellant give any intimation of the quality or strength of that supplied. No label or descriptive mark was on the bottle.

The respondent notified to the appellant his intention of having the gin analysed by the public analyst, and offered to divide the gin according to the provisions of the 14th section of the Act 38 &

39 Vict. c. 63. The appellant did not accept the offer to divide the sample. The respondent submitted the gin to the public analyst, Dr. Lowe, and received from him a certificate which he produced, and of which the following is a copy:

S. K. 28, gin.

Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875.—Form of certificate.

To Mr. Thos. Stevenett, of Sleaford.

I, the undersigned public analyst for Lincolnshire, do hereby certify that I received on the 3rd Dec. 1875, from Mr. Thos. Stevenett a sample of gin labelled S. K. 28, for analysis, and have analysed the same, and declare the result of my analysis to be as follows:

I am of opinion that the same is a sample of gin, water, and sugar in the following proportions. I am of opinion that the said sample contains the parts as under, or the per centage of foreign ingredients as under:

Pure alcohol	26	per cent.
Water	70	"
Extract.....	4	"
	100

Observations.

The extracts consist of sugar only.

The spirit is pure.

The alcoholic strength is exceedingly low.

As witness my hand this 10th Jan. 1876, at Lincoln.

G. M. Lowe.

Dr. Lowe proved his certificate. He stated that spirits known as "proof" contained about one-half part of water and one-half part of pure alcohol. He also said that he found from Professor Atcherley's work on the adulteration of food, that gin as sold by retailers varied in strength from proof to 20 per cent. under proof. The appellant's gin was about 44 per cent. under proof, as tested by Sykes' hydrometer. He did not know that there was any fixed standard for gin, and he did not know from personal experience at what strength it was usually sold in the retail trade. He would not say how low its strength might be reduced without its ceasing to be gin; and when asked how he should describe that which he had analysed, he said he "should call it gin, whose alcoholic strength is exceedingly low."

The appellant tendered no evidence whatever.

The appellant was fined 1s. and costs.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether or not, upon the evidence above stated, the appellant was properly convicted under the 6th section of the Act 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63?

Graham (with him Raymond), argued for the appellant.—The words of this sect. 6 are, "No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases, that is to say, (1) where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce, in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food or drug, or conceal the inferior quality thereof; (2) where the drug or food is a proprietary medicine, or is the subject of a patent in force, and is supplied in the strength required by the specification of the patent; (3) where the food or drug is compounded as in this Act mentioned; (4) where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation." By sect. 7 "No person shall sell any compound article of food or compounded drug which is not composed of ingredients in accordance with the demand of the purchaser under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds." "Provided that (by sect. 8) no person shall be guilty of any such offence as aforesaid in respect of the sale of an article of food or a drug mixed with any matter or ingredient not injurious to health, and not intended fraudulently to increase its bulk, weight, or measure, or conceal its inferior quality, if at the time of delivering such article or drug he shall supply to the person receiving the same a notice, by a label, distinctly and legibly written or printed on, or with the article or drug, to the effect that the same is mixed." These sections do not create any offence upon the evidence before the justices. The liquid sold was of the nature, substance, and quality of the substance demanded; no provision is made as to the proportion of the ingredients, nor to the strength of the article. The analyst himself stated, in his evidence, that he should call the liquid "gin," which is what the respondent asked for.

[DIV. APP.]

WILLIAMS (app.) v. EVANS (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

OLESBY, B.—I do not think we can interfere with this conviction. This is an article of food which is not of the substance and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser. It does not appear to me to come within either of the exemptions; the first is the only one at all applicable, and it cannot be maintained that this excess of water has been added to the liquid because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce in a state fit for carriage or consumption; indeed, it may be said, upon the facts proved, that the object was fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food, or to conceal the inferior quality thereof. The justices have come to the conclusion that a mixture of alcohol and water, so far as 44 per cent. below proof, is not of the quality of gin as known commercially, but a fraudulent increase of the measure of the liquid. It is impossible for us to say they were wrong, and they were therefore justified in convicting the appellant.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. We cannot decide whether, upon the weight of the evidence, the case comes within the first exception or not; that is a question for the magistrates. The witness certainly said he should call the liquid gin, or rather qualified gin, but the magistrates had to use their discretion upon all the facts and statements before them. If 44 per cent. beyond the ordinary proportion be not adulteration, it must be difficult to discover anything to which the statute could apply. It is really a question of fact, and I think the justices have decided it rightly.

Highways—Riding furiously—Driver—Offence—Conviction—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 78.

The Highway Act 1835, s. 78, enumerates various acts and omissions by persons on highways having charge of carriages and animals, and also by persons interrupting others; amongst them, if any person, riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously, so as to endanger the life or limb of any passenger, then follow the words, "Every person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid, and being convicted of any such offence," shall "for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding 5l., in case such driver shall not be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage; and in case the offender be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage, then any sum not exceeding 10l. The appellant was convicted by justices of riding furiously on horseback along a highway, and fined a sum less than 5l.

Held, upon a case stated, that the penalty under 5l. was applicable to all offences mentioned in the section, whether the offenders were drivers of carriages or not; and that the conviction was right.

THIS was a case stated by justices of Denbigh, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

An information was preferred by one John Evans, of Llandyrnog, in the parish of Llandyrnog, in the county of Denbigh, police constable (hereinafter called the respondent), against Edwin Williams, of Shopywaen, in the parish of Llandyrnog, aforesaid, labourer (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 78 of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, charging for that he, the said appellant, on the 14th March 1876, at the parish of Llandyrnog, in the county aforesaid, unlawfully did ride a horse furiously on a certain highway there situate, leading from Denbigh to Llandyrnog aforesaid, so as then to endanger the lives and limbs of passengers on the said highway, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. The justices convicted the appellant and fined him 20s. The justices, on application, stated and signed the following case.

Upon the hearing of the information and complaint it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact, that the said appellant, on the 14th March 1876, at the parish of Llandyrnog aforesaid, unlawfully did ride a cart horse furiously, he being on the back of such horse without saddle, and urging the same forward on a certain highway there situate, leading from Denbigh to Llandyrnog aforesaid, so as then to endanger the lives and limbs of passengers on the said highway.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the justices had no power to impose a penalty or convict for riding furiously, as the penal part of sect. 78 of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, omitted all mention of a rider.

The said justices, however, on reading and considering such section, decided that not only persons driving furiously, but those riding also to the danger of the public and furiously, were intended to be and are included in such section and Act; and for the above reason they adjudged the case to be brought within the operation of the 78th section, and gave their determination against the appellant, in manner hereinbefore stated.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court therefore is:—Whether a person on a horse, and urging the animal furiously forward on the highway, to the danger of passengers, is liable to be convicted and fined under the 78th section of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50? If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction and fine was legally and properly made and imposed, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information and complaint is to be dismissed.

WILLIAMS (app.) v. EVANS (resp.).

W. C. Yale argued for the appellant.—This 78th section of the Highway Act 1835 provides a penalty for a great number of offences, but it omits any penalty for riding furiously on horseback, although such a proceeding is classed amongst the other offences created by the section. It enacts, among other things, that “if any person riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously so as to endanger the life or limb of any passenger; every person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid, and being convicted of any such offence either by his own confession, the view of a justice, or by the oath of one or more credible witnesses, before any two justices of the peace, shall, in addition to any civil action to which he may make himself liable, for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding 5*l.* in case such driver shall not be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage; and in case the offender be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage, then any sum not exceeding 10*l.*, and in either of the said cases shall in default of payment be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding six calendar weeks, unless such forfeiture shall be sooner paid.” In a trial for perjury alleged to have been committed on a charge of furious riding under this section, Kelly, C.B. held, on the Western Circuit, that justices had no jurisdiction to convict on such a charge; and therefore there could be no perjury: Reg. v. Bacon (11 Cox Cr. Cas. 540), that, so far as it goes, is a direct authority in the appellant’s favour. The Chief Baron is reported to have said, “It is quite clear that the Act does not give the justices any power to inflict any punishment for furiously riding. The statute imposes a penalty only on those who furiously drive. This is, no doubt, a casus omisus, but it is not for me to supply the omission.” Similarly Cockburn, C.J. declined to supply an omission in the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 108); by sect. 9, the owner or agent of a mine or colliery, who in case of loss of life to any person employed in such coal mine or colliery, by reason of any accident, or in case of serious personal injury arising from explosion therein, does not send notice of such accident to the inspector of the district within twenty-four hours next after such loss of life is to be liable to a penalty. The appellants were owners of a coal mine in which serious personal injury arose from explosion. They did not give notice to the inspector, and were convicted for not doing so under this section. It was held that words had been omitted which were necessary to create the offence which the appellants were supposed to have committed, and that as those words could only be supplied by the Legislature, the appellants were not liable to the penalty: (Underhill v. Longridge, 29 L. J. 65 M. C.). In other statutes containing enactments of this nature the distinction between riding and driving is recognised and provided for: as in the Act for the more effectual prevention of cruelty to animals (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), where by sect. 29 “the word overdrive shall also signify override.” So too the fifth offence in sect. 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1840 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), is “Every person who shall ride or drive furiously so as to endanger the life or limb of any person, or to the common danger of the passengers in any thoroughfare.” [FIELD, J.—The 78th section treats of riders, drivers, and persons who are neither.] It cannot be said that driving a carriage means riding on horseback without express words to make it so.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

CLEASBY, B.—It is impossible to come to any conclusion on this point without some doubt, and I feel great difficulty in agreeing with my learned brothers that this was a right conviction. There are two alternatives which may be adopted in the construction of this section; either the conviction of a person riding on horseback is a casus omisus, or we must extend the application of the enactment beyond the words actually used. Both my brothers concur that we ought to interpret the section to include the case before us in its application, and I am not prepared to dissent from their conclusion. The question which arises is, whether the use of the word “driver” only in the part relating to the penalty, excludes its application to a person riding on horseback. If capable of being so read, the remainder of the section supports the decision of the justices, which made “driver” include a “rider.” The same word too must be applied in the same way to a person having no carriage or horse of his own, who interrupts the passage of another, or his carriage or animal on the highway; my brothers, however, think we may read this part of the section in a broad sense, and if so, it is certainly not unreasonable to do so. Although it is somewhat a strong step to impose a penalty by implication, and my doubts are not removed, yet I assent to the decision of the rest of the court.

GROVE, J.—I cannot say there is no doubt about the matter, but unless a large portion of this clause be rendered merely nugatory, the justices have adopted the only possible interpretation. The old-established rule is, that you must construe a statute grammatically, except when such construction leads to a manifest absurdity. I think the result would be an absurdity if we were to treat the conviction of a furious rider as a casus omisus. The section creates various offences, amongst them, “if any person, riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously so as to endanger the life or limb of any passenger.” The appellant is found to have committed this offence, but he says, although convicted of riding on horseback furiously, he must go in peace and cannot be fined, because a penalty is imposed only upon persons driving who commit any of these offences. The words immediately following those I have quoted relate to the whole of the previous part of the section, “every person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid, and being convicted of any such offence,” shall “for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, in case such driver shall not be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage; and in case the offender be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage, then any sum not exceeding 10*l.*” I cannot think that the word “such” limits the application of penalties only to persons driving their own or other person’s carriages. The expression is somewhat elliptical, but I read the words, “in case the offender be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage," to be a mere proviso that such an offender shall suffer a heavier penalty. All other offenders, including drivers who are not owners of carriages, are to forfeit sums within the lower limit of 5*l.*, by force of the earlier part of the sentence. Another view which may be adopted is that the word "driver" is used in a wider sense than that generally given to it, and that it includes a person who rides on the back of a horse, and may be said to conduct or drive it. I do not think any very great strain would be necessarily put upon the word if it were made to include every person in charge of a horse or carriage, and upon that interpretation also this conviction might be sustained. I prefer, however, to look at the whole of the section, and to apply the penalty to all offences mentioned in it; 10*l.* being the amount to which a person offending is liable if he is owner of the carriage by which he commits the offence, 5*l.* being the amount in all other cases.

[ARCHES.]

PARISHIONERS OF HATCHAM v. TOOTH.

FIELD, J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, not without great doubt nor some fluctuation of opinion. The object of the section is clearly the protection of persons passing along highways, and all the acts and omissions enumerated are rendered offences against the law, and persons committing them may be convicted. It would be an absurdity if a penalty were to attach only to a part of such convictions, and that would be the result of a strictly grammatical construction of the clause. I think, therefore, that the first interpretation suggested by my brother Grove is the right one; that, notwithstanding the words, "in case such driver shall not be the owner of such waggon, cart, or other carriage," the penalty of 5*l.* or less is imposed for every offence in the section, and if committed by the owner of the carriage which he is at the time driving, he is liable to a penalty of 10*l.* Ut res magis valeat quam pereat is a rule of construction better in some cases than to follow the strictly grammatical meaning of the words. The conviction will be affirmed.

ARCHES COURT OF CANTERBURY.

Reported by A. H. BITTLESTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before the Right Hon. Lord PENZANCE, Dean of Arches.)

PARISHIONERS OF HATCHAM v. TOOTH.

Mode of enforcing order of the Court of Arches—Nature and jurisdiction of that court—Public Worship Regulation Act.

A clergyman, who neglects to obey an order of the Court of Arches, will, upon application, be pronounced by that court to be contumacious and in contempt, and a direction will be given that the same be signified to the Queen in Chancery; whereupon a writ "De Contumacia Capiendo" will issue for the arrest and detention in custody of such person, until he shall submit to the order of the court. The Court of Arches explained to be a purely ecclesiastical court.

The Public Worship Regulation Act deals only with matters of procedure, and does not in any respect enlarge the jurisdiction of the Court of Arches.

THE complainants in this case were the promoters of a suit against the Rev. Mr. Tooth, under the Public Worship Regulation Act, which resulted in an inhibition issuing from this court against him, in respect of the irregularities in his conduct of the Church services which his parishioners complained of. Mr. Tooth having disregarded this inhibition, the present application was made to the court to enforce its order.

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. (with him B. Shaw), for the promoters, said that Mr. Tooth was guilty of contempt of court, both by reason of his disobedience to the order of the court, and also by reason of the disrespectful language he had made use of with regard to it.

Mr. Tooth did not appear.

LORD PENZANCE.—The parishioners of St. James's, Hatcham, who have promoted this suit, have at length applied to this court to enforce upon Mr. Tooth obedience to the orders which it has made. It cannot be a matter of surprise that their patience should have been at last exhausted; the only wonder is that it should have endured so long. But from first to last the greatest consideration has been shown to Mr. Tooth in his irregularities and breaches of the law; and even up to the present moment no inhibition has been asked for or issued against him in respect of those matters which, though they have been declared illegal by the Court of Appeal in the Purchas case, are the subject of appeal now pending in the case which arose at Folkestone. On all the points, therefore, in which Mr. Tooth's obedience is sought by the promoters of this suit to be enforced, the law has been already settled—no appeal is pending—and Mr. Tooth has not attempted, either in this court or by way of appeal, to uphold the legality of his proceedings. In this state of things the promoters of the suit require at the hands of the court the exercise of such powers as it possesses to enforce the decrees they have obtained, an application which the court has no discretion to refuse. But some misapprehension appears to exist as to what those powers are. It has been suggested that the 9th section of the Public Worship Act confers upon this court new powers for the enforcement of its decrees. This is an erroneous interpretation of the statute, the new powers given to the court being confined to proper facilities for a due hearing of the case under the new forms of procedure which that Act has introduced. The powers which this court possesses for the enforcement of its decrees are such, and such only, as it possesses as the Provincial Court of the Province of Canterbury. It need hardly be necessary to call to mind that the Provincial Court of the Archbishop is a purely ecclesiastical court; that as such it has no temporal or secular jurisdiction, and no inherent authority over the property or liberties of the Queen's subjects. And accordingly, from the most ancient times, the chief means at its disposal for enforcing obedience to its mandates consisted in a sentence of excommunication. The time, however, came when these sentences of excommunication were further enforced by the civil power by means of the King's writ De Excommunicatione Capiendo. It is not necessary to refer particularly to the statutes on this subject. As time went on, it was thought desirable by the Legislature that the sentence of excommunication should, except in certain cases, be abolished and discontinued, and the statute of 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, accordingly provided that the judges of the ecclesiastical courts "whose lawful orders or decrees have not been obeyed" should in future pronounce the person disobeying them "contumacious and in contempt," and signify the same to the King in Chancery, and that thereupon a writ De Contumace Capiendo should issue against such persons, and they should be detained in custody until they made submission to the orders of the ecclesiastical court. The civil power has thus been brought in to the aid of ecclesiastical authority, and the declining efficacy of the sentence of excommunication has been supplemented by a power of imprisonment entirely foreign to the original jurisdiction of a purely ecclesiastical court. Applying these powers, as I am bound to do, I have no hesitation in pronouncing Mr. Tooth to be contumacious and in contempt, for disobeying the inhibition issued by this court; and I direct the same to be signified forthwith to the Queen in Chancery, with a view to his imprisonment. Under ordinary circumstances there would, in granting this application, be little more to say. But the circumstances are not ordinary; for the jurisdiction of this court has been openly denied, and mischievous delusions have been propagated as to its functions and authority. In the case of Mr. Ridsdale, the first which occurred since the Public Worship Regulation Act, I made some observations on this subject, and I still think it worth while, for the sake of others (however little Mr. Tooth may regard anything that falls from this court), to point out in what those delusions consist. They consist primarily in the idea that this Court of Arches is a secular and temporal court, and not a spiritual or ecclesiastical one. Those who take part with Mr. Tooth conceive, as I understand it, that the only courts which can properly take cognisance of any irregularities in his ministrations, are the ecclesiastical and not the temporal courts and this, they say, is founded on an existing right in the Church of England to govern herself in spiritual matters, including matters of ritual. The Public Worship Act, they say, was an innovation and invasion of this right by referring questions of ritual to a secular tribunal. It would be well if those who maintain these propositions were to read the statutes by which the ritual of the Church of England at the time of the Reformation was prescribed and enforced—I mean the statutes authorising and establishing the two successive Prayer Books of King Edward VI. and the Prayer Book of Queen Elizabeth, which regulated the ritual of the Reformed Church for the first hundred years after its establishment. They would there find that a clergyman departing in the performance of Divine service from the ritual prescribed in the Prayer Book was liable to be tried at the assizes by a judge and jury (the bishop if he pleased assisting the judge), and, if convicted three times, was liable to be imprisoned for life. The interposition therefore of a temporal court, if any such were in question, to enforce obedience in matters of ritual, would at least be no novelty; the novelty, if any, is in the claim to be exempt from it. But suppose this claim, for the sake of argument, be admitted, what, I may ask, are the ecclesiastical courts to whose judgment Mr. Tooth, and they who act and think with him, would be willing to defer? it is not to be presumed that Mr. Tooth proposes to settle for himself, as the minister of an Established Church, how the Divine services of that Church, which are intended to be uniform throughout the country, should be performed. If he arrogates to himself this right, every beneficed clergyman in the kingdom has it also, and there might be as many forms of worship in the Church as there are parishes in the land. But if he is not to settle the form of worship for himself, and he considers himself bound by the directions of the Prayer Book, who is it that in his opinion ought to determine what it is that the rubrics of the Prayer Book enjoin? What is the court that has the jurisdiction to which he is ready to render obedience? Is it the court of his bishop? If so, he must surely be aware that by the ecclesiastical law of this country, as well before the Reformation as since, an appeal from the bishop's court lies, and has always lain, to the court of the archbishop—this Court of Arches whose jurisdiction he now denies. And not only so, but he must be further aware that for a long series of years it has been the practice of the bishops to transfer suits commenced in the diocesan courts at once to this Court of Arches, by the well-known form of "letters of request," and thus save the expense and delay of two decisions in place of one. To this very court, therefore, any proceedings against Mr. Tooth, had they been commenced in the court of his diocesan, might, and in all probability would, according to the ancient ecclesiastical laws of the realm, have come either by way of transfer or by appeal. If so, what question is there of a secular court, or an invasion of the rights of the Church? Let me make my meaning plain. Before the Public Worship Act passed, suits for restraining irregularity in ritual were commenced in the diocesan courts; they may be so still, though I often see the misstatement that these courts have been abolished. Such were the suits now well known against Mr. Mackonochie and Mr. Purchas. But these suits were no sooner commenced in the bishops' courts, than they were transferred, by the request in each case of the bishop, to this court, the court of the archbishop, to be here heard and determined. So that the jurisdiction of this court in matters of ritual is not only an ancient jurisdiction dating from time immemorial, as well before the Reformation as after it; but it is the jurisdiction, and the only jurisdiction, to which in modern times, and down to the moment when Mr. Tooth has chosen to deny its authority, all questions of ritual have been referred. Has, then, the Public Worship Act robbed this court of its claim to obedience in matters ecclesiastical? All that the Act has done is to arm it with new powers, and these only in the way of procedure. Can any reasonable man argue that the conferring of such powers as these, which did not alter or affect the jurisdiction of this court, annihilated that jurisdiction? The existence of these additional powers cannot secularise a court deriving authority solely from the archbishop of the province, and whose only secular feature is that of being presided over by a layman. But this again is no new thing: a series of distinguished judges who have presided here, in the last as well as the present century (and it needs not to inquire how much further back), testifies to the contrary, for they have without exception been laymen and lawyers. The chancellors or officials who preside in the bishop's courts are, with few exceptions, up to the present hour lawyers; and whatever objections may be felt by any to such an arrangement, it at least is no novelty, and has been the act of the ecclesiastical authorities themselves without any interference from the State. Mr. Tooth, therefore, denies the authority of the only existing courts in the kingdom which, subject to appeal, have any power to review and correct his proceedings; and I cannot consequently regard his claim to immunity from the judgments and orders of this court as anything short of a claim to be himself the judge of the ritual which the Prayer Book has prescribed. If so, there is nothing that I know of to prevent him from a still further approach to the ritual of the unreformed Church of Rome, if he can persuade himself that the language of the Prayer Book admits of it. With regard to the supposed libel on the court to which Dr. Stephens has referred, the court would, I think, be hypercritical if it saw in anything that he said a libel upon it. A court should not be over-zealous in vindicating itself against improper language or unjust charges. The true protection of all courts lies in the general estimation and respect in which they are held; and that estimation is not, I think, imperilled by anything which has fallen from Mr. Tooth. I have only to add that Mr. Tooth must pay the costs of this application.

[ARCHES.]

PARISHIONERS OF HATCHAM v. TOOTH.

REG. v. RYMER.

Innkeeper—Indictment for refusing to serve customer—Refreshment bar—Customer accompanied by a large dog—Traveller—Legal cause for refusing.

A refreshment bar attached to and under the same roof as an hotel, having a separate entrance to the hotel, the hotel being used for the accommodation of sojourners, and the refreshment bar for the refreshment of persons casually passing, is not a common law inn, and the keeper is not liable to the common law regulations of an innkeeper.

Seemle, also, that a tavern or shop where liquors are sold by retail merely, and no accommodation is held out for travellers or wayfarers, is not a common law inn.

A person living in the same town, 1200 yards off an inn, and walking about the town with a dog, for his own recreation and amusement, is not a traveller in the sense that he has a right at common law to be provided with refreshment and entertainment by the innkeeper.

A traveller accompanied by a large dog, which had been offensive on a former occasion, and of which timid persons and children may be afraid, has no right to demand entertainment and accommodation at an inn for himself and dog.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions for the Western division of the county of Sussex

The defendant was tried at the Michaelmas Sessions for the western division of the county of Sussex, for that he, being a licensed innkeeper, refused to supply the prosecutor with refreshments. There were several counts in the indictment varying the charge, some describing the prosecutor as a traveller, and others not; but otherwise nothing turned upon the form of the indictment.

The defendant was the proprietor of the Sea House Hotel, at Worthing, attached to which, and under the same roof and licence, and open to the street by a separate door, was a refreshment bar called the Carlton, along which ran a counter with an open space in front of about ten feet wide. The hotel was used for the accommodation of visitors desirous of sojourning there, and the bar for the refreshment of those casually passing by, the one being divided from the other by the counter in question, the attendants having access from the hotel, and serving from behind the counter.

The prosecutor, who was a householder, lived in the same town within 1200 yards, had been in the habit of coming to the premises of the defendant accompanied by two dogs; he had formerly three. One of the two was a savage dog, and generally wore a muzzle; the other of the two was a quiet animal. They were very large, of the St. Bernard mastiff breed.

On the 3rd March, after a recent visit from the prosecutor, the defendant wrote to him as follows:

Royal Sea House Hotel,

3rd March 1876.

W. Cramer, Esq.

Dear Sir,—I regret to have to request you will be so good as not to bring your dog or dogs into the "Carlton." The shop and mess this evening has been much complained of, and the dogs are as objectionable in the "Carlton" as in the hotel.—I am, yours truly,

JAMES RYMER.

And on the 4th the prosecutor wrote in reply to the defendant as follows:

Worthing, 4th March 1876.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your note of yesterday I will so far comply with your request as not to bring my dogs into the refreshment bar, or as you facetiously call it, the "Carlton," when they are wet or dirty, but otherwise I must be allowed to follow my inclinations as heretofore. The consequence of refusing a person refreshment without reasonable cause I need not point out to you, believing you superior to the general run of publicans; but I may add that hosteleries as well as public houses are placed under special laws, some of which tend to protect the public against the petty tyrannical, whimsical mad freaks or acts of individual landlords.—Yours respectfully,

W. CRAMER.

Mr. James Rymer.

On the 6th March the prosecutor went into the refreshment bar, leading the quiet dog by a chain, and demanded refreshment, asking for a glass of whisky, but was refused by the person attending the bar, by order of the defendant; the same occurred on the 7th and 8th, when he again went to the refreshment bar leading the same dog in leash, and taking it into the passage above described, and demanded refreshment, tendering the money in payment, but was again refused by order of the defendant.

On each occasion the bar was open, the hour was proper, and the order in itself reasonable. It was proved by other hotel keepers that complaints had been made of the prosecutor's dogs by their customers, and some of them had gone elsewhere in consequence, and that the prosecutor had been remonstrated with and himself admitted to one of the witnesses that "no doubt his dogs were a nuisance to the hotel keepers." It was also proved that other tradesmen in the town had complained of the dogs, and also that the dog in question had upon one occasion vomited on the door mat of a tradesman's shop in the town. It was not proved that the prosecutor was a traveller in any sense, otherwise than that he was walking about the town with his dog for his own recreation and amusement.

It was contended on the part of the prosecutor that by so refusing to provide him with refreshments the defendant committed an indictable offence. On the other hand, it was urged on the part of the defendant, first, that the prosecutor was a local resident and not a traveller, and therefore there was no obligation on the part of the defendant to serve him; and, secondly, that at all events the defendant was justified under the foregoing circumstances in refusing to do so.

I declined to stop the case, which ultimately went to the jury. I told them that prima facie the defendant was bound by law to supply the prosecutor, as one of the public, with refreshment upon his reasonable demand. That he could not select his customers or reject any from caprice or dislike, but that if the prosecutor insisted (as he did) upon being accompanied by his dog, which from its size, breed, nature or habits, was obnoxious to his customers and a nuisance in his business, he was justified (particularly after notice) in refusing to admit or serve the prosecutor.

The jury found the defendant guilty, and in answer to me said they considered the defendant was bound to serve the prosecutor, though accompanied by any dog, even a savage one, but they found as a fact that the dog in question was not a savage one.

The defendant was bound over in his own recognisance in 50*l.* to appear to receive judgment when called upon.

If the Court shall be of opinion that the conviction was right, it is to stand, otherwise to be quashed.

JOHN JAMES JOHNSON, Q.C.,

Vice-Chairman of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the Western Division of the County of Sussex.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

KELLY, C.B.—We regret that the case has not been argued by counsel, as the points raised are of very great public and general importance. However, they present no difficulty and no member of the court entertains any reasonable doubt upon any one of them. This was an indictment against the defendant alleging that he was an innkeeper and under a legal obligation to receive travellers and supply them with refreshments for their accommodation, and that he refused to receive the prosecutor into his house and provide him with refreshments, without any lawful and reasonable excuse. The case presents three questions for our consideration: First, was the defendant's house, or that portion of the house into which the prosecutor desired to enter, an inn within the meaning of the old common law, which obliges an innkeeper to receive travellers and wayfarers, and provide them with food, sustenance and accommodation; secondly, was the prosecutor a traveller on the occasion in question; and, thirdly, assuming this part of the house to have been an inn, and the prosecutor a traveller or wayfarer on the occasion, was there any lawful and reasonable excuse for the defendant's refusing to receive him and supply him with the refreshment he asked for? As to the first question, was this part of the house an inn within the meaning of the common law? The case states "that the defendant was the proprietor of the Sea House Hotel at Worthing," and, if the statement had stopped there, there could have been no doubt on this point; but it proceeds: "attached to which, and under the same roof and licence, and open to the street by a separate door, was a refreshment bar called the Carlton, along which ran a counter with an open space in front of about 10*ft.* wide. The hotel was used for the accommodation of visitors desirous of sojourning there, and the bar for the refreshment of those casually passing by, the one being divided from the other by the counter in question, the attendants having access from the hotel, and serving behind the counter." [His Lordship also here read the letters set out in the case in order to show that it was not the house or hotel to which the case related, but a mere shop or bar in which spirits were sold.] Upon these facts, I am of opinion that a shop or refreshment bar of the description like this one is not an inn within the meaning of the common law. An inn at common law is defined to be a place for the accommodation of travellers and wayfarers. A tavern or shop, or bar, where only liquors are sold by retail is not within the legal meaning of the word "inn," and the proprietor is not bound to comply with all the obligations of an innkeeper at common law. On this ground alone, viz., that the prosecutor is not an innkeeper within the definition of the term innkeeper at common law, it would be enough for the purposes of the case to say that the conviction could not be sustained. The second question is, Whether the prosecutor was a traveller or wayfarer on the occasion in question? Now the case states that the prosecutor lived in the same town, within 1200 yards of the defendant, and had been in the habit of coming to the premises of the defendant accompanied by two dogs; and on the 3rd March went into the refreshment bar leading the quiet dog by a chain, and demanded refreshment, asking for a glass of whisky, but was refused by order of the defendant. The same thing occurred on the 7th and 8th of March. It thus appears that the defendant lived on the spot, no matter whether a quarter or a half mile off. Now can anyone suppose for a moment that under the circumstances the defendant was a traveller? He clearly was not a traveller or wayfarer, but a mere resident in the town taking a walk and calling at this bar for a glass of whisky. It is scarcely necessary to say that it is essential that the indictment should allege that the prosecutor was a traveller, but there is the case of The King v. Luellin (12 Mod. 445), where an indictment against an innkeeper for not receiving a guest was quashed for not alleging that he was a traveller. The third question is one which might be attended with some difficulty in certain cases, but upon the facts stated here there is none. Assuming for the purpose of this question that this refreshment bar was an inn and the prosecutor a traveller or wayfarer, was the refusal to serve the prosecutor made on a lawful and reasonable ground? It appears that the prosecutor had been in the habit of going to the defendant's bar accompanied by two dogs, and had had three. One of the two was a savage dog, and generally wore a muzzle; the other dog was a quiet one; and they were very large dogs of the St. Bernard mastiff breed. On the 3rd of March, after a recent visit from the prosecutor, the defendant wrote the letter set out, and on the 4th the prosecutor wrote the letter in reply, also set out in the case; and then on the 6th the prosecutor went to the bar accompanied by a large dog of the St. Bernard breed, and though the jury have found that it was not a savage dog, still it was a very large dog. I do not wish to lay down any general rule upon this point, for there may be a case in which an innkeeper would be bound to supply a traveller or wayfarer with refreshment though he might be accompanied by a dog; but the innkeeper would have a right to say that he would put him into a safe place. I will reserve my opinion as to that till such a case arises. In this case, however, I think the defendant was not bound to admit the prosecutor as a guest. The innkeeper has a right to say that "the men, women, and children who are likewise to be accommodated, and are within this house, are likely to be disturbed and alarmed by a large dog, and I do not think that I ought to subject my guests to such an annoyance." Taking all the facts stated in the case together, I am of opinion that this was not such a dog as entitled the owner to require that the dog should be admitted into the inn as well as himself. I am, therefore, of opinion that the conviction should be quashed.

REG. v. SLADE.

DENMAN, J.—I also think that the conviction should be quashed. It is desirable to call attention to the definition of an inn, laid down in 4 Stephen's Comm. 271 (7th edit.): "We may remark here an inn, being intended for the lodging and receipt of travellers, may be indicted, suppressed, and the innkeeper fined if a traveller be refused entertainment by him without a very sufficient cause; for thus to frustrate the end of its institution is held to be disorderly behaviour, and therefore punishable as an offence, besides exposing the landlord to be sued for damages." Now three things are required to support the indictment by the common law: first, that the defendant be an innkeeper; secondly, that he refuse entertainment to a traveller; thirdly, that he have no sufficient cause for such refusal. This is an indictable offence, and must be clearly made out, and there must be evidence on which it can be reasonably found that the defendant comes within the three propositions to be established. Do these elements exist in this case? First, as to whether this was an inn; it is clear to me upon the evidence that although the defendant was keeping an inn immediately adjoining the refreshment bar, still, in reference to the refreshment bar, he was not acting as an innkeeper. I think that the refreshment bar was in the nature of a shop and not an inn within the meaning of the innkeeper's liability, as to which the law requires that people when travelling should not be kept out at a time when they require food, lodging, and entertainment by a capricious choice of customers on the part of the innkeeper. There must be a liability to do the act quâ innkeeper. On that ground I think the conviction ought to be quashed. The second point is correlative to the first point, and flows from the law applicable to that. The prosecutor was not a traveller coming to an inn to obtain hospitality there. He simply came and asked for a glass of spirits at a place where there was no such accommodation as an inn affords. In Burgess v. Clements (4 M. & S. 396)—an action against an innkeeper for the loss of goods—Lord Ellenborough, C.J. says "Now the law obliges an innkeeper to keep the goods of persons coming to his inn, caused hospitandi, safely; so that, in the language of the writ, pro defectu hospitatoris damnum non eveniat ullo modo;" and in the course of his judgment he says, "Now let us consider whether the plaintiff came to this inn caused hospitandi." The facts there were that a traveller took goods to an inn, and had a private room to show his goods to customers, and one of his boxes was lost out of that room. Lord Ellenborough said "An innkeeper is not bound by law to find show rooms for his guests, but only convenient lodging rooms and lodging. The innkeeper not being bound to find any more than lodging and a convenient room for refreshment, this does not satisfy his object, but he inquires for a third room for the purpose of exposing in it his wares to view, and of introducing a number of persons over whom the innkeeper can have no check or control, and this, as it seems to me, for a purpose wholly alien from the ordinary purpose of an inn, which is ad hospitandos homines. I therefore think that the prosecutor in this case was not a traveller coming to an inn, caused hospitandi, but a mere customer." Besides, the case states that it was not proved that the prosecutor was a traveller in any sense otherwise than that he was walking about the town with his dog for his own recreation and amusement. As to the third point. The finding of the jury that the defendant was bound to serve the prosecutor though accompanied by any dog, even a savage one, is a most unreasonable statement of the law, with which the jury had nothing to do. If a customer enters with a savage dog a landlord must have a right to protect himself and his customers against it. The jury, however, have found that this was not a savage dog, yet it was a large dog calculated to frighten small people, and we cannot leave out of sight what occurred on a former occasion with respect to this dog and its weakness on that occasion. I think, therefore, there was a sufficient legal excuse for refusing to serve the prosecutor.

FIELD, J. and HUDDLESTON, B. concurred.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to guard against being supposed to admit that a traveller coming to an inn has a right to take his dog with him into a room occupied by several customers. If one may do it all may do it, and as at present advised I think a landlord is justified in refusing to admit a traveller bringing his dog into a room so occupied.

Conviction quashed.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Monday, Jan. 29, 1877.

(Before P. H. EDLIN, Q.C., Assistant Judge.)

REG. v. SLADE.

Vagrant Act—Conviction.

A conviction under sect. 4 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83 (The Vagrant Act) which stated that the defendant "did use a certain subtle craft, means, and device" with intent, &c., is bad for uncertainty in not showing a conviction for an offence punishable by the statute.

THIS was an appeal against a conviction by a magistrate at Bow-street under the 4th section of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83 (The Vagrant Act).

MIDDLESEX Sess.]

REG. v. SLADE.

[MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.]

Ballantine, Serjt., Besley, and O. Mathews, for the appellant.

Staveley Hill, Q.C. and Cooper, for the respondent (the convicting magistrate).

The conviction was as follows :

Metropolitan Police District, to wit,—Be it remembered that on the 31st day of October, in the year of our Lord 1876, at the Bow-street Police-court, in the county of Middlesex, and within the Metropolitan Police district, Henry Slade is convicted before me, the undersigned, one of the magistrates of the police-courts of the metropolis, sitting at the police-court aforesaid, of being a rogue and vagabond within the intent and meaning of the statute made in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George IV., intituled an "Act for the Punishment of Idle and Disorderly Persons and Rogues and Vagabonds in that part of Great Britain called England"—that is to say, for that the said Henry Slade, on the 15th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1876, at No. 8, Upper Bedford-place, in the county and district aforesaid, did unlawfully use certain subtle craft, means, and device, which subtle craft, means, and device were that the said Henry Slade did then and there write on a certain slate then and there produced by the said Henry Slade, certain words purporting to be, and which he intended to represent to Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin as being, words written on the said slate by the spirit of a certain person then deceased—to wit, Allie, the alleged deceased wife of the said Henry Slade, to deceive and impose on certain of Her Majesty's subjects—to wit, the said Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin, then and there being, and for which said offence the said Henry Slade is ordered to be committed to the House of Correction at Coldbath-fields, in the county of Middlesex, there to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months.

Given under my hand and seal the day and year first above written at the police-court aforesaid.

F. FLOWERS.

Ballantine, Serjt., took a preliminary objection that the conviction was bad upon the face of it. The statute under which it was professed to be made was the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. The 4th section provided that any person pretending or professing to tell fortunes or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise to deceive and impose on any of his Majesty's subjects, should be deemed to be a rogue and vagabond, and punishable with three months' imprisonment with hard labour. The only material words under which the conviction could, under any possibility, have been supported—namely, "by palmistry or otherwise" had been omitted. The defendant was, in fact, now charged in a form in which it had never been suggested that he could be charged and in which no offence was disclosed. If the words "by palmistry or otherwise" were mere surplusage, the section was wide enough to cover every imaginable fraud, including cheating at cards, false pretences, and forgery at common law. In support of the argument that the section had no such operation, it was only necessary to quote the case of Johnson v. Fenner (33 Justice of the Peace), in which the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Justice Mellor, and Mr. Justice Hannen held that a conviction of a man for selling packets for a shilling in which he appeared to place a florin or half-crown, and, in fact placed only a halfpenny, could not be supported under the statute, although the defendant might be indicted for obtaining money under false pretences. In the case of Monck, which had been partly argued in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice, the words "by palmistry or otherwise" were inserted, which in this conviction were omitted.

Hill.—The words "by palmistry or otherwise," after consideration, had been advisedly omitted and he did not, at that stage of the proceedings, ask for any amendment. There were two modes in which a conviction could be correctly drawn, either by following the words of the statute or by setting out the means used to deceive, so that the court could judge whether it was an offence against the statute or not. In this conviction, instead of using the bare words of the statute, that the offence was "by palmistry or otherwise," the appellant was charged with using subtle craft, means, and devices, and it was then set out in extenso what the craft, means, and devices were, so that the court might see that the offence was an offence against the statute. The offence was cognate to palmistry. If he had stated it as "by palmistry or otherwise," the conviction would have been bad for uncertainty.

The ASSISTANT-JUDGE.—There could be no better illustration than this case of the justice and necessity of the rule that summary convictions must show upon the face of them everything required to give the magistrate jurisdiction, and that, therefore, in reciting the statute under which he acts, care must be taken to state it correctly, and not to omit qualifying words which add an indispensable element to the character of the offence with which the law authorises him to deal, and that, therefore, the facts themselves must be set out so that the court may judge whether they amount in law to the specified offence. The clause in the Vagrant Act upon which this conviction proceeds enacts that "every person, pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise to deceive and impose on any of his Majesty's subjects, shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond within the meaning of the Act, and be committed to the House of Correction, and there be kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding three months." The conviction, as the learned serjeant has objected, does not charge the offence in the words of the Act. Contrary to the general rule to be observed in this respect, in its statement of the offence, it follows them in part only, inasmuch as it omits the words "by palmistry or otherwise," which are of vital importance, being descriptive of the character of the craft or device intended by the statute. The reasons for this omission and for framing the conviction in its present form are not far to seek. If the particular description, "by palmistry," were applicable to the case, it was unnecessary to avoid it; and if the facts had been such as to bring the case within the meaning of the general words preceded by the particular description, it would be sufficient to quote the language of the enactment and then proceed to set out the acts and circumstances relied upon to constitute the offence. From either point of view the omission of these qualifying words occurring in the statute is significant of the difficulty felt in placing them in juxtaposition with the actual facts. Mr. Hill, however, contends that the conviction is sufficient on the face of it for this purpose. The court is of the contrary opinion. The word "otherwise" following the particular description or example in a penal statute must, of course, be construed in accordance with the restrictive rule applicable in such cases—that is to say, the means used to deceive and impose must be by palmistry or a craft or device ejusdem generis. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Johnson v. Fenner, referred to by the learned Serjeant is conclusive on this point; and, inasmuch as the conviction omits these essential and qualifying words, and then sets out facts which might possibly constitute an offence under the enactment had it contained no such qualifying words, but which might or would amount to no offence had the Act been properly set out, we think it is bad upon the face of it; and, as the learned counsel for the Crown has declined to ask the court to amend it, we must quash this conviction.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by W. AFFLETON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 22, 1876.

BROWN v. EVANS.

Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76), s. 102—Amendment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), s. 5—Clerk of the peace for the county—Clerk to the justices of the borough—Appointment of same person to both offices—Liability of appointing justices to penalty.—Qui tam action.
By sect. 102 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, the justices of every borough to which a separate commission of the peace is granted, may appoint a fit person to be their clerk. . . . Provided that it shall not be lawful for the said justices to appoint or continue as such clerk to the justices any person filling certain offices named in the Act.

Sect. 5 of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), repeals the disqualifying provisions of sect. 102 of the principal Act, and enacts that, "from and after the passing of this Act, it shall not be lawful for the justices of any borough to appoint or continue as their clerk, any, &c. . . . or the clerk of the peace of such borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, or the partner of any such clerk of the peace, &c. . . . and any person who shall in anywise offend in the premises, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 100l. one moiety, &c. . . . Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the justices of any borough re-appointing, as their clerk, any clerk of the peace, or partner of such clerk of the peace, of their borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, who, at the time of the passing of this Act shall be, or who shall not at the time of such re-appointment have ceased to be, the clerk of such justices."

In June 1845, P., who was a partner in the firm of P. and F., solicitors, in the borough of Newport, Monmouthshire, was appointed clerk to the borough justices. In March 1848, P., being still a member of the firm, was appointed, and acted as clerk of the peace of the county of Monmouth, and he filled the appointment until his death in June 1874. P., soon after his appointment, appointed F., his partner, deputy clerk of the peace, and from 1870 until P.'s death F. discharged all the duties of the office. Upon the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act 1861, the borough justices appointed F. their clerk, and he continued to act as such. On P.'s death F. was, on the 24th June 1874, appointed clerk of the peace of the county of Monmouth, and has continued to act in that capacity.

On the 9th Nov. 1874, the justices of the borough held a meeting, and passed the following resolution: "If, and so far as it may be necessary in accordance with the provisions of sect. 5 of the Statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, Mr. F. be re-appointed clerk to the said justices of the said borough." F. afterwards continued to fill the offices of clerk of the peace of the county, and clerk to the borough justices.

The defendant, a borough justice, took part in the meeting of the 9th Nov. 1874, and voted for the above resolution. The plaintiff brought a qui tam action against the defendant to recover the 100l. penalty under sect. 5 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, for appointing and continuing F. clerk to the borough justices, he being at the same time clerk of the peace of the county.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Division), that, on the true construction of the proviso attached to sect. 5 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, the defendant was not liable.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Exchequer Division giving judgment for the defendant on a special case stated for the opinion of the court by a judge sitting at Nisi Prius.

The case in the court below is fully reported 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 737, where the special case and the arguments and judgments are fully set out.

For the purposes of this report the facts sufficiently appear from the head note above.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. (with him Horace Wright and A. T. Lawrence), for the plaintiff.—The question is whether under the proviso in the 5th section of the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 75, the penalty can be recovered against the defendant for the re-appointment of Mr. Fox as clerk to the justices. The proviso was put in to protect the vested interests of persons employed as clerks to the justices at the time of the passing of the Act, or it was to protect magistrates from incurring the penalties for reappointing such persons as clerks to the justices. The proviso can only protect the vested interests existing at the time of the passing of the Act. Therefore Mr. Fox must have been clerk of the peace of the county, and clerk to the borough justices at the time of the passing of the Act in order to come within the protection of the proviso. "Nothing herein contained shall prevent the justices of any borough reappointing" means that the person who at the passing of the Act is clerk of the peace of the county and clerk to the justices (the latter office being vacated at the passing of the Act by his holding another incompatible one) may be reappointed. The magistrates can only reappoint once so as to be protected by the proviso. The words in the proviso "who at the time of the passing of this Act shall be, or who at the time of such reappointment shall not have ceased to be" must be construed as if the word "or" was "and." If not the proviso practically repeals the enacting part. They cited.

THE TOTTENHAM LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH v. ROWELL

[CT. OF APP.]

Jelf (Bodham with him), for the defendant.—The whole question turns on sect. 5. If this case comes within the natural meaning of the proviso, the court will not interpolate words. The section deals with the vested interests of a man quid clerk to the justices at the passing of the Act. It provides for the continuity of his office. The word "reappointment" would equally apply to a person who was clerk to the justices at the time of the passing of the Act, and afterwards became the clerk of the peace to the county, provided he always continued clerk to the justices. The proviso contemplates the contingent probability of the clerk to the justices becoming clerk of the peace to the county. The notice of action is not sufficient. It alleges an incorrect date for the re-appointment.

[As the judgment of the court (post) was for the defendant upon the construction of the section, it became unnecessary to decide upon the sufficiency or otherwise of the plaintiff's notice of action.]

Sir H. James, Q.C., replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment. Of all the instances of bungling legislation this appears to me to be the most remarkable. The proviso which comes in at the end of sect. 5 of the Municipal Corporations Amendment Act is in direct opposition to the former enacting clause, and entirely frustrates its operation. The only way in which it occurs to me that this contradiction in the Act could have occurred is that the framer of the bill was induced to add the proviso by a clerk of the peace. The words of that proviso are so large, so comprehensive and so positive, that I am unable to see my way out of giving effect to them in this case. If the object of the Legislature is frustrated, it is not the fault of courts that have to construe the section. Our judgment will, therefore, be for the defendant.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the proviso is evidently to indemnify clerks to the justices at the time of the passing of the Act who are clerks of the peace of the county, and the question for us to decide is, to what extent has this indemnity gone. Does the proviso mean that the justices may reappoint as their clerk any person who, at the time of the passing of the Act, was clerk of the peace of the borough or county, or does it go further and mean that any person who was clerk to the justices at the passing of the Act, if he afterwards became clerk of the peace of the borough or county, might be reappointed clerk to the justices? In order to decide this we must look at what the Legislature has said, and I think the latter construction of the proviso is the proper one. I have come to that conclusion, because the language of the proviso is that the justices shall or may re-appoint as their clerk any clerk of the peace, "who, at the time of the passing of the Act, shall be" clerk to the justices. But this is not the case with respect to clerks of the peace of the county. The Act does not speak of the clerk of the peace of the county as a person who "shall be" clerk of the peace at the passing of the Act. We are compelled to give one of two constructions to the proviso. We must either construe "or" to mean "and," or we must construe the proviso according to what in my opinion is the true meaning of it, that any person who, at the time of the passing of the Act, was clerk to the justices, might be reappointed as such, on his becoming clerk of the peace of the borough or county.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The proviso takes away the whole effect of the enacting clause, and is quite contrary to the policy of the Legislature in passing the Act, but the words of the proviso are so wide and so positive that I cannot escape from the conclusion that the defendant has acted within the meaning of it, and is not liable.

GROVE, J.—I have had considerable doubt in the course of this case, and that doubt is not entirely removed, but I do not feel justified in saying that of the two constructions, the construction given to the proviso by the Court of Exchequer was wrong. The whole section can at least be consistently construed, if the interpretation of Lord Justice Mellish be adopted. The strange result then follows that the proviso qualifies a person to become in the position, which it is the very object of the enacting part of the section to prevent him from occupying.

THE TOTTENHAM LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH v. ROWELL.

The Public Health Act 1848—11 & 12 Vict., c. 63, ss. 69 and 129—Local Government Act 1858—Amendment Act 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24—11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11—Paving and sewerage streets—Proceedings by local board in County Court to recover expenses—Limitation of time within which such proceedings may be taken.

The plaintiffs, a local board acting under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, on the 25th Oct. 1864, served a notice on R. (amongst others) requiring him to sewer, level, channel, and repair a street upon which property belonging to him abutted. R. not having complied with the notice of the plaintiffs, early in 1865, themselves executed the necessary works, and their surveyor made an apportionment amongst the different owners and occupiers of property abutting on the street of the expenses incurred by the board in completing the works. On the 18th Feb. 1873, a notice of the apportionment was duly served on R., stating that the amount payable by him was 13l. 5s. and interest, and informing him that unless he disputed the apportionment within three months it would be conclusive against him. R. did not dispute the apportionment, and after three months had expired a demand for payment was served upon him for the plaintiffs. R. shortly afterwards died, and on the 8th June 1875, the money not having been paid, the plaintiffs issued a plaint in a County Court to recover it from the defendant, who was R.'s executor.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court of Appeal), that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue in the County Court for the recovery of the money, as six months had elapsed after the expiration of the period of three months within which B. might have disputed the apportionment, and the limitation provided by sect. 11 of the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43, applied as well to proceedings taken in the County Court as to those taken before justices.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court of Appeal. The facts sufficiently appear from the head note to this report. The Divisional Court of Appeal (Cleasby, B., and Field, J.) gave judgment for the defendant, holding, on the authority of the West Ham Local Board v. Maddams, (a) that the plaintiffs could not maintain their action, six months having elapsed before the action was brought from the time that their right to sue accrued. The plaintiffs appealed from this judgment.

By the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis's Act) s. 11, it is enacted "that in all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint (i.e., a complaint upon which an order for the payment of money or otherwise can be made), or laying such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made, and such information shall be laid, within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose."

By the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 59, "In case any present or future street, or any part thereof (not being a highway) be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the local board of health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such part thereof as may be required to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, or channelled, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, or channel the same within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or, in case of dispute, as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case) in the manner provided by this Act; and such expenses may be recovered from the last mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided."

Sect. 129, "In all cases in which the amount of any damages, costs, or expenses is by this Act

(a) The West Ham Local Board of Health v. Maddams was heard before the Queen's Bench Division on appeal from the County Court of Middlesex, on 22nd Jan. 1876. The action was brought in the County Court by the Local Board to recover the defendant's proportion of expenses incurred by the board in sewerage, paving, &c. certain streets on which the defendant's land abutted. The defendant's proportion was settled in Sept. 1865, and the action was brought in May 1875.—Day, Q.C. (W. G. Harrison with him) for plaintiffs.—Grantham for the defendant.—The Queen's Bench Division (Blackburn and Field, JJ.), held that the limitation of six months within which proceedings could be taken by the local board before two justices (under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11), applied also to proceedings taken at the option of the local board in County Courts (under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24).

directed to be ascertained or recovered in a summary manner, the same may be ascertained by and recovered before two justices."

By the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 61), s. 24, "Proceedings for recovery of demands below 20*l.*, which local boards are now empowered by law to recover in a summary manner, may, at the option of the local board, be taken in the County Court as if such demands were debts within the cognizance of such courts."

11 & 12 Vict., c. 63, and 21 & 22 Vict., c. 89, are repealed by the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 55.), s. 343; but s. 261 of the last-named statute re-enacts 24 & 25 Vict., c. 61, s. 24, the jurisdiction of County Courts being extended to demands below 50*l.*

J. Brown, Q.C. and R. E. Webster for the plaintiffs.—The action was brought by the plaintiffs when more than six months had expired after notice of the apportionment had been given to the defendant, and after the time had elapsed within which he could dispute that apportionment. The question is whether the general limitation of six months mentioned in sect. 11 of the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43, applies to proceedings by local boards in a County Court, as well as to proceedings taken in a summary manner before justices. We contend that the limitation does not apply in the former case. Sect. 129 of the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 63, says that in all cases in which the amount of any damages, costs, or expenses is by the Act directed to be ascertained or recovered in a summary manner, the same may be ascertained and recovered before two justices. The six months limit applies there. Sect. 11 of the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43, applies only to all cases where no time is provided within which proceedings may be taken for the recovery of money before justices, but by sect. 24 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, demands below 20*l.* may be recovered in the County Court as if such demands were debts within the cognizance of such courts. The proceedings of the local board in the County Court, therefore, become the same as if the action was for debt, and such action can be brought within the time fixed by Act of Parliament—six years. The effect of the acts is that you may go before the justices to recover a demand under 20*l.* within six months, and you may afterwards go before the County Court within six years.

Manisty, Q.C. and Kelly for the defendant.—If the contention for the plaintiffs is right, a claim by a local board under 20*l.* can be recovered in the County Court at any time within six years, whilst a claim above that sum which can be enforced only before two justices, can only be recovered within six months. The true meaning is that, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 69, the local board must take proceedings within six months before justices, and under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24, they may, at their option, take proceedings in the County Court within the same time. [MELLISH, L.J.—I think there would be no option to go before the County Court when the six months had expired. The option ceases when the jurisdiction of the County Court comes to an end.]

J. Brown, Q.C., replied.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of the opinion that the decision of the court below ought to be affirmed. The very point which is now argued before us was considered and decided by the Court of Queen's Bench before this case (The West Ham Local Board v. Maddams (ubi sup.)). It was there decided that the six months limitation as to proceedings before magistrates applied also to the proceedings in the County Court. I should be loath to overrule that decision unless I was sure it was wrong, but, on the contrary, I am of opinion that the true construction of these sections of the Act fully bears out the view taken by the Court of Queen's Bench. It is the general provision of the Act that sums claimed by Local boards shall be recoverable in a summary manner before two justices within six months, and then there is an option given to the local board by a subsequent Act to proceed before the County Court instead of justices. There seems to me no sufficient reason why the general object aimed at by the Act should not apply as well to proceedings before the County Court as before the justices. The claim may be enforced in the County Court so long only as the remedy exists before the justices, but I am of opinion that when the time has gone by within which the claim would be enforced before the justices, the plaintiffs are also barred from proceeding in the County Court.

RABBITS v. COX.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the construction of sect. 24 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61. Before the passing of that Act, the expenses incurred by the local board in paving and sewerage streets were recoverable before two justices within six months and not afterwards. The jurisdiction of the justices was not then confined to claims under 20*l*. This being the state of things the Legislature passed the new enactment enabling local boards to enforce payment of claims under 20*l*. in the County Court. It is quite impossible to suppose that the Legislature meant by sect. 24 that claims under 20*l*. might be recovered at any time within six or twenty years, whilst proceedings to recover sums over 20*l*. must be taken within six months. That would be an absurd construction of the section, and we ought not so to construe it unless obliged to do so by the express words of the Act. What is said is that in order to recover claims below 20*l*. you may, at your option, go before the County Court as well as before the magistrates. I think the meaning is clear that as long as you could take proceedings before the magistrates to recover, so long may you go to the County Court. It follows that inasmuch as the right to go before the justices was gone at the time when these proceedings were taken before the County Court, the plaintiffs had lost their right to proceed at all, and could exercise no option.

RABBITS v. COX.

Land-tax—Exemption—Site of a hospital—4 W. & M. c. 1, s. 5—38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 29—42 Geo. 3, c. 116, s.

Plaintiff was lessee of land which was the site of a hospital existing before the Land-Tax Acts 1692 and 1798, but removed by decree of the Court of Chancery in 1849, and then discharged from the charitable trust.

The Act of 1692 exempted all sites of hospitals, and by the Act of 1798, s. 29, all lands previously assessed were to be liable to be charged to land-tax, and no other lands, tenements, or hereditaments then belonging to any hospital or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious uses as aforesaid, should be charged to land-tax by that Act:

Held that the plaintiff was not exempt from the land-tax.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of this Court by consent of the parties, and pursuant to an order made under the 46th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852.

This was an action of trespass brought by the late Edward Harris Rabbits, and now continued by Mary Ann Rabbits, his executrix. The said Edward Harris Rabbits was the lessee of certain land and premises hereinafter mentioned, and this action was brought against the defendant who is the collector of land tax employed by the commissioners of land tax for St. George the Martyr, Southwark, for seizing the plaintiff's goods, and the case is stated for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court upon the question whether the plaintiff was liable under the circumstances set out in this case to be charged and assessed to land tax under 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, and 42 Geo. 3, c. 116.

1. In the commencement of the 17th century the wardens and commonalty of the mystery of fishmongers of the City of London, being a corporation commonly called "The Fishmongers Company," purchased the freehold of a plot of ground at Newington Butts, in the parishes of Newington and St. George the Martyr, Surrey.

2. On the 28th April 1615, Sir Thomas Hunt by his will of that date, gave to the said company 20*l*. a year to build an hospital containing houses for six poor men free of the company.

3. On the 18th Nov. 1616, the company received a sum of 50*l*. from one Robert Spence towards the erecting of twelve or more almshouses for the poor of the said company.

4. On the 26th May 1617, at a court of the said company, it was decided to lay out 400*l*. upon the erection of dwellings for twelve persons, including the purchase of the ground. Out of this money the plot of ground mentioned in paragraph 1 was purchased.

5. On the 2nd Oct. 1618, letters patent were obtained whereby James I., on the company's petition, granted licence to the then wardens of the company to erect and establish in the parishes of Newington and St. George, in the county of Surrey, or one of them, one hospital or almshouse for the habitation and relief of so many poor people, men and women, free of the company, as to the said wardens and assistants of the said company, and their successors, should seem fit, to be called St. Peter's Hospital, founded by the wardens and commonalty of the mistery of fishmongers in the City of London, in the parish of St. George in the county of Surrey; and the wardens and assistants of the said company for the time being were incorporated by the name of "The Governors of St. Peter's Hospital, founded by the wardens and commonalty of the mistery of fishmongers in the City of London, in the parish of St. George in the county of Surrey, and of the lands, possessions, revenues, and goods thereof," with power to use a common seal and to hold lands, &c., and to make laws and statutes for the government of the hospital.

On the 16th Nov. 1618, Wm. Hunt, Esq., son and heir of Sir Thomas, in accomplishment of his father's will, granted to "the governors of St. Peter's Hospital, &c.," an annuity of 20*l.* to be employed as in the said Sir Thomas Hunt's will mentioned. This annuity was granted in lieu of the annuity left by Sir Thomas.

7. The governors of St. Peter's Hospital built on the land bought as aforesaid a hospital containing thirteen almshouses.

8. On the 23rd Nov. 1618, at a court of the company held on that day, it was ordered that there should be placed in the hospital at Christmas then next thirteen poor men and women, six of whom were to receive 2*s.* weekly.

9. Several other gifts have subsequently been made, under which the hospital has been maintained and increased.

10. Richard Edmonds, by his will, dated the 29th Dec. 1620, gave to the company a certain freehold tenement, in order that they might out of the rent, when sufficient had accumulated, build two almshouses to adjoin the almshouses of the said company, called St. Peter's Hospital. The testator afterwards corrected this devise by a codicil, giving the house to the Governors of St. Peter's Hospital, &c.

11. On the 9th Oct. 1626, these two almshouses were finished, and the almspeople were admitted into them and into another almshouse which had been then lately also erected by the Governors of St. Peter's Hospital.

12. Seven more almshouses were afterwards added to the hospital, which were erected by the governors at the expense of the company. The last mentioned ten almshouses were erected by the governors on the land purchased by the company, as mentioned in paragraph 1.

13. In 1636, the old hospital, as it has since been termed, containing the before-mentioned twenty-two almshouses, was completed, but it did not cover all the land purchased by the company as aforesaid.

14. On the 14th Aug. 1719, one James Hulbert by will gave all the residue of his personal estate to the company, to lay out so much thereof as they should think necessary for the erecting almshouses for the maintaining twenty poor men and women for ever, and the other part thereof was to go towards the maintenance of such poor persons and for keeping the said almshouses in repair, and for defraying the charges and expenses of the trust. The said James Hulbert in his lifetime, by a letter addressed to the court of the company, expressed a wish that his intended almshouses should be erected on a piece of ground belonging to the company lying on the south side of St. Peter's Hospital, and that they should be governed by the same rules as were then in existence for governing such hospital. The piece of ground referred to was the remaining portion of the land purchased by the company as aforesaid, but which was not occupied by the old hospital.

15. From this bequest twenty additional almshouses were accordingly built, making the number forty-two, which were maintained by the governors and company till the removal of the hospital to Wandsworth.

16. In the year 1848 the company purchased the fee simple of a plot of ground at Wandsworth, the land tax of which was and is redeemed.

17. On the 27th July 1849, the Vice-Chancellor of England, by an order made in a suit instituted in the High Court of Chancery, on the information of her Majesty's Attorney-General, on the relation of John Money Wrench against the company, ordered that the company should be at liberty, at their own expense, to take down the said forty-two almshouses, and to erect an equal number of new almshouses in lieu thereof, upon the piece of ground belonging to the company at Wandsworth aforesaid, upon the terms of the company being allowed to appropriate to their own use the materials of the almshouses so to be taken down, and to appropriate and hold the site thereof discharged from the charitable trusts to which they were then subject as aforesaid.

18. The company accordingly took down the said forty-two almshouses, and erected an equal number of new almshouses in their stead upon the said ground at Wandsworth, which new almshouses have ever since been occupied and used for the purposes of the said charities.

19. When the land at Newington had been cleared under the authority of the order mentioned in paragraph 17, the plaintiff having entered into an agreement with the company for a building lease, erected a messuage on a portion thereof, and on the 8th March 1860 the said company demised such portion to the plaintiff with the said messuage erected thereon to him for the term of seventy-two years from the 29th Sept. 1858, at a peppercorn rent for the first year, and at a yearly rent of 125*l.* for the residue of the term.

20. The land included in such lease, situate in the parish of St. George, and now in the possession of the plaintiff, is a portion of the land purchased by the company as mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 4, and which from the year 1618 to 1850 was held for the uses and purposes before mentioned, and such land formed a portion of the site of the old hospital which was erected before 1636.

21. Neither the said land nor the buildings erected thereon were assessed to the land tax until the almshouses were pulled down after the making of the order of the High Court of Chancery as before mentioned.

22. In the year 1852, a building agreement was entered into by the said company with one Robert Davis Rea by which the said company agreed to grant to the said Robert Davis Rea a lease of the whole of the ground purchased by the company as stated in paragraphs 1 and 4 (including the land afterwards occupied by the said Edward Harris Rabbits), and the said land included in such building agreement was in the year 1854 assessed to the land tax at an annual value of 600*l*.

23. The said Robert Davis Bea paid the land tax upon such valuation for the year 1854, but such payment by the said Robert Davis Bea was not made with the knowledge or by the consent of the said company.

24. The plaintiff was first charged and assessed to the land tax for and in respect of the said land in his possession in the year 1860. He always refused to pay the land tax which has been made yearly since that year. In the month of June 1871, the defendant acting as the agent and collector of the commissioners seized on their behalf the plaintiff's goods for the purpose of enforcing payment of the sum of 227*l*. 5*s*. 10*d*., being the arrears of land tax alleged to be due up to that time. The heading of the land tax assessment is as follows:

"1860-61. In the parish tithing or place of St. George, south division, in the division of Southwark in the County of Surrey.

"An assessment made for granting an aid to Her Majesty by a land tax to be raised in Great Britain for the service of the year 1860, in pursuance of an Act passed in the 38th year of the reign of King George III. intitled 'an Act for granting an aid to His Majesty by a Land Tax to be raised in Great Britain for the service of the year 1798,' and of another Act passed in the 42nd year of the said king's reign, intitled 'An Act for consolidating the provisions of the several Acts passed for the redemption and sale of the land tax into one Act, and for making further provision for the redemption and sale thereof.'

25. The difference between the sums of 125*l*. and 500*l*. represents the sum at which the commissioners assessed the annual value of the lands and houses now in the possession of the plaintiff over and above the rent reserved to the said company in respect thereof as hereinbefore stated.

26. The Act of 4 Will. & M. c. 1, which was passed in 1692, by sect. 25 provided that nothing therein contained should extend to charge any hospital for or in respect of the sites of the said hospital, and the 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 29, enacted that all such lands belonging to any hospital, or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious use as were assessed in the fourth year of the reign of their late majesties King William and Queen Mary should be liable to be charged to land-tax, and that no other lands, tenements, or hereditaments, &c., then belonging to any hospital, or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious uses as aforesaid should be charged to land-tax by that Act.

27. Sect. 25 of the said Act 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, provides that nothing in that Act contained shall extend to charge (inter alia) any hospital in England, Wales, or Berwick-upon-Tweed for or in respect of the sites of the said hospital, or any of the buildings within the walls or limits of the said hospital, or to charge any hospital or almshouse in England, Wales, or Berwick-upon-Tweed for or in respect only of any rents or revenues which on or before the said 25th March, 1693, were payable to the said hospital or almshouse, being to be received and disbursed for the immediate support and relief of the poor of the said hospital and almshouse only. And by sect. 26 it is provided that no tenants that hold and enjoy any lands, or houses, or other grant from the said hospitals or almshouses do claim or enjoy any freedom, exemption, or advantage by this Act; but that all the houses and lands which they so hold shall be rated and assessed for so much as they are yearly worth over and above the rents reserved and payable to the said hospitals or almshouses to be received and disbursed for the immediate support and relief of the poor of the said hospitals and almshouses.

The question for the opinion of the court is:

Whether the land in possession of the plaintiff is liable to be charged and assessed by the Land-Tax Commissioners to the land-tax.

If the court shall answer this question in the affirmative, judgment is to be entered for the defendant with costs.

If in the negative their judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for 227*l*. 5*s*. 10*d*. with costs.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C., with him Poland), argued for the plaintiff.—The intention of the Legislature concerning the land-tax seems to have been to give to all existing hospitals the benefit of exemption as to the land they then occupied. Even when removed to other land, that benefit is continued by the improved price which the exemption would cause the land previously occupied to have produced for the proprietors in each case. The words of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 29, are sufficient to preclude the plaintiff's liability in this case.

E. Clarke (with him Lyon), for the defendant.—

The case of Lord Colchester v. Kewney (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 253), was a decision of the Exchequer Chamber that no exemption attached to land devoted subsequently to the land-tax Acts to new hospitals. This very question was alluded to in the judgment of Willes, J., and the argument for exemption under such circumstances as these was said to be without basis as to its application to the point then before the court. Willes, J. said, at page 257, "First, as to the question of whether land used as a hospital at the time both Acts were passed, but since (as in the case of St. Thomas's Hospital) diverted to another purpose, must in its new use be taxed, it does not now call for decision. When it arises, it will probably be said on the part of the public, insisting upon its liability, that the reason for the exemption ceasing the exemption itself ceases: that it applied only so long as the land continued to be used in the state in which it then was. On the other hand it will be urged that the intention of the Act was to treat hospitals and other exempted institutions as having redeemed the land-tax, not only whilst they themselves used the land, but when they came to dispose of it. These would be the formulas which would have to be adopted as the expression of the two opposed views, but whichever view the court might adopt, it would not affect the present case, for it is obvious that no such considerations here arise."

. The Solicitor-General, in reply.

3 M

Jan. 16.—LUSH, J. delivered the written judgment of the court (Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J.).—The question in this case is whether the site of an ancient hospital which was in existence before the passing of the Land Tax Act (38 Geo. 3, c. 5), and was, therefore, exempted from assessment to the land tax by the express provisions of that Act, still retains the exemption, although the hospital has been removed to another site, and the land has, by a decree of the Court of Chancery, been discharged from the charitable trusts. The history of the institution is stated in the case. It will be sufficient here to observe that the hospital was erected and chartered before the passing of the 4 Will. & Mary c. 1, that it was considerably enlarged in subsequent years, and that it was maintained until the year 1849, when a decree was made enabling the governors to take down the forty-two almshouses of which the charity then consisted, and to erect an equal number of houses upon another piece of ground which had been obtained for the purpose. This was done and the land, the site of the old foundation, was let to the plaintiff on a building lease. We took time after the argument to look into the Land Tax Acts, and we have come to the conclusion that the defendant's construction of them is the right one, and that the land has become and is chargeable to the land tax. The 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, made perpetual as regards the land tax by c. 60 of the same year, is in substance a re-enactment of the 4 Will. & Mary c. 1. But it is necessary to go back to the older statute in order to make the sections of the later Act intelligible. The 25th section of the Act of William and Mary provides that "nothing therein contained shall extend to charge any college or hall in either of the two universities or the colleges of Windsor, Eton, Winton, or Westminster, or the corporation of the governors of the charity for relief of poor widows and children of clergymen, or the college of Bromley, or any hospital for or in respect of the sites of the said colleges, halls, or hospitals, or to charge any of the houses or lands belonging to Christ's Hospital, St. Bartholomew's, Bridewell, St. Thomas's and Bethlehem Hospital, or the said corporation of the governors for the relief of poor widows and children of clergymen, or the college of Bromley; nor to extend to charge any other hospitals or almshouses for or in respect only of any rents or revenues payable to the said hospitals or almshouses being to be received and disbursed for the immediate use and behoof of the poor in the said hospitals or almshouses only." The subjects of this exemption are, first, the hospitals themselves; secondly, the houses or lands belonging to certain specified hospitals, and thirdly, the rents and revenues payable to any other hospital for the immediate use of the poor in them. By the next clause, sect. 26, the tenants of hospital lands are declared not exempt from chargeability for so much as these lands are worth over and above the rents they pay. The 25th section of the present Act in like manner exempts these three classes of property, but with limitation as to the second and third class. It provides that nothing in the Act shall extend to charge "any hospital for or in respect of the site of the said hospital or any of the buildings within the walls or limits of the same, or to charge any of the houses or lands which on or before the 25th March 1693 (the period when the 4 Will. & Mary was in force), and belong to Christ's Hospital, St. Bartholomew's, Bridewell, St. Thomas, and Bethlehem Hospitals, or the corporation of governors of the charity for the relief of poor widows and children of clergymen, or the college of Bromley, or shall extend to charge any other hospitals or almshouses for or in respect of any rents or revenues, which on or before the said 25th March 1693, were payable to the said hospitals or almshouses, being to be received and disbursed for the immediate use and relief of the poor of the said hospitals and almshouses only." It will be observed that this Act, while it preserves the immunity of hospitals themselves, without regard to the date of their institution to the same extent as did the Act of Will. & Mary, limits the exemption as regards their sources of income to such lands, rents, and revenues as belonged to them on the 25th March 1693. The consequence is that hospitals erected since that period enjoy exemption from land tax as regards their sites, but not as regards any lands or rent which may belong to them as sources of income apart from the site of the hospitals themselves. And as regards ancient hospitals, viz., such as were in existence in 1693, if they have since acquired any additional lands not occupied as the site of the hospital itself, those lands are chargeable with the land tax. Hence the 42 Geo. 3, c. 116, contains provisions, which expressly enable governors of hospitals to redeem the land tax chargeable on the hospital lands. The 26th section of the Act in question, like the 26th section of the Act of Will. & Mary, makes the tenants chargeable for any excess of value over the rents they pay. The 27th section enacts that tenants who by the terms of their leases are bound to pay all taxes, shall be charged at the full value of their holdings. The 28th provides for settling disputes as to the lands which ought to be assessed, &c. Then comes the 29th, upon which a good deal of the argument was founded. It is in these terms "provided always, and be it further enacted that all such lands, revenues, or rents belonging to any hospital or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious use as were assessed in the 4th year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, shall be and are hereby adjudged to be liable to be charged towards the payment of this present aid, and that no other lands, tenements, revenues, or rents, whatsoever then belonging to any hospital or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious uses as aforesaid, shall be charged, taxed, or assessed by virtue of this Act towards the said sum to be raised &c., anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." This section, which it must be admitted is not happily framed, seems to us to be merely a corollary to the 25th section, and to be intended to emphasise the words of limitation we have just observed upon. For whereas that section says, that lands and rents, which were in 1693 exempted as belonging to a hospital, shall be still exempt, the 29th section adds what was necessarily implied, that all lands which were then assessed shall remain chargeable, and that lands which were not then assessed shall not be now assessed. It seems unnecessary to observe that both sections deal with hospital lands, lands belonging to or forming the site of an existing hospital. The land in question was the site of a hospital, and as such it was exempted by the express language of the 25th section until the erection of the new hospital on another site, when it became by virtue of the decree mentioned in the case, discharged from the charitable trust. So long as it was the site of a hospital, it was the subject of a special exemption conferred upon it in consideration of its eleemosynary character, but when it ceased to be so, it ceased to be within the 25th section, and fell under the general taxing clause. The act, as we have seen, does not exonerate all hospital lands. Why should it be supposed that the Legislature intended that lands once exempted from charge because they belonged to a hospital, should be for ever exempted though they cease to be hospital lands? There is not a word in the Act which shows an intention to perpetuate the immunity or to continue it longer than the land should be used for the special purpose in consideration of which the privilege was granted, nor can any reason be suggested why it should be. Our judgment is therefore for the defendant.

COLE v. MANNING.

Bastardy Act 1872, s. 4—Corroboration of evidence of mother—Admissibility of evidence as to circumstances prior to begetting of child.

On the hearing of an affiliation case, evidence in corroboration of the evidence of the mother is admissible, although the particulars to which such evidence testifies happened prior to the begetting of the child.

By the Bastardy Act 1872, s. 4, the justices, on an affiliation summons, "shall hear the evidence of the woman, and such other evidence as she may produce," and also any evidence tendered by the person alleged to be the father, "and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other evidence to the satisfaction of the justices," they may adjudge the man to be the putative father.

The appellant having been delivered of a bastard child in Oct. 1875, and having applied for an affiliation order against the respondent:

Held, that evidence of the appellant and the respondent having been frequently surprised together in the summer of 1874, was evidence admissible in corroboration of the appellant.

This was a case stated, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by Ralph A. Benson, Esq. stipendiary magistrate, sitting at the Southwark Police-court, in the county of Surrey, and the following are the material parts of such case.

The appellant had preferred a complaint against the respondent under the 3rd section of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), charging that the respondent was the father of a bastard child of the appellant, born within the twelve months next preceding the date of the complaint. The magistrate dismissed the complaint. It was proved at the hearing on the part of the appellant, and found as a fact that the said appellant had been delivered of a bastard child on the 10th Oct. 1875, and the appellant swore that the respondent was the father of such child, the connexion having taken place at the respondent's house where he had taken her on an evening in Jan. 1875. Of that meeting and that intercourse there was no corroborative evidence, nor was the magistrate satisfied with such evidence as was adduced of subsequent conversations between the friends of the appellant and the respondent. But it was proved to his entire satisfaction that during the summer of 1874 several months before the child could have been begotten, the parents of the appellant, with whom previously to that date the respondent had been on terms of great friendship and intimacy, refused him the house and quarrelled with him owing to their suspicions with regard to his conduct towards the appellant. They deposed that they surprised the appellant and the respondent together on more than one occasion; that the door of the parlour where they were was closed for a minute or two against them; that the appellant sat on the knee of the respondent, and to other circumstances which would have had great effect on the judgment of the magistrate had they occurred at or about the time the child might have been begotten. The appellant was rather of weak intellect, but there was no evidence of any similar misconduct on her part with other men than the respondent. After taking time to consider, the magistrate was of opinion that he was not at liberty so to interpret the words of the statute, "if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular" (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, s. 4) as to include evidence of the facts long antecedent, and having no direct relation to the actual begetting of the child, however strong might be the moral conviction that such facts might convey to his mind, but that the word "material" must be taken to imply a closer connection of the "particular" in question than was apparent in the case, with occurrences at or about the time when the child must have been begotten, or with subsequent words or actions of the respondent tending to fix the paternity.

The case concluded as follows: "If the court shall be of opinion that it was within my discretion and legally competent to me according to the requirements of the above section of the statute to hold the evidence above set forth as corroborating "in some material particular" the evidence of the mother, then I pray the court to remit the case for rehearing with their opinion thereon, or otherwise to make such order as to the court shall seem fit."

as authorities under the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 10 (which does not differ with respect to the provision as to corroboration from the Bastardy Act 1872) that the question was one for the magistrate to determine. They were stopped by the court, who called upon

John Thompson, for the respondent, who argued that the words "material particular" must receive a limited construction. No person would be safe if evidence dating so far back could be held admissible. [MELLOR, J.—That objection goes rather to the weight of the evidence than to its admissibility.]

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that the stipendiary magistrate has taken a wrong view of the law. He should have received this evidence, and judged of the weight of it. There is no rule of law to exclude such evidence, which might or might not be very material according to the peculiar circumstances of each case. Here it afforded material corroboration as showing an antecedent probability that the respondent was the father of the appellant's child.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case must be remitted to the magistrate for his determination, after hearing the excluded evidence. The object of the Bastardy Acts is to give a single woman the right of having her child maintained by the father. As the paternity is proved by the evidence of the woman, and as there is great danger in admitting the evidence of one single person against another single person in reference to that which is ordinarily secret, the Legislature has thought fit to require that the evidence of the mother shall be "corroborated in some material particular." But no restriction has been imposed with reference to dates. That the evidence would have been material if it had testified to facts happening between the begetting and the birth is not disputed. It is for the magistrate to decide whether evidence testifying to facts happening earlier is material or not.

VERDIN v. WRAY AND ANOTHER.

Voting paper, fabrication of—Prosecution by unsuccessful candidate—"Party aggrieved"—Public Health Act 1875.

By the Public Health Act 1875, s. 253, proceedings for the recovery of any penalties under the Act shall not be taken by any person other than by a party aggrieved. . . . By rule 69 of schedule 2, any person who fabricates any voting paper is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20l.

The appellant and M. were candidates at an election under the Act. A voting paper fabricated by the respondents gave three votes to M., who was elected by a majority of five votes.

Held (on a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), that the appellant was a "party aggrieved."

Per Lush.—A candidate would be a party aggrieved whether the fabricated votes turned the election or not.

THIS was a case stated by justices of the borough of Middlewich, in the county of Chester, and the following are the material parts of such case:

The respondents were charged with fabricating the voting paper of one Anne Dudley, who was entitled to three votes at an election for the office of member for the Wharton Ward of the Local Board District of Winsford. The information was preferred at the petty sessions held at Middlewich in the county of Chester.

There were only two candidates, the appellant and Mr. Moss. Mrs. Dudley's voting paper, to the fabricating of which one of the respondents pleaded guilty, was found when opened by the proper officer to give three votes to Mr. Moss. The result of the election was the return of Mr. Moss by five votes, the appellant receiving eighty-nine, and Mr. Moss ninety-four votes. The appellant having preferred an information against the respondents for fabricating Mrs. Dudley's three votes, the justices dismissed the information, being of opinion that the appellant was not a party aggrieved within the meaning of the 253rd section of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), which is as follows:

Proceedings for the recovery of any penalty under this Act shall not, except as in this Act is expressly provided, be had or taken by any person other than by a party aggrieved, or by the local authority . . . without the consent of the Attorney-General.

The sanction of the Attorney-General not having been obtained, the question for the court was whether the appellant was a "party aggrieved" within the meaning of the above section.

Gye, for the appellant, cited

Boyce v. Higgins, 14 C. B. 1; 23 L. J. 5, C. P.;

Hollis v. Marshall, 27 L. T. Rep. 235, Ex.; 2 H. & N. 755;

Rockfort v. Atherley, L. Rep. 1 Ex. D. 511; and argued that as the appellant's election might have been turned by the three fabricated votes being given for him instead of for his opponent, he was clearly a "party aggrieved."

Tickell, for the respondent, relied on Hollis v. Marshall (ubi sup.), in which case it was held, under the corresponding sect. 133, of the Public Health Act 1848 (repealed by the Public Health Act 1875, and substantially identical with sect. 253 of the latter Act), that where a party disqualified is returned and acts, a defeated candidate is not a "party aggrieved."

The COURT (Mellor, and Lush, JJ.), were clearly of opinion that the appellant was a party aggrieved. And Lush, J. said that he thought that a candidate would be aggrieved by a fabricated vote being given against him, whether the election would have been turned by such fabricated vote or not.

REG. v. EDWARDS AND STACEY.

Larceny—Diseased cattle buried in the soil.

Three pigs, bitten by a mad dog, were shot and buried on the owner's land three feet below the surface of the soil. There was no intention of digging them up again or of making any use of them, but the same evening the prisoners dug them up, carried them away and afterwards sold them for 9l. 3s. 9d. The jury found that there was no abandonment of the property in the pigs by the owner, and convicted the prisoners of larceny.

Held, that larceny would lie notwithstanding the dead pigs were buried in the land three feet below the surface.

THE prisoners were tried at the West Kent Quarter Sessions, held at Maidstone, on the 5th Jan. 1877, on an indictment charging them with stealing three dead pigs, the property of Sir William Hart Dyke, Bart.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. DRANE.

[C. CAS. R.]

The evidence was to the following effect: The three pigs in question having been bitten by a mad dog, Sir William Hart Dyke, to whom they belonged, directed his steward to shoot them. The steward thereupon shot them each through the head, and ordered a man named Paylis to bury them behind a barn. The steward stated that he had no intention of digging them up again, or of making any use of them. Paylis buried the pigs pursuant to directions behind the barn on land belonging to Sir William Hart Dyke, in a place where a brakestack is usually placed. The hole, in which the pigs were buried, was three feet or more deep, and the soil was trodden in over them.

The prisoner Edwards was employed to help Paylis to bury the pigs. Edwards was seen to be covering the pigs with brakes, and in answer to Paylis's question why he did so, said that it would keep the water out, and it was as well to bury them "clean and decent."

The two prisoners went the same evening and dug up the pigs, and took them to the railway station, covered up in sacking, with a statement that they were three sheep, and sent them off for sale to a salesman in the London Meat Market, where they were sold for 9l. 3s. 9d., which was paid to the prisoners for them.

The counsel for the prisoners submitted that there was no evidence in support of the charge to go to the jury on the following grounds: Firstly, that the property was not proved as laid in the indictment, as Sir William Hart Dyke had abandoned his property in the pigs; secondly, that under the circumstances the buried pigs were of no value to the prosecutor; and thirdly, that under the circumstances the buried pigs were attached to the soil, and could not be the subject of larceny.

The Chairman, however, thought that the case was one for the jury, and directed them as to the first point that in his opinion there had been no abandonment, as Sir William's intention was to prevent the pigs being made any use of; but that if the jury were of opinion that he had abandoned the property they should acquit the prisoners. He also told the jury that he thought there was nothing in the other two objections.

The jury found the prisoners guilty.

The question for the consideration of the Court is, whether having reference to the objections taken by prisoners' counsel there was evidence on which the jury were justified in convicting the prisoners of larceny?

If the answer to this question be in the negative, then the convictions to be quashed, otherwise affirmed.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

REG. v. DRANE.

Sentence—Penal servitude—False pretences—Previous conviction—27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2.

Prisoner pleaded guilty to an indictment for obtaining money by false pretences, and also to a previous conviction for felony charged in the same indictment.

Held, that the least sentence of penal servitude that could be awarded was the term of seven years (27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2).

On the 17th Jan. 1877, Mary Jane Patterson Deane pleaded guilty at the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, held by adjournment at Kirkdale, in and for the county Palatine of Lancaster, to an indictment charging her with obtaining money by false pretences; she also pleaded guilty to a previous conviction of felony (after another previous conviction of felony charged in the same indictment) and was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude.

By sect. 88 of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, the misdemeanour of obtaining money by false pretences is punishable by penal servitude for three years.

Sect. 7 of the same Act provides for the punishment of larceny after a previous conviction of felony.

Sect. 8 provides for the punishment of larceny after a previous conviction of an indictable misdemeanour.

But there is no express provision in the Act for the punishment of an indictable misdemeanour after a previous conviction of felony.

Sect. 116 of the same Act, however, which contains provisions for the form in which previous convictions are to be charged, is in these words: "In any indictment for any offence punishable under this Act after a previous conviction for any felony, misdemeanour, or offence, it shall be sufficient, &c. It is, therefore, clear that in this section the insertion of a charge of a previous conviction for felony on an indictment for misdemeanour is contemplated. Whether the words are sufficient to make such an insertion legal is a question for the consideration of the Court.

By the Act of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2, it is provided that no sentence of penal servitude shall be for less than five years, and that "where any person shall, on indictment, be convicted of any crime or offence punishable with penal servitude, after having been previously convicted of felony, the least sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded shall be seven years."

By the Act of the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, ss. 8 & 9, it is provided that where there has been a previous conviction of a crime, police supervision may be added to the sentence, and reference for the form of charging the previous conviction is made to sect. 116 of the Act of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, above quoted.

Under these last-mentioned sections, therefore, there is express power to charge a previous conviction for felony in an indictment for misdemeanour, but only for the purpose of sentencing to police supervision.

In the case of Reg. v. Summers (reported in L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. p. 182; 11 Cox C. C. 248), it was held that a sentence of penal servitude for five years on a conviction for a misdemeanour was right, a previous felony, though proved, not having been charged in the indictment. It will be observed, however, that in the case stated it is assumed that in an indictment for a misdemeanour under the Larceny Act a previous conviction of felony could be charged.

In the case of Reg. v. Willis (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. FLATTERY.

[C. CAS. R.]

p. 363; 12 Cox C. C. 192) (a), the case of Reg. v. Summers was followed.

The question for the opinion of the Court is whether the sentence of seven years' penal servitude was right, and if not what sentence should be substituted.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

KELLY, C.B.—The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2, enacts that "where under any Act now in force a period of less than five years is the utmost sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded, a period of five years shall, in respect to any offence committed after the passing of this Act, in such Act be substituted for the less period: and where under any Act now in force a period of either less or more than five years may be awarded as a sentence of penal servitude, the least sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded under that Act shall, in respect to any offence committed after the passing of this Act, be a period of five years: and where any person shall, on indictment, be convicted of any crime or offence punishable with penal servitude after having been previously convicted of felony, the least sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded in such case shall be a period of seven years." Where, therefore, as in this case, there is a conviction on an indictment for false pretences after a previous conviction for felony charged in the same indictment, the least sentence of penal servitude that can be awarded is a period of seven years.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. FLATTERY.

Rape—Consent—Fraud—Pretence of medical treatment.

A person who kept a stall in a public market, and professed to give medical and surgical advice, fraudulently obtained possession of a girl's person, pretending that he was going to perform a surgical operation to cure her of her illness. The girl was nineteen years old, and made a feeble resistance, and only submitted to the act of connection under the belief that the prisoner was treating her medically and performing a surgical operation.

Held, that there was no consent to the act of sexual intercourse, and that the prisoner was guilty of the crime of rape.

CASE stated for the opinion of this Court by Hawkins, J.

The prisoner John Flattery was indicted for a rape upon Lavinia Thompson at Halifax, in the county of York on the 4th Nov. 1876.

He was tried before me at the Winter Assizes at Leeds in Dec. 1876, and was convicted, but I postponed judgment until the next assizes in order to obtain the opinion of the court upon the following case. The prisoner, in the meantime, remains in custody.

Lavinia Thompson, prosecutrix, is nineteen years of age, and she is the daughter of and lives with Thomas and Hannah Thompson, who are labouring people in the neighbourhood of Halifax.

On and for some time previous to the 4th Nov. last she was in ill health and subject to fits. On the 4th Nov. 1876 (being market day at Halifax) with a view to obtain medical and surgical advice and relief, she went with her mother to Halifax to consult the prisoner, who kept an open stall in the market at which he professed for money consideration to give medical and surgical advice.

They went together to the prisoner's stall and there saw him, and in the presence and hearing of the prosecutrix her mother told the prisoner her condition as aforesaid, and that she was subject to fits, and consulted him as to a remedy.

The prisoner expressed a desire to examine the prosecutrix with a view to giving the advice sought, and requested the prosecutrix, and her mother, to follow him to the Peacock Inn, which was close by, for that purpose, and they did so.

At the Peacock Inn the prisoner put several questions to her mother touching the condition of the prosecutrix, and made some examination of her person. Having done this the prisoner not believing that the advice he was to give would be of any service to prosecutrix, nor intending, nor with any view to perform a medical or surgical operation, but solely with a view to gratify his lust and have that carnal sexual knowledge of her person which he afterwards had as after stated, fraudulently, and knowing that he was speaking falsely, told the mother in the presence and hearing of the prosecutrix that "It was nature's string wanted breaking," and asked if he might break it. The mother replied that she did not know what he meant (as in fact she swore she did not), but that she did not mind if it would do her daughter any good. At that moment the prosecutrix, in the prisoner's presence, had a fit and fainted away. When she came to herself again the prisoner, in the prosecutrix's presence and hearing, fraudulently and falsely repeated that nature's string wanted breaking, and added if that didn't do her good nothing would, and he again then asked if he might break it. Again the mother said she did not mind, if it would do her daughter the prosecutrix any good.

On this the prisoner said to the mother "You stay here and I'll try." He then went into a small adjoining room followed by the prosecutrix solely in order as he represented, and as prosecutrix and her mother believed, that he might perform the operation he had advised, which both prosecutrix and her mother, on prisoner's representations aforesaid, believed would probably effect her cure, and not with any intention on the part of the prosecutrix that the prisoner should have sexual connection.

In that room the prisoner put the prosecutrix on the floor and then and there had carnal sexual connection with her, the prosecutrix making but feeble resistance believing (as she swore) that the prisoner was merely treating her medically and performing a surgical operation, as he had advised, to cure her of her illness and fits, and submitting to his treatment solely because she so believed, such belief having been wilfully and fraudulently induced by the prisoner as aforesaid.

Unless such submission in law constitutes consent there was no consent to the prisoner's having connection with the prosecutrix.

(a) In Reg. v. Willis the previous conviction was not charged in the indictment, and therefore the proper term of penal servitude in that case was five years' penal servitude.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. FLATTERY.

[C. CAS. R.]

The question is whether under these circumstances the conviction was warranted in law.

H. HAWKINS.

Lockwood, for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. The case does not contain any statement as to whether or not the prosecutrix knew the nature of the act of connection. It is not found that she did not know the nature of that act, and that distinguishes this case from Reg. v. Case (1 Den. C. C. 580; 4 Cox C. C. 220) where the presiding judge directed the jury, "that if they were satisfied that the girl was ignorant of the nature of the defendant's act, and made no resistance solely from a bonâ fide belief that the defendant was (as he represented) treating her medically with a view to her cure, his conduct in point of law amounted to an assault." Here there was no such direction to the jury. In this case the prosecutrix might have been under the impression that the prisoner was treating her medically, and yet have known at the same time the nature of the act.

[HUDDESTON, B.—In the case of a person having intercourse with a married woman by a fraud which induces her to suppose that he is her husband, the woman consents to the act of connection, but not with the particular man. In Reg. v. Fletcher (Bell's C. C. 63; 8 Cox C. C. 131) Lord Campbell, C.J. said, "Campbell's case (1 Den. C. C. 89) seems to me to settle what the proper definition of rape is, and the decision in that case rests upon the authority of an Act of Parliament. The statute of West. 2, c. 34, defines the crime to be where "A man do ravish a woman, married, maid, or other, where she did not consent neither before nor after."

KELLY, C.B.—Where is there any evidence in this case that the prosecutrix ever consented to the pollution of her person? It may be that she consented to the act, knowing the nature of it, under a false belief, and that the case is a misdemeanor within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 40, but it is submitted it is not a rape. In Reg. v. Clarke (24 L. J. 25, M. C.; 6 Cox C. C. 412) where the prisoner got into the bed of a married woman intending if he could to have connection with her by passing for her husband but not by force, and the woman, believing him to be her husband, allowed him to have connection with her, it was held not to be a rape. Alderson, B. there said, "There is an actual consent obtained by fraud. If we held that to be a rape, the principle would not be confined to the case of wives and husbands," and Jervis, C.J. said "We cannot get over the decision in Reg. v. Jackson (Rus. & Ry. 487), and as far as I gather the opinion of the other judges we all think that decision is right." In Reg. v. Barrow (L. Rep. 1 C. C. 156; 11 Cox C. C. R. 191) where a woman lying asleep in bed with her husband was awoken by another man having connection with her, and as soon as she was completely awake she found the man was not her husband and awoke her husband, it was held not to be a rape. Bovill, C.J. said, "What was done was with her consent, though obtained by fraud. This comes within the class of cases in which it has been decided that where under such circumstances consent has been obtained by fraud, the offence does not amount to rape."

[MELLOR, J.—In those cases the woman consents to the act of sexual intercourse, here she does not. DENMAN, J. referred to Reg. v. Fletcher (Bell 63; 8 Cox's Cr. Cas. Res. 131) where having connection with an idiot girl incapable of giving consent from defect of understanding was held to amount to rape.]

The Solicitor-General (Bowen with him), for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. The prosecutrix, by the fraud and false representations of the prisoner, was induced and persuaded to allow him to touch and approach her person. There was not only no evidence of consent on the part of the prosecutrix, but the case states that she submitted to his treatment solely because she believed that he was treating her medically and performing a surgical operation, as he had advised, to cure her of her illness, and that unless such submission in law constitutes consent there was no consent to the prisoner having connection with the prosecutrix. We are now asked to say, because the prosecutrix was nineteen years of age, she knew what was going on and consented to a violation of her person. It would be straining the language of the case to hold that there was any consent to what took place under the circumstances. It was contended that it lay on the part of the prosecution to show that the woman did not know what the nature of sexual connection was. I know of no principle of law on which that contention rests and I am not prepared to say that if she did know the nature of sexual intercourse that would have been any evidence of consent; but here it is consistent with her evidence that the prosecutrix may have been under the impression that the prisoner was performing the operation by some instrument or with his fingers. I lament that it has ever been decided to be the law of England that where a man obtains possession of a woman's person by fraud, it does not amount to rape. In this case, however, there is no evidence to show that the prosecutrix knew that the prisoner was about to violate her person, on the contrary she submitted to what was done under the belief that the prisoner was performing a surgical operation to cure her of her illness. I am clearly of opinion that the prisoner was guilty of the crime of rape, and that the conviction should be affirmed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the language of the statute 13 Ed. 1, West. 2, c. 34 gives the true definition of the crime of rape. "If a man ravish a married woman dame or damsel where she neither consented before or after, ayt judgment de vy et member; if she assent after, yet the King shall have the suit." It has been argued that submission is equivalent to assent. Under certain circumstances that may be so. But in this case where is there any evidence of consent to an act of carnal connection? On the contrary it is stated that the prosecutrix made a feeble resistance. That is not consent, but it may be taken that she did not resist as she would have done under other circumstances, if she had not believed that the prisoner was performing a surgical operation. The whole case is summed up in the language of Wilde, C.J. in Reg. v. Case "It is said that as she made no resistance she must be viewed as a consenting party. That is a fallacy. Children who go to a dentist make no resistance, but they are not consenting parties. The prisoner disarmed her by fraud. She acquiesced under a misrepresentation that what he was doing was with a view to a cure, and that only, whereas it was done solely to gratify the passion of the prisoner. How does this differ from a case of total deception?" She consented to one thing, he did another, materially different, on which she had been prevented by his fraud from exercising her judgment and will." Here the prosecutrix consented to be treated medically and to have a surgical operation performed, and to nothing else, and in no sense did she consent to the prisoner having connection with her. As to the authority of Reg. v. Barrow, if a similar case should come before me I should take care to have it reconsidered.

REG. v. J. W. FOSTER.

[O. CAS. R.]

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case concludes "Unless such submission in law constitutes consent, there was no consent to the prisoner having connection with the prosecutrix." We have, therefore, to see whether there are any facts in the case which amount to consent in law. The mother and daughter were persons of extreme simplicity, and the jury have found that they believed the prisoner's representations. The words of the statute (West. 2, c. 34) are "If a man do ravish a woman dame or damsel where she neither consented before or after." There is one case where a woman does not consent to the act of connection, and yet the man may not be guilty of rape, that is where the resistance is so slight and her behaviour such that the man may bond fide believe that she is consenting; but that does not apply to the present case. Here the prosecutrix was entirely deceived by the prisoner, and he fraudulently obtained possession of her person, and it does not lie in his mouth to say now that she was consenting to the act of connection. I agree in the remarks that have been made upon the decision in Reg. v. Barrow, and I should be glad if it were reviewed.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. I accept the definition of rape as given in the statute of West. 2, and I think the limitation put upon the case of not consenting by my brother Denman worth considering. The circumstances in this case amount neither in law or fact to a consent by the prosecutrix. There must be a consent to the act of sexual connection. I can see no evidence whatever of consent to that.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The definition of rape as given in the statute of 13 Ed. 1, c. 34 was adopted by this court in Reg. v. Fletcher. Generally speaking it is ravishing where she does not consent before or after. In this case there was no intention on the part of the prosecutrix that the prisoner should have sexual intercourse, and no consent to that act. The prosecutrix submitted to the act in the belief that she was merely undergoing a surgical operation to cure her of her illness, being wilfully and fraudulently induced so to believe by the prisoner. I also should wish to see the case of Reg. v. Barrow reconsidered.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. J. W. FOSTER.

False pretences—Sale of spurious article as genuine—Simplex commendatio—Direction to jury.

Prisoner led to prosecutrix packages of what appeared to be tea, stating that he was a tea dealer at L., and that the article was good tea, at the same time producing a sample of good tea. When opened the packages were found to contain but one-fourth part of tea and three-fourth parts of noxious things. The judge left it to the jury to say whether the prisoner's representations were simple exaggeration in praise of the article or misrepresentation of a fact specific to the contract with intent to defraud.

Held, that it was not misdirection in not leaving the question to the jury whether the article was tea or not.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the deputy Chairman of the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Leicester.

James Williams Foster, otherwise James William Foster, was tried before me at the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Leicester, held on the 2nd Jan. 1877, for obtaining money under false pretences from Elizabeth Beckworth, the wife of William Bernard Beckworth.

The indictment contained several counts, but as all these except the first were withdrawn, it will be sufficient to set out that count only.

"The jurors for our lady the Queen, upon their oath present that James Williams Foster otherwise James William Foster, on the 17th Nov. 1876, at the township of Hugglescote, in the county of Leicester, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did falsely pretend to one Elizabeth Beckworth that he was a tradesman in the tea trade in Leicester, that he had good tea for sale, and did, then and there, offer for sale, and did sell to the said Elizabeth Beckworth sixteen paper packages, which he the said James Williams Foster, otherwise James William Foster, did falsely pretend were each and every of them composed of good tea, by means of which said false pretences, the said James Williams Foster, otherwise James William Foster, did then unlawfully obtain from the said Elizabeth Beckworth one pound, sixteen shillings in money, the money of William Bernard Beckworth, her husband, with intent to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact the said James Williams Foster otherwise James William Foster was not a tradesman in the tea trade in Leicester, and the said sixteen packages were not each or any of them composed of good tea, but each and every of the said packages contained a mixture composed of tea, sand, quartz, and magnetic oxide of iron which said mixture is unfit for food and injurious to health, as he, the said James Williams Foster, otherwise James William Foster, well knew at the time when he did falsely pretend as aforesaid."

It appeared in evidence as follows:

The prisoner is a hawker, residing at West Bromwich, in the county of Stafford. On the 17th Nov. 1876, he called on the wife of the prosecutor, who is a licensed victualler at Hugglescote, in the county of Leicester, and representing himself to be a tea dealer, residing at Leicester, offered to the said Elizabeth Beckworth tea for sale which he said was good tea. He had with him sixteen packages of what appeared to be each 1lb. packages of tea. He produced a sample of tea which appeared to be good tea, and he then opened one of the packages taking out of it a quantity and stating to Mrs. Beckworth "you see it's like that I showed you." Mrs. Beckworth eventually bought the whole quantity for 1l. 16s., that is at the rate of two shillings and three pence per pound, in the belief that it was good tea as represented by the prisoner.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. J. W. FOSTER.

[C. CAS. R.]

When the prisoner had left, Mrs. Beckworth opened the packages and found that in addition to tea they contained a mixture of sand and other stuff unfit to drink. Mrs. Beckworth communicated with the police, and the mixture was submitted to Dr. Emmerson, the analyst, of the county of Leicester, who found that the mixture was composed of tea, sand, quartz, and oxide of iron, and unfit for food or drink.

A week after the sale the prisoner called again at the house of the prosecutor, and being remonstrated with, declared that the substance was tea, and what Mrs. Beckworth took for sand was tea dust. He offered, however, 2lb. of good tea to make it up, which the prosecutor refused to receive.

The prisoner was arrested on a warrant, and while in custody had an interview with the police constable in his cell, to whom he stated that he knew he had done wrong, and that if he got out of this job he would lead a different life.

At the trial Dr. Emmerson, the county analyst, was called as a witness. He deposed that the mixture only contained twenty-five per cent., or one quarter in weight of tea, that the rest was sand, quartz, earth, and oxide of iron, unfit to drink, and injurious to health. He also stated on examination that he believed that the adulteration had taken place in China, and that the mixture was known in the trade as Lye tea.

On this the learned counsel, for the prisoner, appealed to me to stop the case. This, however, I declined to do, and the following witness was called for the defence.

Mr. Simmonds, who stated that he was a wholesale tea dealer at Birmingham, and had sold the packages in question to the prisoner. Mr. Simmonds stated he had purchased the mixture from the bonded warehouses in London; had paid 1s. 2d. per pound for it; and had sold it to the prisoner at 1s. 4d. per lb.; and that in his belief the packages as produced in Court were the same as those made up in his shop and sold to the prisoner. That he should call the mixture tea though not good tea; and though he should not drink it himself, as he could get better, he was not prepared to hear that it was injurious to health. He also said that he did not think that a hawker of tea, not being a scientific analyst, could have discovered the deleterious ingredients mixed with it as the county analyst had done.

On this I charged the jury that if the case were one of simple commendation or praise of an article and an exaggeration of its quality only, it was not a case under which the prisoner could be convicted; and that before they convicted the prisoner they must be satisfied that he knew what the real nature of the packages was, that it was not tea, but a mixture of articles unfit for drink; and that knowing the nature of the mixture he designedly falsely pretended to the prosecutor's wife that it was "good tea" with intent to defraud; that the question was between simple exaggeration and misrepresentation of a fact specific to the contract with intent to defraud.

The jury retired to consider their verdict, and found the prisoner guilty, and I sentenced him to six calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour; a punishment which I inflicted, because as I told him in passing sentence, the prisoner had previously been convicted and had suffered a like term of imprisonment for a similar offence, but the execution of such sentence was respited, and the prisoner has been discharged on recognizance of bail to render himself in execution.

The question for the Court to consider is whether I was right in my direction to the jury, or whether I should have directed them that there was no offence at law in the case as proved.

HENRY ST. JOHN HALFORD.

Silla, for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. There was a misdirection in not leaving the question to the jury whether or not this article was "tea;" and secondly, upon the evidence, the chairman should have ruled that no offence was proved to have been committed. The facts showed that this was tea, although adulterated and was known and sold in the market as Lye tea. In calling it good tea the prisoner was only using a word of commendation or it may be exaggeration. In this case there was no misrepresentation of any specific fact such as existed in the decided cases upon this subject. The following authorities were cited:

Reg. v. Kerrigan, L. & C. 383; 9 Cox C. C. 441;

Reg. v. Bryant, Dears & B. 265; 7 Cox C. C. 313.

Jacques, contra, was not called upon to argue.

KELLY, C.B.—There is no reasonable doubt in this case. The prisoner, by falsely representing himself as a tea dealer, and producing samples of good tea, prevailed on the prosecutrix to buy sixteen packages of what appeared to be tea. When the prosecutrix opened the packages she found that only one-fourth part was tea and three-fourth parts consisted of different things of a deleterious and dangerous character. It is said it should have been left to the jury to say whether this composition was tea at all. It was not merely false commendation on the part of the prisoner, but wilful and fraudulent misrepresentation, and the only justification for applying the term tea to it is that it is believed to be an article adulterated in China, and known in the trade as Lye tea, which means the dregs of tea, and if it had been so called no one would buy it. The only question is whether the prisoner's representations were mere commendation of the article or false pretences. It appears that the prisoner represented himself as a tea dealer at Leicester, whereas he was only a hawker; he represented this article as good tea, and showed at the same time samples of good tea, whereas the article when opened was found to contain three-fourth parts of noxious things which rendered the article totally different from tea. The case was left very properly to the jury, with this direction, that if the prisoner's representations were mere simple commendation and exaggeration of the quality of the article, they were not to find him guilty of false pretences, and that before they convicted him they were to be satisfied that he knew what the real nature of the packages was—that it was not tea but a mixture of articles unfit to drink, and that knowing the nature of the mixture, he designedly and falsely pretended to the prosecutor's wife that it was good tea, with intent to defraud; that the question was between simple exaggeration and misrepresentation of a fact specific to the contract with intent to defraud. If the mixture had consisted of nine-tenths of tea, and a small portion only of other ingredients, the case might have been different. The prisoner seemed to have been quite aware that it was a fraud, for after his arrest he stated to the constable that he knew he had done wrong, and that if he got out of this job he would lead a different life. The conviction must, therefore, be affirmed.

C. CAS. R.]

The rest of the COURT were of the same opinion.
Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. W. E. KENNY.

Stealing and receiving—Husband and wife—Adultery.

The prisoner, while living in adultery with the prosecutor's wife, was found in possession of prosecutor's property, and thereupon indicted and convicted for receiving the property well knowing it to have been stolen. Upon the facts it appeared that no other person than prosecutor's wife could have stolen the property.

Held, that the conviction for receiving could not be sustained, as a wife cannot steal her husband's property.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of Chester.

At the quarter sessions for the city and borough of Chester and county of the same city, held before me, on Monday, the 8th Jan. 1877, William Edward Kenny was tried upon an indictment which charged him in the first count with stealing, on the 26th Aug. 1876, certain money to the amount of 143*l.*, one purse, one silver watch, one child's cloak, one scarf, one American box, one prayer book, two money bags, and other articles of the moneys, goods, and chattels of Edward Gurn; and in the second count with feloniously receiving on the day and year aforesaid the moneys, goods, and chattels aforesaid, well knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen.

The following was the evidence:

Edward Gurn.—I am an innkeeper at Burslem. On the 23rd June 1876, my wife left my house without my knowledge or consent. The same night I missed 143 sovereigns. The money was in a bag. This bag (produced) is it. There was another bag without money in it. This (produced) is it. This watch (produced) is mine. My wife wore it sometimes. I gave her no permission to take it or any of the things. This prayer book (produced) is mine. These three sheets (produced) I believe to be mine. Four were missing after my wife left. This bed cover, baby's cloak, scarf, and this American box (all produced) are mine. The money I saw safe on the morning of the 23rd June. I was saving it to buy horses in Ireland. Three days after my wife left, I saw the prisoner. He came to my house. A week after that he came again, and asked me how much money my wife took. I told him 15*l.* or 20*l.* I told him that because I wanted some information from him. I accused him of being out car driving with my wife on the Sunday before. He denied it. The prisoner left the neighbourhood shortly after and I heard no more of him or my wife till October when I went to Ireland with a police officer. I found them together at Belfast. They were in a back room packing a box. The prisoner was packing it. It was my American box. I saw some of the contents of the box. My prayer book was in it and the child's cloak. The bed cover was in the prisoner's box. I saw the prisoner searched, he was wearing my watch.

Cross-examined.—I sometimes wore the watch, so did my wife. I had another. I wore both as I liked. My wife deposited over 100*l.* with a Mr. Jackson at Cheadle, eighteen months before. She did not do that when I had a woman Sherlock in the house. Nothing of the sort took place. My wife was in court at Tunstall. She did not give evidence. The gold was looked up in a drawer, I had the key in my pocket, and she must have got another.

Re-examined.—She took the 100*l.* to Jackson against my will. It was my money. I wrote to him for it, and he sent me a cheque, which I cashed, and this was part of the 143*l.*

James Dodd.—I am a sergeant, Staffordshire Police. The prisoner was in that force until the 24th July last, stationed at Burslem. He had not much money. His wages were 2*s.* per week. I heard of him borrowing from his comrades. He was a single man. I went with prosecutor to Belfast in October. We found the prisoner and the prosecutor's wife there together. He was wearing this watch (produced). I found on him in these two bags (produced) 98*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*

Cross-examined.—There were four Irish li. notes in the money. The bags were in his pockets. All the other things (except the watch) were in the boxes and in the rooms occupied by the prisoner and Mrs. Gurn.

Re-examined.—The prisoner was packing the box in which I found the bed cover.

Harriet Upton.—[Evidence of inability to travel arising from illness having been duly given, the deposition of this witness before the magistrates was read as follows:]

I am a single woman and live at 10, Paradise-row, Chester, I know the prisoner. I recollect him coming to my house early in the month of August last. It would be about one in the morning. Previously to his coming a lady had been lodging in my house about six weeks. She gave me the name of Mrs. Burslem. The photograph now produced is the photograph of the lady. Mrs. Burslem opened the door for the prisoner when he came. They occupied the same bed room that night and left at ten o'clock the night following. I see the American box produced. The prisoner assisted in moving the box down stairs, and from the house. Since the prisoner and Mrs. Burslem left, I have had a letter asking me to visit them. It came from Belfast. There was only one bed in that room.

Edward Gurn, the prosecutor, recalled.—The photograph now produced to me is the photograph of my wife.

Upon this evidence the counsel for the prosecution relied on the second count of the indictment and contended on the authority of the cases of Reg. v. Deer (L. & C. 240; 9 Cox C. C. 225) and Reg. v. Featherstone (Deares. C. C. 369; 6 Cox C. C. 376) that the wife by adultery with the prisoner in August at Chester "determined her quality of wife," and in then converting her husband's goods to her own use was guilty of larceny; and that the prisoner consequently could be guilty of receiving.

The prisoner's counsel argued that a wife cannot be guilty of larceny of her husband's goods, and that there is no decided case to that effect, the case of Reg. v. Deer being open to the inference that the receiving was from some person other than the wife, and he further contended that there was no sufficient distinct possession of the property by the prisoner (at all events, in the city of Chester, and within the jurisdiction of this court of quarter sessions) to render the prisoner liable to conviction as a receiver. He cited R. v. Rosenberg (1 Car. & Kir. 233) and R. v. Prince (11 Cox C. C. 145).

Having regard to the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 96 which renders a receiver liable to be indicted wherever the principal felon might be indicted, I left the case to the jury, adopting the view taken by the counsel for the prosecution.

Under these circumstances the jury found the prisoner guilty of felonious receiving, and I postponed the sentence until the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases could be taken and offered to take bail for the appearance of the prisoner to receive judgment.

REG. v. W. E. KENNY.

[C. CAS. B.]

I respectfully refer the Court to the cases enumerated in the note to the case of Reg. v. Mutters (L. & C. 511), and I request the opinion of the court as to whether the conviction is right.

HORATIO LLOYD, Recorder of Chester.

F. C. Marshall, for the prisoner.—The prisoner ought not to have been found guilty of receiving. There is no ground for saying that the goods were stolen by anyone else than the prosecutor's wife, and a wife cannot commit larceny of her husband's goods. The case of Reg. v. Deer (L. & C. 240; 9 Cox C. C. 225) seems to support the view that an adulterer may be convicted of feloniously receiving property taken by a wife, when she leaves her husband's house, but there it was consistent with the facts that some other person might have stolen the property, as the wife when she left home had only a small bundle with her, and the prisoner was found in possession of property belonging to the husband of a bulk and weight which could not have been in the bundle. [DENMAN, J. referred to the report of the case in 32 L. J. 33, M. C. where Pollock, C.B. is reported to have said, "It is clear that all these things could not have been taken away by the prosecutor's wife when she left, as the bundle she carried was not sufficiently large to contain them. We think there was evidence which warranted the jury in drawing the inference they have drawn."] Reg. v. Featherstone (Dears. 369; 6 Cox C. C. 376) is a decision in which the adulterer was found guilty of stealing money carried off by a wife from her husband's house. Lord Campbell, C.J. is reported to have said in that case, "The general rule of law is that a wife cannot be found guilty of larceny for stealing the goods of her husband, and that is upon the principle that the husband and wife are in the eye of the law one person, but this rule is properly and reasonably qualified when she becomes an adulteress. She thereby determines her quality of wife, and her property in her husband's goods ceases. The prisoner was her accomplice, and the jury found that he assisted her, and took the sovereigns, knowing that she had taken them without her husband's consent." So in Reg. v. Mutters (L. & C. 511; 10 Cox C. C. 50) it was held that a servant who assisted a wife in taking away the husband's property with the intention of carrying on an adulterous intercourse, is guilty of larceny. If, therefore, the wife could not steal the property, no one else could. The prisoner could not be convicted of receiving the property knowing it to have been stolen. Secondly, the venue is laid in Chester, and there was no evidence to show any receiving by the prisoner in Chester to give jurisdiction: (Reg. v. Prince, 11 Cox C. C. 145.) On this ground also the conviction was wrong.

Rose, for the prosecution.—The indictment only charges the prisoner with feloniously receiving the husband's goods; it does not aver that they were stolen by the wife; and the venue is Chester. On Upton's evidence the prisoner was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with the prosecutor's wife, and in possession of his property at Chester. The principle is laid down by Lord Campbell, C.J. in Reg. v. Featherstone, "It is said in 1 Russ. on Crimes, 23, that a stranger cannot commit larceny of the husband's goods by the delivery of the wife, but a distinction is pointed out where he is her adulterer." In Dalton, 353, it is said, "but it should be observed that if the wife should steal the goods of her husband, and deliver them to B., who, knowing it, carries them away, B. being the adulterer of the wife, this, according to a very good opinion, would be felony in B., for in such case no consent of the husband can be presumed." [DENMAN, J.—The report of the case in 23 L. J. 128, M. C. is obviously more correct. Lord Campbell, C.J. is there reported to have said, "The general rule is that a wife cannot be convicted of larceny by stealing the goods of her husband. It is no larceny in her to carry away her husband's goods, as husband and wife are one person in the eye of the law. But the law has properly qualified that rule by saying that if a wife commit adultery, and then steal the goods of her husband with the adulterer, she has determined her quality of wife, and is no longer looked upon as having any property in the goods, and the person who assists her is guilty of larceny. I think the case of the prisoner must be considered as if he had taken the goods himself. This is not the case of a receiving of the goods from the wife, but the prisoner is supposed actually to have assisted her in taking them."] There is evidence from which it may be inferred that the prisoner was an accessory before the fact to the stealing by the wife, and the finding that he was a receiver may be sustained Reg. v. Hughes (29 L. J. 17, M. C.; 8 Cox C. C. 278. [LUSH, J.—How can the dictum that the act of adultery changes the status of the wife be maintained? Lord Coke, in 3 Inst. 110, says, "The wife cannot steal the goods of her husband, for they be not the goods of another, for the husband and wife are one person in law, duas animas in carne uno." Does not the unity of person remain until the marriage tie is dissolved. They remain one person, and neither can steal from the other.]

KELLY, C.B.—I am of the opinion that the conviction must be quashed. This is not a case of stealing, but the prisoner has been convicted of receiving the property well knowing it to have been stolen. It may well be that when a wife has taken away the goods of her husband with a view to an ulterior adulterous intercourse, and her adulterer has participated in the act of taking them away, he may be indicted for larceny. This view seems to have passed through the mind of Lord Campbell, C.J. in Reg. v. Featherstone, but there is nothing in that case to show that a wife can be indicted for stealing the property of her husband. In the present case the prisoner is not convicted for stealing the property of the husband, and it is possible, if he had been, the question might have arisen whether he could have been convicted upon the evidence. I am far from saying that he could not. That is not the case here; but the prisoner has been convicted of receiving, and the case fails in showing that the property could have been stolen by any other person than the prosecutor's wife. By the law of England a wife cannot steal her husband's property. If the wife has not stolen the property, there was no evidence of the property having been stolen at all, and therefore the conviction of the prisoner, for receiving the property well knowing it to be stolen, cannot be sustained.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree

[CT. OF APP.]

GRIFFITH AND WIFE v. TAYLOR; THATCHER v. TAYLOR.

that it cannot be said that the wife stole the property, and therefore, under the circumstances in this case, there was no evidence that the prisoner received the property well knowing it to have been stolen. With respect to the cases of Reg. v. Deer and Reg. v. Featherstone, the reports in the Law Journal show that they may be sustained in law on reasonable grounds. But those grounds are against the prosecution in this case.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The property if stolen in this case must have been stolen by the wife. It is admitted that the wife did not steal the property when she left Burslem, as a wife cannot steal her husband's property, and they are one person in the eye of the law, and neither can be a witness for or against the other in criminal proceedings. At what time, then, did she become a thief? It is said when she became an adulteress. But how can that be? Adultery affords ground for a divorce, but the mere act of adultery does not make a difference in the status of husband and wife per se, and constitute the wife a thief if she afterwards takes away her husband's property. Therefore, if the property was not stolen by the wife in this case, the prisoner could not be guilty of receiving it well knowing it to be stolen.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. Even the finding of the jury in the Divorce Court that a wife has committed adultery does not alter the status of husband and wife; there must be a decree of the court to effect that. In Needham v. Bremner (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 583; 35 L. J. 313, C. P.) where in a divorce suit both husband and wife had been found guilty of adultery, and the suit was dismissed, Erle, C.J. said that the judgment in the Divorce Court did not alter the status of the defendant's wife, but she continued to be his wife notwithstanding the jury thought she had done wrong. Therefore, although the verdict in such divorce suit might, as between the same parties be binding and conclusive, it certainly would not as between other parties. That being so, the wife could not steal the property, and therefore the prisoner could not be guilty of receiving the property well knowing it to have been stolen.

Conviction quashed.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 6 and 7, 1876.

(Before COCKBURN C.J. and BRAMWELL and AMPHLETT, JJ.A.)

GRIFFITH AND WIFE v. TAYLOR; THATCHER v. TAYLOR.

Action for false imprisonment—Notice of action—Immediate arrest—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 103, 113.

In an action for false imprisonment for giving a person into custody on a charge of larceny the question whether plaintiff has been "immediately apprehended" within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 103, so as to entitle defendant to notice of action under s. 113, depends on the circumstances of the particular case, and ought to be left to the jury.

Defendant found a box of his at Reading station, in the railway carriage in which plaintiffs were. He wished to arrest plaintiffs on the charge of stealing the box, but the station-master refused to detain the train. Defendant telegraphed from Reading, and had plaintiffs arrested on their arrival in London. Plaintiffs sued for false imprisonment. No notice of action was given, and the verdict was entered for defendant on the plea of not guilty, by statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 103, 113.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Common Pleas Division), that the question whether the arrest was immediate or not depended on the particular circumstances, and ought to have been left to the jury, and there must be a new trial.

APPEAL from the decision of the Common Pleas Division.

These were two actions for false imprisonment, and the facts in both cases being the same they were tried together. The plaintiffs in the two actions, Mrs. Griffith and her sister Miss Thatcher, who were public singers, had been singing at a foresters' fête at Haddington Hall, near Oxford, and were returning to London by an evening train, accompanied by four other persons; they got into a third class carriage at Oxford. The defendant, who was travelling from Oxford to Reading by the same train, had with him a small wooden box with a strap round it containing eggs. He left the box on a bookstall on the platform, and were absent a few minutes, and when he came back to get into the train the box was gone. When the train arrived at Reading the persons who were travelling with the plaintiffs got out and went to the refreshment room, leaving the plaintiffs in the carriage. The defendant who was looking for his box came to the carriage in which the plaintiffs were, and the box was found under the seat of the carriage. The defendant accused the plaintiffs of stealing the box, and requested the station-master to detain the train in order that they might be taken into custody. The station-master refused to do so, and the plaintiffs went on in the train. The defendant then communicated with the police at Reading, and caused a telegram to be sent to London, ordering the arrest of the plaintiffs, and stating that the defendant would go on from Reading to London by the fast train. Owing to some error, the telegram received by the police in London stated that he would arrive by the first train. The plaintiffs were taken into custody by the police on their arrival in London, and were detained in custody for several hours, but when it was found that the defendant had not arrived by the first train, they were discharged. Some days afterwards they were again arrested on a warrant obtained by the defendant, and were taken to Oxford, and brought before the magistrates, and charged with stealing the box. The magistrates dismissed the charge. No notice of action was given, and at the trial, which took place before Brett, J., at the Middlesex sittings, after Michaelmas Term 1874, the jury found that the defendant honestly believed in the existence of facts which, if true, would have afforded a justification, that is, honestly believed that the plaintiffs had been found stealing the box, and the verdict was entered for the defendant on the issue raised by the plea of not guilty by statute (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 103, 113). (a) A rule nisi for a new trial was afterwards obtained on the grounds that there was no evidence of facts which warranted the jury in finding that the defendant was protected by the statute, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, that the judge did not sufficiently explain to the jury the meaning of the words "found committing," in sect. 103, and for misdirection.

The Common Pleas Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Brett and Archibald, JJ.), made the rule for a new trial absolute, and the defendant appealed.

Jelf and Bosanquet for the defendant.—To entitle the defendant to notice of action it is sufficient to show that on some grounds he had a bonâ fide belief in the existence of facts which if they had really existed would have justified the arrest. Supposing there really were a larceny in this case, it would be a continuing act, although there was a complete asportavit when the box was taken from the bookstall at the Oxford station. The defendant did all he could do; his whole conduct shows that he was intending to act in pursuance of the statute. He kept up a constant and hot pursuit, which is all the cases say is necessary. The judgment of Jervis, C.J., in Read v. Coker (13 C. B. 850; 22 L. J. 201, C. P.), supports the defendant's contention. Downing v. Capel (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 461; 36 L. J. 272, C. P., 97, M. C.; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323) shows the principles on which the courts proceed in determining what is hot pursuit. In the present case the defendant is simply using the best practicable means for doing what he is unable to do himself, i.e., arresting the plaintiffs. He used the telegraph, which is the same thing as if he had called to a person at a distance and told him to arrest. He could not have acted more promptly under the circumstances, and there was not time or opportunity to obtain a warrant.

Digby Seymour, Q.C. and Oulpepper, for the plaintiffs.—The question as to being "found committing" the felony is one which ought to be left to the jury.

Roberts v. Orchard, 33 L. J. 65, Ex.; 2 H. & C. 789; Horley v. Rogers, 29 L. J. 140, M. C.; 2 E. & E. 674; Chamberlain v. King, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 474; 40 L. J. 273, C. P.; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736.

What is found by the jury is not sufficient to entitle the defendant to a verdict; their attention was not sufficiently called to the question which by the statute they ought to decide. The plaintiffs ought to have been "forthwith" taken before a magistrate in order to entitle the defendant to the protection afforded by the statute. According to the decision in Horley v. Rogers (ubi sup.) to bring the case within the provisions of the statute the offence must be one which is patent to the eye. There could not be an immediate arrest at Reading, for the offence which the plaintiffs were charged with, if it really was committed at all by anybody, was completed at Oxford.

Reg. v. Curran, 3 C. & P. 397.

Bosanquet, in reply, referred to

Cann v. Clipperton, 10 A. & E. 582;

Hanway v. Boulthée and wife, 1 M. & E. 15.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Common Pleas Division ought to be affirmed, but I cannot say that I have come to this conclusion on exactly the same grounds as those on which their judgment was based. I think, therefore, that it is right to give my own reasons for the decision. The question turns on the construction of sects. 103 and 113 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. [Reads the sections.] According to the latest authorities on the law as to giving notice of action for an act done in pursuance of this statute, it is laid down that to entitle the defendant to notice of action he must have acted under a bonâ fide belief in the existence of circumstances, which if they had really existed, would have afforded a justification for what he had done. The decision in cases of this kind turns on the two parts of the clause in sect. 103 to which I have referred. The first part relates to the question whether the party arrested is found committing the offence for which he is arrested, as to that part of the section the question of bonâ fide belief is all essential. The second part relates to the immediateness of the arrest, and as to this the questions turn, not on the mind of the person making the arrest, but on his act. When you come to act under a belief in the existence of such a state of facts as would if they existed justify an act done under the statute, there still remains the question whether the act was done in conformity with the statute. If the defendant were acting under a bonâ fide mistake of fact as to the persons arrested having been found committing the offence with which they were charged, he would, so far as that part of the section goes, be within the protection of the statute, but if he were acting under a mistake as to the meaning of the statute on the question whether the arrest was immediate or not, he would not be protected. In the present case the defendant, no doubt, believing bonâ fide that a felony had been committed, and under circumstances which were calculated to make him believe that such was the case, caused the plaintiffs to be arrested. If a felony had really been committed he would have been justified, but, the question is whether he is protected by the statute, having acted under a mistaken belief. It was argued for the plaintiffs that they could not have been found committing the offence, because the offence, if any, was committed at Oxford: the box was left on the platform at Oxford, and appears to have been taken by some one; it was afterwards found in the plaintiffs' possession, and, if taken at all, it was taken at Oxford. But if it were taken at Oxford, and removed, the asportation would continue. If property is taken and carried away, and if, while it is in the course of removal, the person who took it is found in possession of it, the asportation continues. A case was put in the course of the argument of a man who steals property and runs away with it, and, on pursuit, is taken with the property in his possession; in such a case as that he is found committing the offence of stealing the property. I think the statute would be satisfied if the defendant acted under it in the bona fide belief that the plaintiffs were found committing the offence, and he would have been justified, if they had actually been found committing it. But it is not found by the jury that the plaintiffs did commit any offence, and we must take it that their guilt was negatived. Then there is the question whether the apprehension was immediate. No doubt sects. 103 and 113 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, were meant to meet cases of misdemeanor, but the words of the sections are large enough to comprehend cases of felony, and it is intended that where the offence is committed, and a person is found committing it, anybody, without a warrant, may take him and bring him before a magistrate. But although "immediate" is a strong word, the clause must receive a reasonable construction. If a person is found committing an offence against the statute, and his apprehension on the spot is impracticable, and if, by pursuit he is taken at a distance, this may or may not be an immediate apprehension within the meaning of the statute according to the particular circumstances; in every case it is a question of fact. Here, if on application to the station-master, the defendant could have stopped the train so as to enable him to apprehend the plaintiffs, and he had not done so, but had allowed the plaintiffs to escape, and had afterwards followed or sent after them, and caused them to be apprehended, the statute would not protect him, but if immediate apprehension on the spot were impracticable, but pursuit were made, and the arrest effected on the earliest possible opportunity, that might be within the Act. If he had deputed another person to go and act for him, I think that would be sufficient. If he had sent on by a faster train, so as to make the arrest as soon as it was possible to come up with the train by which the plaintiffs had gone on, I think that would be within the statute, for he would have arrested on instant pursuit, and in the same way if he telegraphed and caused them to be arrested, availing himself of the first opportunity which he had of making the arrest, I think that would do. But it is impossible for us to say what the decision ought to be on the question whether there was an immediate apprehension or not. It is a question of fact and of degree, and, therefore, is a question for the jury. It was not left to them, and we cannot decide it here. We can only say that the statute should receive this or that construction. The rule will, therefore be absolute for a new trial, not on the ground that the circumstances were not such that the defendant may have bona fide believed that the plaintiffs were found committing the offence, but on the ground that the defendant may or may not have done what the statute requires to bring him within the protection afforded by sect. 113, and the question whether he has or not ought to be decided by the jury.

DAWSON (app.) v. ROBINS (resp.).

BRAMWELL, J.A.—I am also of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed. I think that on the evidence in this case if the plaintiffs had been found committing the offence with which they were charged it ought to be held that they were found committing it at Reading; but I do not wish to add anything further on that point, for they were not found committing the offence. As to the other point, it is difficult to lay down any fixed rule to meet all cases, for it is always a question of degree. I am not sure that the judge ought not to have told the jury that the plaintiffs were not found committing the offence, and that there was not an immediate arrest, and I am not sure that it makes any difference whether the arrest was not made at the place where the persons arrested were supposed to have been found committing the offence, because the person who afterwards arrested could not, or because he would not, arrest on the spot. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that, if this is not a question of law which ought to be ruled in favour of the plaintiffs, it is a question for the jury, because we cannot say that it is a question of law which ought to be ruled in favour of the defendant. I should suggest for the guidance of the judge before whom the trial will take place that he should leave the question to the jury whether there was an immediate arrest, and reserve the point. The case must go down for a new trial.

AMPHLETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion, on very much the same grounds as those stated by Bramwell, J.A. Although I concur with the rest of the court that the case must go back to be tried again, for the judge ought to leave it to the jury to find the exact circumstances, and the facts are not before us so as to enable us to decide how the verdict ought to be, even if an arrest in London could be held to be immediate, I should think myself that no apprehension in London for an offence supposed to have been committed at Reading, could be within sect. 103. I think the intention of the Legislature was that the offender should be arrested then and there, and if he gets away and is not taken in hot pursuit, it cannot be an immediate arrest under that section. But I think that the case should go back for a new trial, and the facts should be found. Judgment affirmed.

DAWSON (app.) v. ROBINS (resp.)

Parliamentary franchise — County vote — Rent-charge.

The grantee of a freehold rentcharge of the yearly value of 40s. or upwards issuing out of a reversion is entitled to vote at county elections.

APPEAL from the decision of a revising barrister.

The following case was stated for the opinion of the court.

At a court held at Southampton on the 22nd Sept. 1876 by me, the barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters for the Southern Division of the county of Hants, objection was duly made to the claim of Oliver Robert Dawson to have his name inserted in the list of voters in the parish of St. Mary for the said Southern Division of the said county.

C.P. Div.]

HIGGINSON v. SIMPSON.

[C.P. Div.]

The qualification stated by the said Oliver Robert Dawson in his claim was a "freehold rent-charge" issuing out of houses and land Itchen Bridge-road and Dock-street, owner Henry Compton.

It appeared that by an indenture bearing date 29th Sept. 1874, the reversion in fee in the said premises was conveyed to the said Henry Compton, subject to certain leases of 1000 years each, created by indenture of demise bearing date 29th July 1864. In each of these leases a ground rent was reserved, and in each was contained a power of re-entry in default. These leases are still subsisting.

By indenture bearing date the 15th Jan. 1875, the said Henry Compton granted to the said Oliver Robert Dawson a yearly freehold rent-charge of 2l. 10s. charged upon the said premises. The said indenture also contained a power of distress in default of payment of the said rent-charge.

Copies of the aforesaid indenture of the 29th Sept. 1874, and of the 15th Jan. 1875, comprised in schedule B. are annexed to this case.

It was not disputed that the reserved ground-rent was amply sufficient to meet this and other rentcharges granted about the same time and issuing out of the same premises, and that the amount due to the said Oliver Robert Dawson and the other grantees had been actually paid to each of them respectively by the agent of the said Henry Compton.

The claims of four other persons whose names are set out in the schedule A. hereunto annexed were objected to on the same grounds.

I was of opinion that considering the nature of Henry Compton's interest the power of distress contained in the indenture of the 15th Jan. 1875, was nugatory, and disallowed the claims of the said Oliver Robert Dawson and of the said four other persons to be inserted in the said list.

The cases of the four other persons mentioned in schedule A. depending upon the same decision are consolidated with this case.

If the court be of opinion that my decision was wrong the register is to be amended by inserting the names of O. R. Dawson and of the four other persons in the said list.

Bidley, for the appellant.—The appellant is entitled to have his name placed on the register. A rentcharge is a tenement within the meaning of 10 Hen. 6, c. 2, and its nature is not altered by the abolition of real actions by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 36.

Thomas v. Sylvester, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 368; 42 L. J. 237, Q. B.; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 290;

[He was stopped by the court.]

Ohester, for the respondent.—The grantee of such a rentcharge as this has merely a personal remedy against the grantor; he has no remedy against the land itself. [LINDLEY, J.—He might obtain a decree for a sale to raise the arrears White v. James (26 Beav. 191). Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. referred to Dodds v. Thompson, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 133; 35 L. J. 97, C. P.] Thomas v. Sylvester (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, because there a ground rentcharge was created out of the seisin in fee by the Statute of Uses. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Can no one create a valid rentcharge except a yeoman farming his own land?] Not for this purpose. This is merely a payment in gross, and is not a tenement within 10 Hen. 6, c. 2, so as to confer a right to vote. He also referred to Bacon's Abridgment "Rent" B.; Steele v. Bosworth (34 L. J. 57, C. P.); Hopwood and Philbrick's Registration Cases 106 s. c.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and ought to be reversed. We must look at the words of the statute in order to see whether the person objected to was qualified to vote. The statute 10 Hen. 6, c. 2 says that the persons who are to vote are those who have a "frank tenement" of the value of forty shillings a year. Now has the appellant in this case such a "frank tenement"? By the deeds which accompany the case it appears that Mr. Compton held the land in fee subject to certain leases, that is, he was the reversioner. Then he creates these rentcharges by conveyances each of which is sufficient to give a "frank tenement" of the value of 2l. 10s. a year issuing out of the land, for there is a good conveyance, and the grantee receives the profits of the interest conveyed, which is a rentcharge of 2l. 10s. a year, and the land is sufficient to pay the amount. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appellant was entitled to vote.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two questions to be considered, first, what sort of interest does the appellant take, and secondly, what is the value of that interest? Can any conveyancer say that this is not a freehold interest, being a rentcharge in fee simple charged on the reversion? Then as to the value. The property is of ample value to pay the yearly sum which is charged upon it, the appellant is in receipt of the profits, he has remedies to enforce payment, and to my mind he has a remedy against the land, for I think he could, if it were necessary, get a sale of an aliquot part of the land to raise the value of the interest to which he is entitled. I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister ought to be reversed.

appear in the judgment of the court (Grove and Denman, JJ.), which was delivered by DENMAN, J.—In this case, heard before my brother Grove and myself, we took time, in order to enable us to look into the cases cited, one of which had been so recently decided, that we had not an opportunity, during the argument, of fully examining the report. A verdict had been entered for the plaintiff in the Court of Passage, at Liverpool, for 50*l.*, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him upon the finding of the jury. These findings were as follows: That the plaintiff and defendant agreed together that the plaintiff, a professional betting man, was to lay out 2*l.* in betting on a horse called Regal for a particular steeple chase, taking the odds, or betting 25 to 1 on the horse. If Regal won, it was agreed that the plaintiff was to have 50*l.* from the defendant, to be paid out of the defendant's winnings, if he (the defendant) backed Regal. If Regal lost, the plaintiff was to pay the defendant 2*l.* The defendant did back Regal, who won; and the defendant thereby won in bets, which he had made on Regal, 57*l.* of which the plaintiff claimed 50*l.* It was contended by Mr. French for the defendant that this transaction was "an agreement by way of gaming or wagering," within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18; and the action one "for recovering money won upon a wager," within that section. On the other side it was argued by Mr. Willis for the plaintiff that the real meaning of such a contract was merely that the defendant undertook to pay the plaintiff so much out of his winnings, in case of Regal's success, by way of remuneration to the plaintiff for giving the defendant the benefit of his skill, experience, and information, in naming a probably successful horse. We can, however, only look at the contract as it appears upon the findings of the jury, and, so looked at, it appears to us to be clear that it is a contract by way of wagering, and nothing else. Even if the object of the defendant in entering into such a bargain was correctly surmised by the plaintiff's counsel, the ultimate effect of the bargain was to be wholly dependent upon the occurring of an event over which neither party had any control; and the action was one founded upon the supposed right to recover money won upon the happening of that event, viz., the winning of a particular race. This being so, we think it matters not that the bargain was complicated by a provision for other contingencies, as, for instance, that the defendant was only liable to pay the 50*l.*, if he backed the particular horse, and won upon him. The substance of the contract is always to be regarded, and we think that a contract such as this, however disguised, is in substance a contract by way of wagering. In Grizewood v. Blane (11 C. B. 538), it was held that a contract was within the statute, though on the face of it it appeared to be a contract for the sale of shares, if it was in fact only intended that differences should be paid, and no shares really passed. And on the same principle, in Rourke v. Short (5 E. & B. 904), it was held that where a contract mainly depended upon a wager, no action could be maintained upon it, even an action for goods sold, when the parties had agreed that the price of the goods, agreed to be sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, should depend upon the result of a wager. The case of Hill v. Fox (4 H. & N. 359), was decided upon the same principle, and is to the like effect. The cases cited by Mr. Willis on behalf of the plaintiff were none of them inconsistent with this decision. They were not cases of actions brought by one party to a wagering contract against the other for money alleged to be due upon the contract. In the case of Beeston v. Beeston (45 L. J. 230, Ex.; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 700), which was the most relied upon, the court only held that the plaintiff could recover on a cheque given by the defendant to the plaintiff for the amount of moneys received by the defendant for winnings in bets made by the defendant with third persons as agent for the plaintiff. This was held not to be the case of an action upon a contract by way of wagering, but of one brought upon a cheque given for money received by the defendant for which he was liable to account to the plaintiff. Johnson v. Langley (12 C. B. 468) was a similar case, and is no authority for the plaintiff in the present case, who sues upon the contract itself. We are of opinion that the rule must be made absolute to enter judgment for the defendant with costs.

Cost of sewer—New street—Previous sewer—Metropolis Local Management Act 1867 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 44), 52, 112.

In 1867, a sewer was built in a street, formed since 1862, of some houses in which the respondent was owner, at his expense, under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 44.

In 1875 the appellants removed this sewer, and another in the next street, and constructed a new sewer in connection with the houses in both streets. They apportioned the cost and expenses of the works upon the owners of houses and land in the two streets. The respondent refused to pay his apportionment, and a magistrate dismissed the summons against him.

Held, upon a case stated, that this was not a sewer constructed in or for the drainage of a new street within the meaning of sect. 52 of the said Act, and that the apportionment was bad.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the magistrate at Hammersmith Police Court.

The appellants herein are the District Board of Works for the Fulham district, and the respondent is a builder owning property in the district.

FULHAM BOARD OF WORKS (apps.) v. GOODWIN (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

still is the owner of houses in a road which in the year 1867 was and is now called the Mayland-road, and the tenants thereof had previously to the making of the new sewer paid sewer rates.

3. The respondent is not the owner of any house or land in the Conningham-road, which is a continuation of the said Mayland-road, and is hereinafter referred to and called Conningham-road.

4. On or about the 1st Feb. 1867, the Metropolitan Board of Works, sanctioned the construction of a sewer in the centre of the said Mayland-road by the owners, under the 44th sect. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102.

5. Such sewer was built and drainage works were made at the expense of the said John Goodwin, the respondent, according to the plans submitted to and approved by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and extended the entire length of the said Mayland-road, about 1050ft.

6. The construction of a sewer in the Conningham-road by the owners, with an outfall in the Uxbridge-road, was sanctioned by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and constructed in two sections. The first section was in accordance with such sanction; the second section, about 500ft. in length, was not in accordance with such sanction, with its outfall in the sewer in the Mayland-road, instead of into the Uxbridge-road.

7. In April 1875, the Board of Works for the Fulham district determined to have the sewers before mentioned taken up and reconstructed.

8. The provisions of the several Acts of Parliament relating to sewers, in force in 1867, were complied with by the respondent in the construction of the sewer constructed by the respondent in the year 1867, referred to in the 4th and 5th paragraphs of this case.

9. In the month of June 1875, the said district board caused the said sewers to be removed, and constructed a brick main sewer throughout the whole of the Mayland-road, and a large part of the Conningham-road, with manholes and gulleys sufficient to take the sewage of a large and populous neighbourhood, and connected the drainage of the houses in the said Mayland-road, and of several houses in the Conningham-road with the said new sewer.

10. The cost and expenses of the works in the last paragraph mentioned amounted to the sum of 2527*l.*, and the Fulham district board apportioned the same upon the owners of the houses and land in the Mayland and Conningham roads, as shown upon certain plans in the proportions set forth in an apportionment of the 30th June 1875; which said plans and apportionment accompanied, and were to be taken as forming part of this case.

Upon the hearing of the said summons it was contended on the part of the respondent—

(1.) That the apportionment whereby the respondent was sought to be charged, and which amounted to the sum of 646*l.*, was bad in law, because the district board, having removed the old sewer in the Mayland-road, sanctioned and made as stated in the 4th and 5th paragraphs of the case, were bound to substitute one as efficient, but not at the cost of the owners.

(2.) That the sewer in respect of which this present claim is made against the respondent, is a sewer for taking the sewage of the whole neighbourhood, including the side streets, and not of the said Mayland-road and Conningham-road only, and that, therefore, the owners of houses in Mayland-road ought not to pay the cost.

(3.) That any sewer replacing an old one vested in the district board, ought to be made at the cost of the ratepayers of the parish.

The said magistrate was of opinion that the said summons ought to be dismissed, and dismissed the same accordingly, with costs, against the said district board.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the respondent, John Goodwin, is liable to pay the said sum of 646*l.* in respect of the said apportionments.

If the court shall be of opinion that he is so liable, judgment is to be entered for the appellants with costs.

But if the court shall be of opinion that he is not so liable, judgment is to be entered for the respondent, with costs.

Boddam (with him Philbrick, Q.C.) argued for the appellants.—The section under which the sewers are alleged to have been made in 1867, is the 44th of the Metropolitan Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102): "It shall be lawful for the owners or occupiers of any land or premises in any parish, district, or part within the limits of the metropolis as defined by the firstly-recited Act, with the consent and subject to the regulations and conditions hereinafter mentioned, to construct sewers at their own expense for the purpose of draining such land or premises, and it shall be lawful for any vestry or district board in whom the sewers in any parish, district, or part are vested, if they shall deem it just and proper so to do, to contribute out of the rates under their control, applicable to the execution of works of sewerage, to the cost of any sewers constructed for the purpose aforesaid." Amongst the regulations and conditions mentioned in the subsequent sections, 45 to 51, is one requiring the sanction of the district board and the approval of the metropolitan board, which in this case had not been obtained. The section, therefore, which is applicable to the sewer charged upon this apportionment is the 52nd of the same Act: "Where any sewer shall, after the passing of this Act be constructed by any vestry or district board in or for the drainage of any new street, or of any house or houses erected since the 1st day of January 1856, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto, including the cost of gulleys, side entrances, lengths of sewer at the intersection of streets, and other incidental charges and expenses, shall be borne and defrayed by the owners of such streets or houses, and of the land bounding or abutting on such street respectively." By section 112, "the expression new street shall apply to and include all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out, and a part of any such street, and also all streets the maintenance of the paving and roadway whereof had not, previously to the passing of this Act been taken into charge and assumed by the commissioners, trustees, surveyors, or other authorities having control of the pavements or highways in the parish or place in which such streets are situate, and a part of any such street, and also all streets partly formed or laid out." This unsanctioned sewer was the same for the purposes of the Act as if no sewer existed, and the case comes within the authority of Sawyer v. Puddington (L. Rep. 6 Q. B.). There the appellant, about 1866, built some houses abutting on the Harrow-road, and about the same time the vestry of the parish constructed a sewer along the Harrow-road. Sewer rates had been levied in respect of the land upon which the houses were built for more than five years prior to 1856. Before 1866 no sewer existed in this road, which was and continued to be a turnpike road until the 1st July 1864, on which day the vestry took charge of it for the first time. It was held that the Harrow-road was a new street within the meaning of section 112, and that the appellant was liable to be rated under sect. 52 of this Act.

Day, Q.C. (with him Kemp), for the respondent. —Sect. 68 of Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) vests all sewers then vested in the metropolitan commissioners in vestries or district boards; "and all sewers made and to be made within any such parish or district, except sewers and works vested or to be vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, as hereinafter mentioned, shall be vested in such vestry and board respectively." And by sect. 69 the vestry of every parish and the board of works of every district mentioned "shall (subject to the powers by this Act vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works) from time to time repair and maintain the sewers under this Act vested in them, or such of them as shall not be discontinued, closed up, or destroyed under the powers herein contained, and shall cause to be made, repaired, and maintained such sewers and works, or such diversions or alterations of sewers and works as may be necessary for effectually draining their parish or district." Under those sections of the earlier Act the appellants ought to have charged the repair of this sewer upon the district rates. This was not a sewer constructed under sect. 52 of the Act of 1862, in or for the drainage of a new street. [Stopped by the Court.]

OLMSTEAD, B.—We need hear no further argument for the respondent. We have no doubt this appeal must be dismissed. It has been contended that the respondent and other persons, who are owners of the houses and land bounding or abutting upon the street through which this sewer has been made, should pay for the expenses of the sewer. It was said this is a new street according to the definition contained in the Act, and the sewer was constructed by the appellants in or for the drainage of this street. But it appears that in 1867 a sewer was constructed under the 44th section of the Act of 1862, in the centre of the respondent's street; it was brought into use for the neighbourhood, and became vested in the appellants. The expense was paid by the respondent, and it appears to me that persons who have thus paid for a sewer once cannot under this Act be charged again for the construction of another. In 1875, for some purpose the district board determined to make a fresh sewer to serve the district, not merely for this particular street, but having connections with the houses in Conningham-road, which is a continuation of it. They have, however, attempted to charge the respondent for his apportionment of the expense of this fresh sewer, as if the 52nd section of the Act of 1862 applied to it. That section authorises such an apportionment when any sewer shall be constructed by a "district board in or for the drainage of any new street or of any houses erected since the 1st Jan. 1856." Although the definition of "new street" may apply to this Mayland-road, it is unreasonable to apply this section under the circumstances here stated, and this is strongly confirmed by the provisions of the following section 53, which relates to streets in which previously to the construction of the sewer there had been no sewer or only an open sewer. The expenses are then to be defrayed in part only by the adjoining owners, the remainder to come from the general rate. It would be an inconsistent conclusion that the owners in this street should be charged entirely for the new sewer, although they had a sewer before; and where there was no sewer or an open sewer before, the adjoining owners should only be charged part of the costs incurred. I am satisfied, too, that this sewer was made for the district generally, and cannot be said to be in or for the drainage of any new street. This sewer could only have been made at the charge of the parish rate-payers, and the apportionment appealed against is bad. The appeal, therefore, from the dismissal of this summons cannot be allowed.

MONCK v. HILTON.

Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 4.—Using subtle means or devices by palmistry or otherwise to deceive—Rogue and vagabond.

The attempt to deceive and impose upon others by falsely pretending to exercise the peculiar and supernatural power of holding intercourse with the invisible world, and of obtaining answers and manifestations of power from invisible spirits is an attempt to deceive by "using subtle craft, means, or devices by palmistry or otherwise," within sect. 4 of the Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83).

CASE stated by justices of Huddersfield, under 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43.

At a petty sessions held in and for the borough of Huddersfield, on the 11th Nov. 1876, the appellant was brought up in custody and a charge was preferred against him by Chief Constable Henry Hilton, the respondent, under sect. 4 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, for that he, the appellant, on the 23rd Oct. 1876, at Huddersfield, did unlawfully use certain subtle means or devices by palmistry or otherwise to deceive and impose on certain of Her Majesty's subjects, to wit, George Henry Hepplestone, Henry Bedford Lodge, and others, contrary to the statute; upon the hearing of which charge the appellant was convicted by the justices of the said offence, and they adjudged him, as a rogue and a vagabond, to be committed to the House of Correction at Wakefield, there to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months.

Upon the hearing it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact that the appellant had agreed with one George Henry Hepplestone at the request of the latter to give two spiritualistic seances, at the residence of Henry

[Ex. Div.]

George Hepplestone, for the sum of 2l. each; but that in the event of there being more than eight persons present at either of such seances then the payment to the appellant to be after the rate of 5s. for each person. It was further proved that in pursuance of this agreement the appellant held two seances at the residence of George Henry Hepplestone, on the 22nd and 23rd Oct. 1876, and that at the latter of such seances in respect of which no money was paid, George Henry Hepplestone, Henry Bedford Lodge, and others were present. It was further proved that the persons present at this seance (other than the appellant) were directed by the appellant to place their hands upon the table around which they were seated and their feet under their chairs. After which he said, "We spiritualists have to be very guarded in consequence of the Slade case, some call it psychic force, some animal magnetism, some legerdemain, some conjuring, some one thing, and some another; I call it spiritualism, but you must judge for yourselves." It was further proved that there was no light in the room except that given by a single gas jet, and that during what were termed the manifestations, the gas was turned almost out. The alleged manifestations were the following:

(a) Raps were heard under the table, whereupon the appellant said, "They are soon here to night, the conditions are very favourable."

(b) The appellant placed a small tambourine upon a musical instrument called "Fairy Bells," and then put it on the table a little distance from himself. The instrument was then observed to move towards the appellant who inquired whether the company had seen it move, whereupon one of them asked him to request the spirit to move it in the opposite direction, to which the appellant replied, "We had better take the manifestations exactly as they come," and that it "couldn't be done." He was then asked "Why," and he answered "I don't know how it is done."

(c) A small musical box was then handed round the company who examined it. It was then placed by the appellant about half a yard in front of himself on the table. He said the spirits were able to play it. He then placed a wooden box over it, and the appellant then invited the company to ask it questions, and that one sound would signify "no" and three sounds "yes." Some questions were asked and certain sounds were heard, but these sounds were occasionally as many as five or six at a time. One of the company directed the appellant's attention to the fact that the musical box which had been placed under the wooden box was not wound up, whereupon the appellant said that the spirits could not only play but wind it up.

(d.) A hand appeared above the table immediately on the left of the appellant, who put the tambourine to it, and the fingers of the hand tapped it. The fingers did not move separately. The hand was not like a human hand, but like a wax hand which had been rubbed with oil and phosphorus.

After a short time the hand disappeared below the table. One of the witnesses was of opinion that the hand was like one of the kid glove hands found in the appellant's possession.

(e.) Two or three slates were placed by the appellant upon the table. He said they would receive messages from departed spirits. A small piece of pencil was placed by him upon one of the slates. He then took hold of one corner of the slate and a lady took hold of another corner of it. It was then held under the table, and whilst it was there the lady remarked she felt a great pressure upon it. One of the company asked for a message from some departed one. After the slate had been held under the table about a couple of minutes it was brought forth, and was found to contain in a very crabbed, singular writing, the words "Oh, for a lodge in some vast wilderness!" Another message was then asked for, and the appellant and the same lady again held the slate under the table. The lady remarked she felt a very warm hand, whereupon the appellant said, "Well you're sure it's not my hand." She replied, "No, I am not." When the slate was again produced there was a button upon it and the following message, "Good night Philemon. Samuel." The appellant having previously stated that his spirit guide was Samuel Wheeler. It was proved that a scratching on the slate was heard at the same time that the lady felt a warm hand against her own. The button above mentioned was taken off the lady's dress; she stated that it was pulled from her dress rather violently.

(f.) One of the notes of the piano which was in the room sounded. A lady was then asked by the appellant to sit on the lid of the piano. She did so, and the same note sounded. It was proved that the appellant was close to the piano at the time. Mr. Lodge then asked the appellant if the spirit would play some other note. The appellant stamped, whereupon Mr. Lodge asked, "That's you, doctor isn't it?" and he said "yes." Mr. Lodge then asked, "Will you kindly play a note lower?" Then came another stamp with the appellant's foot, which signified "No." It was proved that whilst these manifestations were being produced there were two boxes in the room belonging to the appellant.

When the manifestations were concluded two of the ladies present left the room, whereupon Mr. Lodge told the appellant that he was obliged to the appellant for the entertainment, but was not satisfied, and that he would himself undertake to produce the same manifestations under the same conditions. Mr. Lodge asked to be allowed to search the appellant, remarking that if he could not find the spirit hand, a duplicate musical box, and other things, he would give 50l. to the cause of spiritualism. The appellant declined to be searched, and appealed to Mr. Hepplestone, at whose house the seance was held, and where the appellant had lodged as his guest, to protect him. When the two ladies returned into the room the appellant seized one of the boxes, struck Mr. Lodge, who stood at the door, and rushed upstairs and locked himself in his bedroom, from which he escaped by fastening a sheet against the waterspout and sliding down. He left certain boxes, which were subsequently examined, and in them were found a great number of articles, amongst which were kid glove hands, stuffed, and having elastic attached to them, linen, with faces faintly sketched upon it, white gauze thread, thin wire, a number of slates and pencils, musical box, musical albums, and a long rod divisible into small lengths.

It was proved on behalf of the appellant that he had had rooms at the house of William Dobbs, 14, Wells-terrace, in the city of Bristol, for the last four years. It was also proved on his behalf that articles similar to some of those found in his possession had been openly used by the appellant in his public lectures, showing how conjurors produced manifestations similar to those of spiritualism.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the Vagrant Act was intended to apply to gipsies and other homeless and wandering vagabonds, and that this was no offence within the meaning of sect. 4 of the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, and the case of Johnson (app.) v. Fenner (resp.) (33 Justice of the Peace, p. 740) was cited in support of this view.

The justices, however, being of opinion that the evidence given before them brought the case within the operation of sect. 4 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court, therefore, was.

[Ex. Div.]

MONCK v. HILTON.

whether the justices were correct in their view of the law that the appellant was a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of sect. 4 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, he having, in their opinion, upon the evidence before them, attempted to deceive and impose upon Her Majesty's subjects by using subtle means and devices.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant was liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction was to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said conviction was to be quashed.

Henry Matthews, Q.C. (Lockwood with him), for the appellant.—The question is whether the subtle devices set out in the case amount to "palmistry or otherwise," for these words are qualifying words, and point out the statutory offence. That they cannot fall within the word "palmistry" is in the first place clear. The word is thus defined in Cowell's Law Dictionary: "A kind of divination, practised by looking on the lines and marks of the fingers and hands. This was practised by the Egyptians mentioned in the statute: 1 P. & M. c. 4." In Johnson v. Fenner (38 J. P. 740), which is the only decided case under the section, it was held that mere sleight of hand was not "palmistry." That being so, the question here arises as to what is the meaning of the words "or otherwise." These words must be read according to the general rule of construction that general words are restricted by the particular words which precede them. They must, therefore, be taken to mean something ejusdem generis with palmistry as chiromancy or physiognomy. The section was clearly never intended to include anything which belongs to the supernatural class. There is nothing supernatural in palmistry, chiromancy, or physiognomy. This becomes clear when we look at the statutes in pari materia, and from which the section under discussion was in fact derived. There are two distinct and separate and contemporaneous series of statutes both commencing in the reign of Henry 8. The first series, of which the present Act forms one, deals exclusively with the Egyptians, and prohibits them from deceiving people by "subtle crafts, means, or device" by palmistry, chiromancy, physiognomy or the like. The statutes are 22 Hen. 8 c. 10, 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 4, 5 Eliz. c. 20, 17 Geo. 2 c. 5, s. 2, 3 Geo. 4 c. 40, s. 3, and the present Act of 5 Geo. 4 c. 83, by which all previous Acts as to rogues and vagabonds were repealed. The second series of statutes, which comprises 3 Hen. 8, c. 8, 5 Eliz. c. 16, 1 Jac. 1 c. 12, and 9 Geo. 2 c. 5, ss. 3, 4, deal with quite a different offence, viz., that of conjuration or the calling up of evil spirits. By the three first of these Acts it was made criminal to exercise and deal in conjuration, witchcraft, enchantment, and sorcery, but in the reign of George II. the belief in magic having disappeared, prosecutions for such offences were abolished by 9 Geo. 2 c. 5, and the pretence was made criminal. That Act still remains in force, and under that the appellant should have been proceeded against, if he can be proceeded against at all. It is clear that 5 Geo. 4 c. 83 was only intended to apply to the Egyptians, and not to a case like the present.

Poland, contra.—The essence of the offence against which 5 Geo. 4 c. 83, s. 4 was levelled is "using subtle craft, &c.," and the Act was intended to protect credulous people against themselves. Palmistry was one form of deceit which immediately struck the framers of this Act, and, in order to include all manner of deceit, the words "or otherwise" were inserted. Those words must mean "or in any other manner." It must be remembered that this Act was passed in the reign of Geo. 2, and the word palmistry even had a different signification in those days to that which it has now. The case of Johnson v. Fenner is altogether distinguishable from the present. All that was decided in that case was that mereleger-demain, or, in other words, a mere trial of skill, between one man's sleight of hand and another man's quickness of eye, is not within the Act. Here the appellant pretended to call up spirits, which is a very different thing. The words "or otherwise" cannot, when the whole section is considered, have the restricted interpretation put upon them as is contended for here.

H. Matthews, Q.C. in reply.

Our. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—The following written judgments were now delivered.

CLEASBY, B.—It is first necessary to consider what the exact question for our determination is. This must be clearly understood, as there appeared at first to be a difficulty, though of a technical nature, from the terms in which the magistrates have found the facts; and if they had only found that the defendant used artful devices with intent to deceive, without themselves forming any conclusion as to the means used, there would have been an objection to the case coming before us on appeal. But it is to be taken, and the words properly bear that meaning, that the magistrates have found that the means set forth in the case were the means used and to which their express finding applies. The question, then, before us arises in this way. The magistrates have found as a fact that the appellant used subtle craft, means, and devices by the means stated to deceive and defraud Her Majesty's subjects. They have also found as a conclusion of law that the means used bring the case within the statute, and they then ask our opinion upon the correctness of this conclusion upon the matter of law whether the findings of fact bring the case within the statute. We have nothing to do with the correctness of the conclusions of fact arrived at by the magistrates. They can only ask our opinion upon matters of law, and we must take the conclusions of fact as found by them. It is right to add, in order to prevent misapprehension, that there was overwhelming evidence to warrant their conclusions. Now, as regards the acts of the defendant and the means used by him, we are not called upon to express any opinion upon the subject of spiritualism generally, whether there does exist any real power in a medium (as he is called) of the nature set up, or whether its existence is a mere delusion. Such a subject would be a very improper one for argument and decision in a court of law. But it does not arise in the present case, because we have it found as a fact that the appellant was an impostor in pretending to make use of it. The only question, then, is, whether in this particular case the means used by the appellant are within the words palmistry or otherwise in the Act in question. We must first see what the means used were. There is a séance for which he is to receive 2s. He calls himself a spiritualist,

[Ex. Div.]

MONCK v. HILTON.

the room is darkened, raps are heard, and he says, "They are soon here to night, the conditions are very favourable." They then go through the performances described in the case, and it is sufficient to say that he pretends to exercise the peculiar and supernatural powers of obtaining answers and manifestations of power from invisible agents or spirits, as he calls them. We have to determine whether this brings the case within the 4th section of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. That section enumerates a great number of offences which make a person liable to be punished as a rogue and vagabond. And the second of the enumerations is as follows: "Every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and defraud any of his Majesty's subjects." The appellant could not properly be regarded as a person professing to tell fortunes, and was not so charged, and the argument before us was, that the words "palmistry or otherwise" must be read as pointing to palmistry, which it was said was well known to signify "forming conclusions from the lines of the hands," and other similar pretensions, such as physiognomy, &c. It was first contended, and I think with success, that the Act of Parliament could not be read as if the words, "by palmistry or otherwise," were omitted altogether, so as to make it apply to all subtle devices used to deceive and defraud Her Majesty's subjects; some effect must always be given to all the words in a statute creating an offence. But it was further contended that the words "or otherwise" following a particular word "palmistry" must be read as having reference to arts or pretensions of the same description as palmistry according to a general rule of construction limiting the effect of general words following a particular description. As to the general rule, no authority was necessary, but a case was referred to in which the Court of Queen's Bench, in construing the statute and section in question held that the words "or otherwise" must have a limited signification, and were not applicable to the case of a man wagering with people upon tricks of sleight of hand, and so deceiving and defrauding them. The case is Johnson v. Fenner (33 Justice of Peace, p. 740). In such a case no peculiar power is pretended like telling fortunes or palmistry to impose upon the credulous, but a great skill of manipulation and sleight of hand, and persons are found confident enough to back their eyesight against the skill and dexterity of the performer. This is so different an act from the acts particularised in the clause that a court would properly hold that you could not apply general words to so very different a thing. But in the present case we are dealing with an impostor exercising a power by a pretended intercourse with the invisible world, a peculiar power belonging to himself. In construing the clause in question we are entitled to consider the whole of it. We are not construing such words as "palmistry and any other act" standing by themselves, a case to which the argument used would more closely apply; the clause includes all persons who pretend to tell fortunes (which imports that deception is practised by doing so), or use subtle devices by palmistry or otherwise to defraud. Now the present case is in clearly brought with the words "by palmistry or otherwise" taken in their natural sense. But the appellant seeks to limit their natural sense by construction, that is, by applying the rule of construction referred to. It appears to me that it would be going beyond any application of this rule to hold that the words "or otherwise," taken in their natural sense, and in connection with the rest of the clause, only apply to modes of deception of a precise class or genus of which palmistry can be said to be an instance. It may be quite right to hold that, and my reasoning does not apply to anything which in its character is entirely different from fortune telling and palmistry. But I cannot regard the acts and pretences of the appellant as so entirely different. Something besides fortune-telling and palmistry must be held as included, or we must reject the words "or otherwise," which cannot be done, and I could not myself fix upon any crafty devices more properly coupled for punishment with those of fortune telling and palmistry than those set forth in the case as practised by the appellant. The learned counsel for the appellant referred to very early statutes, showing that the offence of palmistry and the pretending to hold intercourse with spirits had formerly been treated as totally different offences with very different punishments, which was no doubt the case. Palmistry was at one time practised by gipsies and persons leading a vagabond life, and the legislation was directed against them. But the idea of leading a wandering and vagabond life is not now at all an ingredient in the description of a rogue and vagabond, as is obvious by reading the enumeration in sect. 4. The stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, repeals all the former statutes relating to rogues and vagabonds, and forms itself the legislation on the subject, and enacts in substance that, by doing certain things or neglecting certain duties, a man shall be in the same predicament as a rogue and vagabond, and dealt with as such. Whatever an offender's position may be under other Acts of Parliament not relating to rogues and vagabonds, if he comes within the enumeration in sect. 4, he is properly punished as a rogue and vagabond. For the reasons above given, I think the appellant was properly dealt with by the magistrates as a rogue and vagabond, and that the conviction must be affirmed, and, of course, with costs.

POLLOCK, B.—In my judgment the justices were correct in the view of the law which they took when they found the appellant in this case to be a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. The first material matter to consider is, what was it that the magistrates found in fact? Taking the evidence which they have set out in the case, coupled with their finding, the only fair conclusion to be drawn is, that they found that the appellant did attempt to deceive and impose upon the persons named in the charge, that the means by which he so attempted was not by mere sleight of hand, dexterous manipulation of instruments, or illusions of the eye or ear, such as is practised by a conjuror or ventriloquist, but that in addition to and accompanied with the exercise of physical dexterity the appellant so conducted himself as to assume the power of communicating with and calling in the aid of unseen spirits, who could do certain acts and produce certain results, such as the winding-up and playing upon a musical box, and the communication of messages from persons who had died. We have, therefore, a craft, means, and device, which is beyond that of physical dexterity, and a professed dealing with some spiritual agency which is enacted not for the mere purpose of individual experiment, or so-called scientific pursuit, but to deceive and impose on others. And the only remaining question is, whether this is within the scope of the statute. The words of the Act are: "Every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes; or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise to deceive and impose on any of his Majesty's subjects." And the well-known rule of construction was urged upon us that in giving effect to the words "or otherwise," we must read the statute as if it had used the words by palmistry or other act of a like kind. The principle upon which this rule is founded is thoroughly established, and the only difficulty which arises is in the mode and extent of its application to the provision in question. If the only words were, "Any person pretending by palmistry or otherwise to deceive," the argument would have greater force, but the language whence the scope and intent of the section is to be gathered is much wider, and to get at this we must look back to the words preceding palmistry. These show that the character of the act which is made an offence is assuming a special power beyond the ordinary limit of human agency. This is indicated by the first of those specified "professing to tell fortunes;" those which follow are of a like character, "using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive," and the general character of the means or device is sufficiently indicated by the earlier words; and to read the word "otherwise" as limiting the means to acts, which must necessarily be similar to palmistry, would, in my judgment, wrest from the statute its spirit and expressed intention. Reading it as a whole, I should take the words "otherwise" not as limiting the earlier words, but as enlarging the word "palmistry," and providing against the professing to tell fortunes, or using craft, means, or devices to deceive, whether by palmistry or by contrivance to deceive other than palmistry, provided they are of the same general character as is indicated by the earlier words of the section. It is unnecessary now to say what other means or device may come within the statute, but as to this I should guard myself against being supposed to hold that there might not be cases in which the means used were legerdemain or ventriloquism, or the like, and yet that they were included. Whether they would or would not be included must depend upon many circumstances, one very important one being the profession of the performer, and another being the education and means of knowledge possessed by the audience. For instance, persons at the present day hearing an ordinary ventriloquist, would hardly say he intended to deceive or impose upon them; whether this were so or not would be a question of fact for the magistrate. So it would be in the case of a juggler or conjuror; it would be for the tribunal before which the question was tried to say whether the performer merely backed his skill and agility against the quickness or accuracy of the eyes or ears of those present, as was clearly the case in Johnson v. Fenner, which was cited before us from 33 Justice of the Peace, 740, or whether he intended to convey the impression that he was dealing with or assisted by any supernatural agency. In the present case, the finding by the magistrates is conclusive, and well supported by the evidence before them. Our attention was very properly called by Mr. Matthews, on behalf of the appellant, to the fact that the statute in question is only the last of a series, commencing so far back as 22 Hen. 8, c. 10, all of which profess to deal with jugglers and persons pretending to have skill in physiognomy, palmistry, or the like crafty sciences, whereas there has long existed a parallel set of statutes, beginning with 33 Hen. 8, c. 8, and ending with 9 Geo. 2, c. 5, s. 4, the expressed object of which is to deal with persons using, practising, or exercising any invocation or conjuration of an evil spirit. These offences are fully explained by Lord Coke in his treatise on the 1st James 1, c. 12 (3 Inst. 44), and included what in more modern days is commonly called witchcraft, and it is to be observed that by these the dealing with the supernatural is itself made an offence, apart from any deceiving or imposing on others. It may be that the appellant, by doing what he did, brought himself within these Acts, but it is unnecessary to decide this, and one would pause before seeking to put in force criminal statutes pointing to an offence practically obsolete, but even were his acts within the existing statute against witchcraft, it by no means follows that when he used devices to deceive and impose upon others, he was not liable under the Act in question. I think, therefore, that the conclusion at which the magistrates arrived is within the statute, and that there is no ground for disturbing the conviction.

PETERS v. COWIE.

Bogus and vagabond—Person—Married woman—Desertion of children—5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4.

5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4 renders every person committing any offence therein enumerated liable to be deemed a rogue and vagabond, and to suffer three months' imprisonment with hard labour; amongst others every person running away and leaving his wife, or his or her child or children, chargeable, or whereby she or they, or any of them, shall become chargeable to any parish, township, or place.

Held, that this clause did not apply to a married woman without separate property whose husband had previously deserted her and could not be found, although she ran away and left her children chargeable to the parish in which they were living.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace for the city and county of Bristol.

Upon the hearing of a certain information, dated the 2nd May 1874, taken upon the oath of and preferred by the appellant, a relieving officer duly authorised by the governor, deputy-governor, assistants, and guardians of the poor of the city of Bristol (hereinafter called "the Incorporation of the Poor of Bristol") in that behalf against the respondent, for that she, Mary Anne Cowie, late of the parish of St. James, in the said city and county, charwoman (herein called "the respondent,") had run away and left her two children, whereby they had become chargeable to the said parish; whereupon the appellant prayed that the respondent might be punished as a rogue and vagabond, and the said justices dismissed the same.

PETERS v. COWIE.

It was proved before the said justices, or admitted as facts by consent, that the respondent was married to a man named Cowie at St. Augustine's Church, in the said city and county, on the 4th November 1868; that there were two children, issue of such marriage, viz., Frederick and William, aged respectively eight and five years, and that such children became chargeable as aforesaid in April 1874, and have so continued chargeable until now; that the respondent's husband left her in July 1870, and has never since been heard of; that no steps have been taken by the Incorporation of the Poor of Bristol against him for deserting his wife and children, as the respondent did not come to reside in the district of the said incorporation until nearly four years after her husband left her; that about April 1874, a woman (not the respondent) took the two children to the appellant, whereby they became chargeable; that upon the information aforesaid a warrant was on the 2nd May 1874 granted for the respondent's apprehension, but, as her place of residence was not known, she was not taken thereupon until the 31st May 1876, when she was found living with her father at Liverpool; that the respondent is entirely without property, and has no lawful means of maintaining her children but by her labour as a servant or charwoman.

The respondent in defence stated that the youngest of the two children was born five months after her husband deserted her; that after she had been so left her father sent for her to keep house for him, but that he was not able to maintain the children; and that she, having no means to keep the children, went to live with her father, believing the guardians would proceed against her husband.

The words of the Vagrancy Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 4, under which the information was laid, are as follows: "Every person running away and leaving his wife, or his or her child or children, chargeable, or whereby she or they, or any of them, shall become chargeable to any parish, township, or place, shall be deemed to be a rogue and vagabond within the true intent and meaning of the Act, and it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him by the confession of such offender, or by evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses) to the House of Correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding three calendar months."

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the word "person" coupled with the pronoun "her" in that section would include a married woman, and that the respondent, having run away and left her children, whereby they became chargeable, ought to be punished.

The said justices, however, declined to convict, for the following among other reasons: They considered that if civil proceedings had been taken against the respondent to recover the cost of maintaining her children, she might have pleaded coverture; that she could only be made liable under sect. 14 of the Married Woman's Property Act 1870, if she could be shown to have "separate property," and even then her husband's liability would continue; but that, as this present charge was penal, a fortiori it would be wrong to convict her. Moreover, the Legislature has deemed it necessary by express enactment (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 6) to extend the provisions of the Vagrancy Act in order to make women who desert their bastard children, whereby they become chargeable to any parish or union, punishable as rogues and vagabonds, while both Acts are silent as to married women.

Bowen argued for the relieving officer, the appellant.—Of this Act 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3 enumerates various offences which render a person liable to be "deemed an idle and disorderly person within the true intent and meaning of this Act." Amongst them is a wilful refusal or neglect to maintain his or her family, if able wholly or in part to do so. This may perhaps have no application to a married woman, who, except under the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, could never maintain a family; but the gist of the offence in the next section, for which this information was laid, is the desertion of the family. Prima facie, the word "person" includes a woman either married, unmarried, or widow, and, as a matter of morality, the desertion of young children by a mother is even a greater crime than by a father. Further, all the other offences created by this section 4 are equally applicable to married women as to any one else. Moreover, it was a mistake of the magistrates to imagine that the provisions of recent legislation concerning the civil remedies by or against married women in any way affected their penal liabilities. (See Oxford Guardians v. Barton, 33 L. T. Rep. 375.) The justices certainly found some authority for their decision in Oke's Synopsis, title "Vagrant," where it is said, in a note at page 730 of the 12th edition, "neither can a married woman whose husband is transported or absent from any other cause be safely convicted of neglecting to maintain or deserting the children." In this, however, it is submitted Mr. Oke was wrong. As to the justices' last ground for refusing to convict, the case of Reg. v. Maude (11 L. J. 120, M. C.), which decided that a woman was not liable for deserting her bastard, was expressly based on the meaning of the word "child," which of itself is limited in its application to legitimate offspring. The result of that case was the passing of the 6th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which assumed the liability of a married mother for deserting her legitimate children. There can be no doubt this woman might have been convicted if her husband were dead, or under the Bastardy Act if her children had been illegitimate; the prima facie meaning of the word "person" ought in the same way to apply to the respondent under the circumstances of this case.

The respondent did not appear.

MELLOR, J.—I confess I have considerable difficulty in reconciling the various arguments which apply to this question, and I am clear that we must look at the section without any consideration of the effect of the Married Women's Property Act 1870. It would be a harsh construction to include a married woman in the liability for this offence, and I do not think it could have been intended to make the words relate to a woman whose husband was alive, but had deserted her. The first words of the clause admittedly cannot apply to a married woman; the words would not bear it, and it is not suggested that it is a crime for a wife to leave her husband chargeable. It appears to me to be a too stringent use of the words afterwards employed to make a married woman a criminal for escaping from the duties which her husband has deserted, and left her powerless to fulfil. I feel considerable hesitation, but I think the true construction of the words is to omit from their application such a case as this. My opinion therefore is that the magistrates were right.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I entirely agree in construing this section to consider only the state of the law at the time it was passed. I think, however, we may refer to a subsequent Act, in order to see the meaning which the Legislature has put upon the existing law. Mr. Bowen has rightly distinguished between the 3rd and 4th sections of this Act, but it would be a hard construction to impose a severe penalty, even for desertion of her children, upon a woman who was herself deserted by her husband, when it is admitted she could not be criminally liable if her husband had not deserted her. Therefore I should entertain no doubt, without any subsequent legislation, unless the words were very clear and precise. But until the Married Women's Property Act 1870, no married woman could be liable for the support of her children during the life of her husband; and this was so whether the children were her husband's or not, for I find that by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 57, every man who shall marry any woman having a child or children at the time of such marriage (whether legitimate or illegitimate), is liable to maintain such child or children as part of his family until the age of sixteen or the death of the mother. Sect. 14 of the Married Women's Property Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 93) would render this woman liable for the maintenance of her children if she had separate property, and she might then well be subject to the 4th section for deserting them; but I cannot think that it was intended at the time of the passing of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, to make the word person in the 4th section include a married woman whose husband had deserted her, for the purpose of this offence.

EARL OF WESTMORELAND (app.) v. SOUTHWICK AND OUNDLE (resps.)

Poor rate—Woods—Natural unimproved state—Rateable value—The Rating Act (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), s. 4.

The appellant's woodlands were assessed by quarter sessions at their rateable value if occupied in their natural and unimproved state, but it was found as a fact that they might be rendered worth a much larger sum to a tenant from year to year if a certain expenditure were incurred for grubbing up woods, draining, and road making.

Held, upon a case stated, that the quarter sessions were right, and that under the Rating Act 1874, sect. 4, woods were not to be rated on any assumption of their improved value upon alteration into land of a different description.

THIS was an appeal against the rating of woodlands in the parish of Southwick, and on the hearing thereof the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of Northampton reduced the rate subject to the following case:

1. The appellant is the owner and occupier of certain woodlands situate in the above parish, which are part of the ancient forest of Rockingham, hereinafter called "the said woodlands."

2. The said woodlands are kept in their natural and unimproved state as woods, and have timber growing upon them. There is no saleable underwood of any appreciable value upon the said woodlands.

3. By a poor rate made on the 25th Jan. 1876, the said woodlands were assessed at a rateable value of 14s. 3d. per acre, being at the rate of 13s. 3d. per annum as land in its natural and unimproved state, and 1s. per acre for sporting rights.

4. On the hearing of the said appeal the appellant's witnesses proved that if the said woodlands were occupied in their natural and unimproved state, and were treated without reference to capacity of improvement, the rateable value of them would be only 6s. per acre for purposes of occupation, and 1s. per acre for sporting purposes. It was elicited in cross-examination that the said woodlands in their natural and unimproved state only grow coarse grasses, fern, blackthorn, and other natural products of little value for purposes of occupation, and that they might be rendered worth such a sum to a tenant from year to year as would produce a rateable value of 24s. 6d. per acre if the following average sums per acre were expended upon improvement, that is to say: Grubbing up woods, 10l. per acre; draining, 7l. per acre; building, fencing, and making roads, 7l. per acre.

5. It was contended thereupon, by the respondents, that in assessing the rateable value of the said woodlands, the court of quarter sessions were not bound to assume that the said woodlands would always be occupied in their natural and unimproved state, but ought to consider what they would be worth if treated in this way, and that a prudent owner of land would so treat them that nothing could be deducted for grubbing up wood; and that, reckoning the interest on the other outlay of 14l. an acre at 4 per cent., the rateable value of the said woodlands would be 13s. an acre, plus 1s. per acre for sporting rights.

6. The appellant contended that in construing the Rating Act 1874, the court could not consider what might be the case if certain improvements were effected at a certain outlay, and that they were bound to assess the rateable value of the said woodlands on the supposition that they were let and occupied in their natural and unimproved state. The court decided in favour of the appellant, and reduced the rateable value from 14s. 3d. per acre to 7s. per acre.

If the court of quarter sessions were right in construing the Act as contended for by the appellant, the rate is to stand at 7s. per acre. If the court of quarter sessions were wrong in so construing it, then the rate is to be altered to 14s. per acre.

Sills and Jaques argued for the respondents, the Overseers of Southwick and the Guardians of Oundle Union.—The Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54) provides by sect. 4 that "The gross and rateable value of any land used for a plantation or a wood, or for the growth of saleable underwood, shall be estimated as follows: (a) If the land is used only for a plantation or a wood, the value shall be estimated as if the land, instead of being a plantation or a wood, were let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state; (b) If the land is used for the growth of saleable underwood, the value shall be estimated as if the land were let for that purpose; (c) If the land is used both for a plantation or a wood, and for the growth of saleable underwood, the value shall be estimated either as if the land were used only for a plantation or a wood, or as if the land were used only for the growth of the saleable underwood growing thereon, as the assessment committee may determine." Assuming the occupation to be on a renewable lease from year to year, we must find out what a hypothetical tenant can afford to pay as rent, if he makes the best use a prudent man can of his land, in order to obtain a profitable return. In the first place, by the statute, we must assume that the wood has been removed, and, therefore, the deduction of 10l. an acre for grubbing up woods cannot be allowed. In the next place the Legislature assumes that the landlord and tenant between them will lay out upon the land sufficient for the production of the utmost possible profit. [MELLOR, J.—The words are, "as if the land were let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state."] It is impossible to assume that anybody becoming a tenant would leave this land in the state described in paragraph 4. The effect of the statute is to rate an owner who keeps an unprofitable wood in the same way as if he indulged in no such luxury, and made the most prudent use of the land instead.

Mercwether and Ewins Bennett appeared for the appellant.

MELLOR, J.—We need not trouble the counsel for the appellant, for we are clearly of opinion that the sessions have come to a right conclusion. The statute says a wood is to be rated "as if the land instead of being a wood, were let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state." I quite agree that there may be a difficulty in fixing the quantum in accordance with this principle; but it is entirely a matter of fact, and a matter upon which the magistrates are better able to decide than the court. In this case we ought not to interfere with the judgment of the quarter sessions.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think this is a very clear case. For once the Legislature has spoken in unmistakable language, and the application of the words by the quarter sessions to the circumstances of this case is in my opinion perfectly right.

BRECON MARKETS COMPANY (apps.) v. ST. MARY'S, BRECON (resps.)

Poor rate—Market tolls—First charge—Rateable value.

By a local Act, the appellants were incorporated and authorised to regulate the market places belonging to the Corporation of Brecon, and to receive all tolls payable therefrom, which were thereby vested in them. They were, however, by another section, to pay to the corporation 210l. a year, to be charged on the scheduled tolls, markets, and market places, by the Act vested in the appellants, and to be a first charge on those tolls next after the expenses of recovering them. This annual sum was to be devoted by the corporation to the payment of incumbrances incurred by the building of the old market place. The appellants, under the authority of the Act, constructed new market places on land vested in them, and collected tolls from the old and new markets.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellants were not entitled to a deduction of this 210l. from the net annual value of their tolls in their assessment to the poor rate.

THIS was a case stated pursuant to the provisions of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, on appeal by the Brecon Markets Company against the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of St. Mary, in the borough of Brecon, in the county of Brecon, and the Assessment Committee of the Brecknock Union.

An Act was passed in 1 Vict. c. xii. (local and personal), for providing market places and regulating the markets within the borough of Brecon, and which is hereinafter called the Act of 1838.

By sect. 34 of that Act, the corporation were empowered to take tolls, rent, and stallage in respect of the market place to be erected by them under the provisions thereof, and to apply the moneys so taken, first, in defraying the cost of obtaining the Act; secondly, the costs, charges, and expenses of erecting the said market place; thirdly, "in retaining and setting apart such sums of money as, with the rents, tolls, and dues which shall be received by the corporation from any property belonging to them other than the tolls, rents, and stallage authorised to be taken by the above-mentioned Act, should be necessary to make up the annual sum of 210l., being the net annual income of the corporation from the whole of the tolls of the said borough and other property of or belonging to them," which said sum of 210l. was to be applied by the corporation, first, in defraying the interest of any incumbrance affecting their property, and the remainder to such purposes as the said corporation were then authorised and empowered to apply their net annual income.

At the time of the passing of the above mentioned Act the corporation owned in fee simple the Guildhall and Police Station, with other lands, and also the drift tolls and tolls of fairs in the borough. Under the provisions of the above mentioned Act, the corporation erected a new market house on the west side of the town (hereinafter called the General Market Place) for the sale of meat, butter, eggs, poultry, and general commodities, and removed their general market from the streets where it had been held from time immemorial to such new market house, and the sum of 210l. was regularly retained and set apart by them for the purposes mentioned in the last-mentioned Act.

By an Act passed 25 & 26 Vict. c. lxxxvi. (local and personal), for incorporating the Brecon Markets Company and for vesting in them and authorising them to maintain and regulate the markets and fairs in Brecon and other property of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Brecon, and for the providing for discharge of liabilities of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, and for other purposes (hereinafter called the Act of 1862), the appellants were incorporated.

By sect. 20 of the Act of 1862 the Act of 1838 was repealed, but subject to the provisions of the Act of 1862.

By sect. 21 of the Act of 1862 the markets and fairs in the borough of Brecon and the market house, market places and places for holding fairs in the borough, and the works and conveniences connected therewith, and all tolls, rents, stallages, dues, and other moneys payable in respect of the markets and fairs, market houses and market places, works and conveniences, and the drift tolls payable on the goods of persons passing through the borough and the manor or reputed manor, and all messuages, lands, chief rents, tenements, and hereditaments of the corporation, and all other the real, personal, or mixed estates of the corporation were vested in the company, subject, nevertheless, to the charges and incumbrances affecting the same.

By sect. 22 it was provided that the Guildhall and Police Station should be expressly excepted and reserved to the corporation as their own property.

By sect. 27, all chief rents, tolls, rents, stallages, and other dues and payments immediately before that Act due and payable to the corporation were to be payable to the Brecon Markets Company.

By sect. 42 the company were to pay to the corporation "the yearly sum of 210*l.* by equal half-yearly payments;" and by sect. 43, the said sum of 210*l.* so payable to the corporation was "by this Act charged on the scheduled tolls, markets, and market places by this Act vested in the company, and shall be the first charge on those scheduled tolls next after the costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to the collection and recovery thereof, and shall be the first charge on the said markets and market places."

By sect. 44, the sum of 210*l.* so payable to the corporation was substituted for the 210*l.* by sect. 34 of the recited Act, and the corporation were directed to apply a part thereof towards defraying the interest of any incumbrance which at the time of the passing of the Act of 1838 affected any of their property other than the scheduled tolls, and which at the time of the passing of the Act of 1862 remained undischarged, and the remainder was to be applied to such purposes and in such manner as they were by law at the time of the passing of the recited Act authorised and empowered to apply their net annual income referred to in that section.

By sect. 81, the several tolls, rents, and stallages by the Act of 1862 authorised to be taken, were vested in the company as their own proper moneys.

Under the provisions of the Act of 1862 the company acquired new land on the east side of the town, and erected thereon a new cattle markets place, in which the cattle markets are now held.

991*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* was raised under the Act of 1838; 3750*l.* (that is 3000*l.* shares and 750*l.* loan), under the Act of 1862; by the operation of the last Act, and sales of land under it, the amount raised under the Act of 1838 has been reduced to 8414*l.* 14*s.*, and this amount ranks after the 750*l.* borrowed under the Act of 1862, and after the 3000*l.* raised by shares under it. No dividend has been earned or paid on the shares.

The company owns the soil on which the general market was erected under the provisions of the Act of 1838, and also the soil on which the cattle market was erected under the Act of 1862.

The receipts of the company arise from (1) the tolls, rents, and stallage of the general market, house and adjoining buildings erected under the Act of 1838; (2) the tolls of the cattle market erected under the Act of 1862; (3) the tolls of the corn market; (4) the tolls of the weighing machine; (5) the tolls of cattle and horses sold in the streets at fairs; (6) tolls for pitching shows at fairs; and (7) the drift tolls or tolls for passing under the 4th schedule of the Act of 1862.

It is admitted that Nos. 3, 5, and 7 are not liable to rate, and as No. 4 is rated separately, it need not be further considered for the purposes of this case. The gross receipts from these various sources are agreed, and it is also agreed that the net receipts from Nos. 3, 5, and 7, fixed at 40*l.* per annum, shall for the purposes of this case be primarily applied in part discharge of the sum of 210*l.*, payable to the corporation, reducing that sum accordingly, and which reduced sum is hereinafter referred to as the 170*l.* per annum. The amount proper to be deducted from the gross receipts of Nos. 1, 2, and 6, for rates and taxes, and other payments necessary to maintain the property in a state to command a rent (irrespective of the 170*l.* per annum), has also been agreed between the parties. But it is maintained by the appellants that such deduction should be increased by the 170*l.* per annum, payable to the corporation under the circumstances before named, while it is contended by the respondents that no further reduction ought to be made.

It is agreed that the Act of 1838, so far as the same is not repealed, and the Act of 1862, shall form part of this case.

The question for the opinion of the High Court of Justice is: Whether the appellants are entitled to have the 170*l.* per annum, so payable to the corporation, or any part thereof, deducted from the gross rateable value of the property within named.

H. Matthews, Q.C. and Warry, argued for the appellants, that the sum of 210*l.*, which was paid by way of annuity to the corporation, was a deduction which ought to be allowed them from the gross receipts of the tolls before arriving at the rateable value; that, supposing a tenant tendered for a lease of the tolls and market places, he would put out of his calculation the sum of 210*l.*, as being money appropriated to the corporation, and would offer a sum of money as rent, under the Parochial Assessment Act, putting aside all consideration of the sum. It was also contended that the Brecon Markets Act of 1862, which created the company, reserved this sum of money to the corporation, and thus enacted how the income of the corporation was to be spent, showing that it was intended by that Act that the tenant of the company would be a mere conduit pipe, by which the above sum was conveyed to the corporation; that the company was only allowed to come into existence upon payment of this sum, and that no act of theirs created the charge upon the tolls and markets, and that upon the proper construction of the Act this sum was payable even before taxes. The following cases were referred to:

[Q.B. Div.]

Mayor of Worcester v. Droitchich, 45 L. J. 81 M. C.;
Reg. v. Rhymney Railway Company, 38 L. J. 75,
 M. C.

B. T. Williams, Q.C., for the respondents, contended that, inasmuch as the sum of 210*l.* was received out of the tolls of the market, it was immaterial what the company did with it; the parish were entitled to include it in their gross rateable value, and that, supposing instead of paying this sum by way of annuity, they had bought the property of the corporation and raised the money by mortgage, they would not have been allowed to deduct the sum paid by way of interest upon the mortgage. This case is distinguishable from Mayor of Worcester v. Droitchich, because there the company were limited by Act of Parliament in the beneficial enjoyment of their property.

MELLOR, J.—I think we can have no doubt about our judgment in this case, although the contention on the appellants' behalf has been most ingeniously argued. The market company are by themselves or their lessees to receive the whole of the tolls, which are the profits derived from the land. There is an appropriation of money from the tolls for certain purposes, but nothing in the Act of Parliament affects this question as to the rateable amount. Here all the appellants' property is liable to contribute to this rate; the parish cannot be deprived of that portion of the assessment of the profits of the land, which, by an arrangement between the market company and the corporation, is appropriated as a first charge to the corporation. It is not provided that the company are to receive certain specific tolls, nor are such tolls vested in them by the Act. Any other mode of rating than that which has been adopted would be contrary to the established principles, and unfair to the other rateable property in the parish.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question for us is what should be the rateable value of these premises. By the Parochial Assessment Act 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 99) the rate is to be made "upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent." It is not so difficult to suppose a letting in this case as it is in some others where the same principles must be made to apply. All the tolls paid for the use of the market are to go first into the hands of the appellants, and the deductions allowed by the statute must, therefore, be made from that amount. The whole of the tolls are vested in the appellants, and no part is specifically, as has been contended, vested in the corporation. There is an arrangement in the nature of rent between the appellants and the corporation, but, even although it is rightly called a first charge upon the appellants' receipts, it cannot come within the authorised deductions for the computation of the rateable value.

HOOPER (app.) v. KENSHOLE (resp.)

Market tolls—Shop—Open places—Licensed hawkers—Previous claim—10 Vict. c. 14, s. 13; 30 Vict. c. 19, s. 20.

The respondent was selling manufactured goods of various kinds in the skittle ground of an inn situated within the limits of the Exmouth Market, as constituted by a local Act, without licence from the undertakers, as he had often done before, without any toll being claimed.

The respondent was an auctioneer, acting for the owner of the goods, who was a licensed hawker; and the place of sale was under cover, but open to the public, and let for the purpose of the sale by the landlord of the inn.

By sect. 20 of the local Act, any person, except a hawker, not having a licence, is liable to a penalty on conviction for selling or exposing for sale in any open place within the limits of the market, not being the new market place, or his own dwelling house or shop, any article for the sale of which tolls are thereby granted.

The justices refused to convict the respondent on the grounds that tolls had not been demanded before, that the place was a shop, and not open, and that the respondent was the agent of a licensed hawker.

Held, upon a case stated, that the justices were wrong on each and every of these grounds, and that the respondent ought to have been convicted.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace for the county of Devon.

At a petty sessions holden at the court house, Woodbury, in and for the division of Woodbury, in the county of Devon, on 24th Jan. 1876, an information preferred by Henry Horn Hooper, hereinafter called the appellant, against Robert Kenshole, hereinafter called the respondent, under the 13th and 14th sections of The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 14), and the 20th section of The Exmouth Market Act 1867 (30 Vict. c. 19), in which Act the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 is incorporated, charging for that, he the said respondent did, on the 27th Oct. 1875, sell or expose for sale, within the limits of the Exmouth market, not being in the new market place, nor his own dwelling house or shop, certain manufactured goods or merchandise without a licence from the undertakers so to do, and without having paid the market toll, was heard and determined by the said justices, the said appellant and respondent both being then present, and upon such hearing, as before mentioned, they dismissed the same information. Thereupon the following case was stated:

The appellant's solicitors, in opening the case for the appellant, relied upon the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Fearon v. Mitchell (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 690), and McHole v. Davies (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. D. p. 60), Carter v. Parkhouse on appeal before the Queen's Bench on the 11th Jan. 1870, and Pope v. Whalley (34 L. J. 76, M. C.). He also put in a public notice which it was admitted was published by order of the trustees under the will of the late Lord Rolle, who are the undertakers under the Exmouth Market Act 1867, of which the following is a copy:

PUBLIC NOTICE.

Exmouth Market Act 1867.

The trustees of Lord Rolle's will hereby give you notice that on and after Monday the 19th April 1869, the present market house in the Strand will be closed, and the market will be removed and will henceforth be held at the new market place in Chapel-street, where the weekly market will be held as heretofore on Saturdays.

The limits of the new market are the limits for the time being of the district of the Local Board of Health for Exmouth. Within those limits it will, after the 19th April 1869, be lawful for any person not duly licensed to sell or expose goods for sale in any open place, not being the new market place, or his or her own dwelling house or shop, or to cry for sale or sell from door to door, any fish, poultry, eggs, butter, fruit, herbs, vegetables, or any other commodity, without having first paid the tolls granted by the Market Act. Offenders will, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty of 40s.

For stalls or places in the new market place, and for licences to sell in open places within the limits of the market, apply to Mr. E. J. Carter, Exmouth. Dated this 30th March 1869. By order of the trustees.

B. H. LIFSCOMB, Steward.

By sect. 18 of the Exmouth Market Act 1867, the several tolls specified in the first and second schedules to the Act from time to time may be demanded and taken by the officers of the undertakers and by the lessees of the undertakers and their officers respectively.

Henry Horn Hooper sworn.—I am lessee of the market tolls at Exmouth. I have not got the lease yet, but I am to have it for seven years. On the 27th Oct. last, I saw Mr. Kenshole in the Dolphin Inn skittle ground, about seven or eight o'clock in the evening. He was selling various manufactured goods, watches, sheets, &c. I said to him that he was selling manufactured goods within the limits of the local board district not being the new market place, for which he was liable to pay toll. He said, "I don't come under your Act," or something to that effect; "and if you'll stop till after the sale is over I'll go and have a glass of grog with you." I went away. Mr. Kenshole would have had to pay me 1s. if he had occupied a stall in the market for the sale of manufactured goods, and in order to sell the goods out of the market place he ought to have got a licence to do so under the 19th section of the Exmouth Market Act. The next day I went to the Dolphin skittle alley at the same time, and I saw Mr. Kenshole selling again.

Cross-examined.—I don't know how many years Mr. Kenshole has done the same thing, but I believe he has; but this is the first time he had done so since I have been the lessee as far as I know. I don't recollect inviting him to leave the Dolphin, and come up to my inn. Since October last I saw Mr. Kenshole in Exeter, and said if he would give me his word that he would come and sell in the market place when he came to Exmouth again, I would not take any proceedings against him for what he had done. He said, "I cannot say that I will come and sell there. You must get that from Mr. Bannister." I said I would go and see him if I had time, but I had not. I did not tell him I had a good room in my house where he could have a look and key. I said there was plenty of room in the market, and he could have a place there with a look and key. There is a doorway to go into a skittle alley from the yard and another from the house. It is part and parcel of the Dolphin inn. It is under cover. Mr. Kenshole was selling at the end of the alley, and the goods were exposed for sale on a platform. I have never known it let, but twice since I have the tolls. Mr. Kenshole denied his liability to pay toll. I knew the goods were Mr. Bannister's.

The respondent's solicitor took the following points, firstly, that the 20th section says "No person shall sell in an open place within the limits of the market, not being his own dwelling house or shop," and contended that the place where the goods were sold was a shop. Secondly, that Mr.

Bannister, being a licensed hawkker, had a right to send his goods to Exmouth for sale, and quoted Manson v. Hope (31 L. J. 191, M.C.), and that he had a right to employ Mr. Kenshole, as a licensed auctioneer, as his agent.

Appellant admitted that the place where the goods were sold was let for the sale of the goods on the 27th and 28th Oct. last.

For the defence:

Henry John Bannister sworn.—My father is a pawnbroker in Exeter; he sent a lot of unredeemed pledges of the value of 400l. 500l. consisting of watches, chains, &c. to Exmouth to be sold. Mr. Kenshole was employed to sell them. Two sales of that sort took place last year at the same place, one before October. Several sales of a like nature have taken place for years at the same place. My father is a licensed hawkker. I produce his licence. The place where the sale took place is covered with a roof. The licence was taken out on the 27th Oct. A table was put up and the things put on it. My father was not present. No toll was asked for on former occasions.

Cross examined.—My father did not go to the sales on the 27th or 28th Oct. I assisted in making up the parcels of goods. There were eight or nine. They went to Exmouth by carrier. Some had my father's name on the packages painted, and the word "Exeter." The words "licensed hawkker" were not put upon the packages. They were separate packages, and all put into the carrier's cart. My father's name was not painted with his address, and the words "licensed hawkker" on the carrier's cart. The sale was advertised by bills. I have not got one. My father's name and address, together with his trade, and the fact of his being a licensed hawkker, were not put in the bills, nor were they upon the skittle alley inside or outside.

Re-examined.—My father has been present on former occasions, but he was not this time as he was ill.

Henry Hawkins sworn.—I am the landlord of the Dolphin. The place let to Mr. Bannister is an inclosed place with a roof over it; there was a table erected for the goods, and where the auctioneer stood. The place has been let to the same people before. I never heard of any toll being asked for.

Cross-examined.—The place is my skittle alley. It is not open at the sides or ends. It is lighted with gas at night. There are several windows in it. There is a door at the side leading into the street.

Re-examined.—During the time Mr. Bannister rented it no one had a right to go into it. I have generally let it to Mr. Bannister for two days.

The said justices, being of opinion that the place had been let before for the same purpose without any toll being demanded, and also that it was not an open place, but a shop, gave their determination against the appellant as before stated, and dismissed the information.

The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore, are firstly, whether any toll could be demanded, as none had heretofore been asked under similar circumstances. Secondly, whether the place where the goods were sold was an open place within the limits of the Exmouth Market Act within the meaning of that Act, or whether it could be considered as the respondent's own dwelling house or shop within the meaning of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, and the Exmouth Market Act. Thirdly, whether the respondent, being an auctioneer, had any right to sell as such or as agent for Mr. Bannister, a licensed hawkker, who was not present himself at the time of the sale, and who had not complied with the requirements and provisions of the Hawkers' Act in having his name, address, and calling painted on the different packages and cart, and also inside or outside of the skittle alley.

Bowen argued for complainant, the appellant.—As to the first point, even if the present lessee had allowed sales of this kind without taking tolls, he could not be estopped from claiming them now; but it appears that this was the first occasion of the respondent's sale of which the lessee was aware. On the second point, which arises under the 20th section of the Exmouth Market Act 1867, the word "open" must mean with reference to the public, not uncovered to the sky. The cases cited before the justices have no application; Pope v. Whalley (34 L. J. 76, M. C.) merely defines a shop, and only to that extent touches this question. Both that case and Fearon v. Mitchell (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 690) were decided upon the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847. So also was the case of McHole v. Davies (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 59). By the 13th section of that Act (10 Vict. c. 14), "After the market place is open for public use every person other than a licensed hawk, who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings." The words of the 20th section of the Exmouth Market Act 1867 (30 Vict. c. 19) are, "If any person, not having a licence from the undertakers so to do, sell, or expose for sale, in any open place within the limits of the market, not being the new market place or his own dwelling house or shop, any article in respect of the sale or exposure for sale whereof in the new market place any toll is by this Act granted, every person so offending shall, for every such offence, forfeit not exceeding forty shillings: Provided that nothing in this Act shall prejudice or interfere with the lawful exercise by licensed hawkers of the calling for which they are so licensed, or restrain or prohibit any person who shall have first paid the tolls by this Act granted from carrying or crying for sale, or selling from door to door, within the said limits, any fish, poultry, eggs, butter, fruit, herbs, or vegetables, or any other commodity usually so carried or cried."

HUMPHREYS v. COUSINS.

[C. P. Div.]

The respondent did not appear.

MELLOR, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the justices in this case ought to have convicted the respondent. This was not a shop of the respondent within the meaning of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, as defined by the cases cited, nor could it possibly be a shop within the meaning of the Exmouth Market Act 1867. The place was thrown open to the public by the respondent for the purpose of selling his wares, and he became, therefore, liable to a conviction. It is not necessary even to consider the previous payment of tolls, the only material question being as to whether this was a shop or open place, the case must be remitted to the magistrates to sentence the respondent to a penalty.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. No question of previous tolls can possibly arise, and I am clearly of opinion this was an open place within the Exmouth Act, and not the respondent's shop.

HUMPHREYS v. COUSINS.

Escape of sewage—Damage to adjoining premises—Occupier's liability.

An occupier of land can recover against an adjoining occupier for damage caused by noxious substances coming on to his premises, in a way in which he is not bound to receive them, from any artificial structure on the adjoining premises, although the adjoining occupier is ignorant of the facts which cause the injury, and there is no negligence.

Plaintiff and defendant occupied adjoining premises. An old drain commenced on defendant's premises, passed under other houses, came back through defendant's premises, and then passed under plaintiff's. The drain got out of repair under defendant's premises, whereby sewage and water escaped into plaintiff's premises, and caused damage. Defendant did not know that the drain turned back through his premises and under plaintiff's, or that it was out of repair, and was not guilty of negligence.

Held, on motion for judgment, that plaintiff was entitled to recover.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, the occupier of the Old Red Lion publichouse, number 339, Strand, against the defendant, who was the occupier of the adjoining premises, number 6 Helmet-court, to recover damages for injury caused to the plaintiff's premises and stock-in-trade by water and sewage coming into his cellar from the defendant's premises. The case was tried at Westminster before Blackburn, J., who reserved leave to enter judgment for the plaintiff for 30*l.*, the amount of damages assessed by the jury.

Nov. 10 and 15, 1876.—The case came before the court on motion for judgment, and was argued by Talfourd Salter, Q.C. and O. J. Scott (Glyn with them), for the plaintiff, and by Robinson, Serjt. and Shortt, for the defendant. The facts, the findings of the jury, and the arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the court. In addition to the authorities noticed in the judgment, the following were referred to

Our. adv. vult.

Jan. 12, 1877.—The judgment of the court (Denman and Lindley, J.J.) was delivered by Denman, J. The plaintiff and the defendant in this case are tenants and occupiers of adjoining houses; and the plaintiff, upon the facts and findings of the jury, now complains of injuries caused to his premises and stock in trade by water and sewage coming into his cellar from the defendant's premises. The jury have found in effect that the injuries complained of are so caused, and have assessed the damages sustained by the plaintiff at 30*l.* The plaintiff has moved for judgment for the amount of the damages so assessed. The facts relied on as a defence to the action are in substance as follows. The water and sewage in question came from an old drain, which commenced on the defendant's premises, and received his sewage, ran under and received the sewage of several other houses, turned back through the defendant's premises, ran under the plaintiff's cellar, and then away to a public sewer. This drain was not known to the defendant to turn back and run through his premises under those of the plaintiff, and was not known to be out of repair. It was, however, in fact, out of repair by reason of age and wear and tear, and its defective state under the defendant's premises was the real cause of the mischief. The jury found that the defective state of the drain was not attributable to any negligence of the defendant. Upon these facts it is to be observed at the outset that the water and sewage which injured the plaintiff came on to the defendant's land by an artificial drain made for the convenience of the defendant and the other persons whose houses were higher up. We have not, therefore, to deal as the court had in Smith v. Kenrick (7 C. B. 515) with the case of water or other matter coming naturally from or through the defendant's land on to the plaintiff's. Bearing this in mind, it appears to us that it is incumbent on the defendant to show what right he had to allow the filth brought artificially on his land to escape on to the land of the plaintiff. The prima facie right of every occupier of a piece of land is to enjoy that land free from all invasion of filth or other matter coming from any artificial structure on land adjoining. He may be bound by prescription or otherwise to receive such matter, but the burden of showing that he is so bound rests on those who seek to impose an easement upon him. Moreover, this right of every occupier of land is an incident of possession, and does not depend on the acts or omissions of other people; it is independent of what they may know or not know of the state of their own property, and independent of the care or want of care which they may take of it. That these are the rights of an occupier of land appears to us to be established by the cases of Smith v. Kenrick (7 C. B. 515); Baird v. Williamson (15 C. B., N. S., 376); Fletcher v. Rylands (3 H. & C. 774; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 265; L. Rep. 3 H. L. 330), and the older authorities there referred to, and the recent decision of Broder v. Saillard (L. Rep. 2 Ch. D. 692). In the present case the plaintiff was bound to receive sewage from the defendant's land through the old drain, but not otherwise; he was not bound to receive it through the surrounding earth or the party wall, through which, in fact, it came. Further, as the plaintiff was the occupier of a servient tenement, he was clearly not bound to repair the drain or any of the dominant tenements. The plaintiff's rights, therefore, have been infringed, and the loss he has sustained cannot be said to be damnum absque injuria. (See the note to Ashby v. White (1 Sm. L. C. 263, 6th edit.) But the question still remains, has the defendant infringed those rights, and is he the person liable for the infringement? It is said this case is not like Tenant v. Goldwin (1 Salk. 360) or Fletcher v. Rylands because in both of those cases the defendant himself brought on his land that which occasioned the mischief, whereas in this case the defendant received the sewage, and was bound so to do. So far, however, as we can judge some of the sewage must, in fact, have come from the defendant's own premises in the first instance; but even if this is not to be taken as proved, we are of opinion that as between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was the defendant's duty to keep the sewage which he was himself bound to receive, from passing from his own premises to the plaintiff's premises otherwise than along the old accustomed channel. This duty is incidental to the defendant's possession of land (See Russell v. Shenton, 3 Q. B. 449), and is the necessary consequence of the right of the plaintiff. That duty, like its correlative right, is independent of negligence on the part of the defendant, and independent of his knowledge or ignorance of the existence of the drain. The duty of the defendant himself to receive the sewage evidently did not depend on such knowledge, and the fact that he unknowingly receives it affords no justification for allowing it to escape in a manner in which he had no right to let it pass. Fletcher v. Rylands is a strong authority to show that this conclusion is correct, for although in that case the defendant knew of the existence of his reservoir, he did not know that the ground underneath it was in such a state as to render its existence dangerous. It was strenuously but ineffectually urged that he could not be liable in respect of damage caused by a state of things of which he knew nothing. Bell v. Twentymen (1 Q. B. 766) is a strong authority to the like effect. Indeed, if it be once established that the plaintiff's rights have been infringed by the defendant, and that the plaintiff has been thereby damaged, the fact that the defendant infringed them unknowingly, and without negligence, cannot avail him as a defence to an action by the plaintiff: (See Lambert v. Bessey, Sir T. Raym. 421.) In short we think that the true doctrine is contained in the following passage of the judgment of Blackburn, J. in the case of Hodgkinson v. Ennor (4 B. & S. 241). "I take the law to be as stated in Tenant v. Goldwin (2 Ld. Raym. 1089; Salk. 21, 360; 6 Mod. 311; Holt. 500) that you must not injure the property of your neighbour, and consequently if filth is created on any man's land, then, in the quaint language of the report in Salk. 361, 'he, whose dirt it is, must keep it that it may not trespass.'" The case of Hammond v. Vestry of St. Pancras (30 L. T. Rep., N. S., 296; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 316) which was relied upon by the counsel for the defendant, appears to us to have no real bearing upon the present case, inasmuch as the whole argument and decision of that case turned upon the effect of the clauses of a particular Act of Parliament imposing certain duties upon a public body, and no question arose as to the common law liability of the occupier of adjoining premises (see the judgment of Brett, J. at p. 322). It was, however, contended that the present case was governed by Ross v. Fedden (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 966; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 661), but that was a case in which the plaintiff and the defendant occupied separate stories in the same house, and it was expressly distinguished from a case like the present, which depends simply on those principles of law which regulate the rights and duties of the occupiers of adjacent pieces of land. The case of Carstairs v. Taylor (L. Rep. 6 Ex. 217) is also clearly distinguishable on the same ground. The question whether the defendant was bound as between himself and the plaintiff to repair the drain, or so much of it as ran under the defendant's land, was much discussed, but does not really arise, for the plaintiff's cause of action, as originally relied upon, is not that the defendant omitted to repair the drain, but that he omitted to prevent the sewage on his land from coming on the plaintiff's land otherwise than as the plaintiff was bound to receive it. If the defendant had prevented the sewage from so coming the plaintiff would have had no cause of action whether the drain was repaired or not. The defendant may perhaps be entitled as between himself and the owners and occupiers of the other dominant tenements to call upon them to contribute to the expenses of keeping his and their common drain in repair, and it may be, that the plaintiff might have sued all those owners or occupiers, including the defendant, for the damage which he has sustained by reason of such non-repair. But, even if the plaintiff could have sued them all he was not, in our opinion, bound to do so; he was not bound to rest his case on his ability to establish a duty on them to repair the drain, and a breach of such duty by all who used it. Lastly, it was contended that as the defendant was only a tenant and not an owner he was not responsible; but he was in point of law tenant, and as such responsible to the plaintiff (see Russell v. Shenton, ubi sup.), and he could himself have maintained an action for any invasion of such possession. For these reasons our judgment is for the plaintiff.

STRINGER (app.) v. SYKES (resp.).

[Ex. Div.]

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Highway—Locomotive Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70), sect. 3—Steam locomotive—Construction of wheels of—“Shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in.”—Width of shoes—Continuous “bearing surface.”

*By sect. 3 of the Locomotive Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70) “every locomotive drawing any waggon or carriage shall have the tires of the wheels thereof not less than 9in. in width . . . and the wheels of every locomotive shall be cylindrical and smooth soled, or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in. ;” and a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* is imposed on the owner of any locomotive used contrary to the foregoing provisions for every such offence on summary conviction.*

The appellant was the owner of and used a steam locomotive, the tires of the hind wheels of which were 18in. in width, and upon and across the outer circumference of the tires, extending from one edge of them to the other, in a diagonal or oblique direction, were fastened bars or “shoes” of iron, 4½in. broad and about 20in. in length, an interval or space of 3in. being left between each shoe. A bearing surface of 10½in. in width, taking two shoes together, was thereby always obtained at any point on the road, although, owing to the interval between the “shoes,” it was not continuous.

On an information against the appellant for using a locomotive, the wheels of which were not constructed in accordance with the above section of the statute, the magistrates convicted and fined him, being of opinion that the bearing surface should be continuous, and that these “shoes” were not such as were contemplated by the Act, and upon appeal, therefrom, it was Held by the Exchequer Division (Kelly C.B., and Cleasby B., the latter concurring with much doubt), that the conviction was right, and that the “bearing surface” of each “shoe” on the road should be of a width not less than 9in. in itself.

CASE stated for the opinion of the court by two justices of the peace for the West Riding of Yorkshire, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 on the application of the appellant George Edward Stringer, who was dissatisfied with the determination of the justices under the following circumstances:

1. On the 21st Oct. 1876, George Sykes (the respondent) a superintendent of police, duly laid an information before a justice of the peace under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70, s. 3, against the said appellant, for that the appellant on the 20th Oct. inst. at Kilman Thorpe, in the said West Riding, being the owner of a certain locomotive engine propelled by steam power, did use the said locomotive engine upon a certain highway there situate, the wheels of the said locomotive engine not being constructed in conformity with the statute in such case made and provided.”

2. On the 15th Nov. inst., the said information came on to be heard before us, two justices of the peace, at a petty sessions at Barnsley aforesaid, when the said Geo. Edwd. Stringer, and also the said Geo. Sykes, appeared before the said justices.

3. Upon the hearing of the information the said Geo. Sykes called the following witness in support of the said information.

William Eagland, of Clayton West, police constable, who said as follows:

On Friday, the 20th Oct. inst., I was on duty near Park Hill, when I saw an engine leave with two trucks. The engine belonged to the defendant. It went on the Wakefield-road, through Sassett, into High Bridge Lane. When it got to a steep part the engine stopped. I then measured the wheels in the presence of the engine driver and stoker. The hind wheels were 18in. broad; bars, across, 4½in. broad, and ½in. thick. The distance between the bars 3in. I then measured the front wheels, and they were 9in. broad. The engine was registered 10 tons, No. 3001. The front wheels were smooth.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ferns, solicitor, on behalf of the defendant:

It appeared that the front wheels were in accordance with the Act, and I did not think the hind wheels had a bearing surface of 9in.; not a continuous bearing surface, I mean. I found spaces between the bars of the hind wheels which are commonly called “shoes,” and which were laid 3in. apart. They might vary the eighth or the sixteenth of an inch. The model produced is a true representation of the hind wheel. I did not think it in accordance with the Act, in consequence of the spaces being left between each shoe. I had been specially directed towards this engine the day before. I reported it to Sergeant Batty. I cannot fix a date when my attention was first called to it; perhaps it was three weeks ago. Sergeant Batty called my attention. No one higher than a police officer called my attention to the engine. I have reports of cases tried in this court. I read a case tried at Pontefract some time ago; that called my attention to this engine. I did not think the wheels were in accordance with the Act of Parliament on account of the space between the shoes and the weight not being continuous, and the smooth surface of the wheel not being continuous.

STRINGER (app.) v. SYKES (resp.).

[Ex. Div]

This being the respondent's case, Mr. Ferns addressed the Court on behalf of the appellant, and called the following witness :

David Greigg, of the firm of Messrs. Fowler and Co., steam plough manufacturers, of Leeds, who said as follows :

Traction engines are made at our place. I know the engine the property of Mr. Stringer. The model produced is a correct one of the wheels. There is a 9in. bearing surface or more on the hind wheels of that engine. If no shoes were on the wheels it would have a very injurious effect upon the roads from the slipping of the smooth wheels, and the difficulty in a progressive movement. The bars across are known by the name of "shoes" throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland. They move over the road much more easily, and consolidate the road, acting as a roller upon it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Sykes, the respondent :

I mean a continuous bearing surface, with a smooth—perfectly smooth—sole—measure two soles together, and you will get over 9in. of width of continued smooth surface at any point. The bars upon the wheels are for the protection of the main frame of the wheels. The bars have a tendency to bite the roads. If the bars were off the hind wheels the engine could work only half a load, and would injure the roads much more than it does now. The engine could not work without the shoes with the weight it had on that day. If it did not go at all it would deteriorate the road much by making holes in it. I consider that in soft weather a wheel of that description would go better than one of a smooth surface and do less damage. I have seen a hundred engines at work with smooth tires.

Re-examined by Mr. Ferns :

I am now speaking from practical knowledge. Supposing the engine was shod with smooth hind bars, the wheels would slip, tear up, and make a hole in the road. I consider the shoes a necessity.

7. The respondent contended that the Act required that the wheels of such engine should be smooth soled, or used with "shoes," or "other bearing surface" of a continuous bearing width of nine inches, and not that interstices of three inches, more or less, should intervene between each of the so-called "shoes."

8. Mr. Ferns contended, on behalf of the appellant, that the wheels were in accordance with the statute, and were "cylindrical," and had a bearing surface of more than nine inches, taking the measurement across the wheels, by which a width of a little more than four and a half inches was gained upon each of the two shoes that would bear upon the ground at one time.

9. We, the said justices, after hearing the whole of the evidence, fined the appellant 3*l.*, and costs 12*s.* 6*d.*, together 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, for the said offence, we being of opinion that the hind wheels attached to such engine are not constructed in accordance with the statute, and that the so-called "shoes" are not such as are contemplated by the Act.

10. The question of law arising is, Have the hind wheels a smooth soled bearing surface of 9in. as required by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70, sect. 3, and are the so-called "shoes" in accordance with the statute? And the opinion of the court is therefore asked upon this point.

The 3rd section of the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70, upon which the case turned, is as follows :

Sect. 3: Every locomotive propelled by steam, or any other than animal power, not drawing any carriage, and not exceeding in weight three tons, shall have the tires of the wheels thereof not less than 3in. in width, and for every ton or fractional part thereof additional weight, the tires of the wheels thereof shall be increased 1in. in width; and every locomotive drawing any wagon or carriage shall have the tires of the wheels thereof not less than 9in. wide, but no locomotive shall exceed 7*ft.* in width or 12 tons in weight, except as hereinafter provided. And the wheels of every locomotive shall be cylindrical and smooth soled, or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in. And the owner or owners of any locomotive used contrary to the foregoing provisions shall for every such offence, on conviction, forfeit any sum not exceeding 5*l.*

It appeared from the model of the wheel referred to in the case, and which was produced at the hearing before the magistrates below, and in the court during the argument of the appeal, that the outer surface of the tires of the hind wheels in question were 18in. broad, and that the bars or "shoes" of iron were each of them 4½in. broad and about 20in. in length from end to end, and that they were bolted on upon and across the outer surface of the tires transversely from one edge of the tire to the other in an oblique or diagonal direction, and that there was an interval of space of 3in. between each shoe.

Appellant's points.—That the conviction is bad on the grounds that the hind wheels of the locomotive engine at the date in the information mentioned were used with shoes having a bearing surface of a width of not less than 9in. within the meaning of sect. 3 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70.

Respondent's points.—First. That the conviction was right; secondly, that the wheels of the engine were not used with "shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in." within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70, s. 3; thirdly, that the engine or locomotive constructed as described in the case was used contrary to the provisions of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70.

Forbes (with him was Day, Q.C.), for the appellant, contended that the appellant had complied with the provisions of the statute (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70), which it must be remembered was a penal one, and so should receive the strictest interpretation. The 3rd section, which was the section in question, directed that the wheels of these locomotive engines should be "cylindrical and smooth soled, or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in." Now the wheels here were "cylindrical," and though not "smooth soled," they yet fulfilled the alternative requirement of the section by "being used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in." [KELLY, C.B.—Which do you call the width?] Across the rim or tire of the wheel from one side to the other. The hind wheels were 18in. broad, and these iron bars or "shoes," as they were technically and universally called, were about 20in. in length from end to end one way, and 4½in. in breadth from side to side the other way. They were fastened or bolted on upon the surface of the rims or outer circumference of the wheels, being placed transversely in an oblique or diagonal position across the circumference of the wheel, and there was a space of about 3in. between each bar. The evidence of an engineer called on the part of the appellant proved conclusively that, taking two shoes together, there was always a bearing surface or pressure upon the road of not less than 10½in. The question is whether the Act requires the "width" to be continuous, or whether it is sufficient that the "bearing surface" should be of that width, though it might not be "continuous." [KELLY, C.B.—What is the object of the 3in. interval between the shoes, and why, if without the shoes there would be a "smooth soled" wheel, are the shoes used?] The interval is in order the better to bite the road, and give leverage to draw the load. Without the shoes the road would be seriously damaged, as explained by the appellant's witness, David Greigg. To maintain the respondent's construction, the word "continuous" must be imported into the section, which would then read as "shoes, or other bearing surface of a continuous width of not less than 9in." The Legislature, however, has not so said, and the court will not so construe the section. These "shoes" are perfectly well known things, and have long been in constant use, and the Legislature would not have used the word had a continuous bearing been intended, for without the 3in. interval the wheels would be smooth, and more injury be done to the road.

STRINGER (app.) v. SYKES (resp.).

[Ex. Div.]

Cave, Q.C. (with S. Tennant) for the respondent contra, supported the conviction.—By the section the wheels must "be cylindrical and smooth soled, or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width not less than 9in." Now these wheels were used with "shoes," and not any "other bearing surface," and the shoes were of a width less than 9in., being, in fact, only 4½in. wide. There are two measures here, the length of the shoe from end to end of it as it lies transversely across the tire of the wheel, and its breadth from side to side, which is 4½in. Its "width" is that latter measure, and the "width" required by the Act is across the "shoe," and not across the tire of the wheel. What is wanted is not the transverse width across the wheel, for if so the shoe might be 18in. to 20in. wide or long in that direction, and only 1in. wide the other way, and so would cut into the road like a knife, which it was the Legislature's especial object to prevent. If the respondent's construction is right a cog wheel might be used. The very thing which the appellant's witness, Greigg, said, this biting surface of the wheel enables to be done, namely, the dragging along twice the weight than could otherwise be hauled by the engine, is what was expressly meant to be prevented. Here there is not an uninterrupted pressure of not less than 9in. [KELLY, C.B.—You say they have no right to borrow a portion of the width of one shoe and add it to that of another?] Exactly so. If the "width" is not as the respondent contends for where is it to stop? It might be reduced to even half an inch, and a mere line cannot be called a "bearing surface." The conviction was right, and should be affirmed.

Forbes, in reply.—Under this section the "width" is to be measured across the wheel. In three or four places the word "width," as applied to the "tires" of wheels, is used in a way plainly showing that that is so, and that the Legislature contemplated a "width" across the wheel. "Cogs" are not "shoes," and "shoes" are well and universally known things. The Act requires a bearing surface of 9in. at least, and here it was proved and admitted there was a bearing of 10½in. The word "continuous" is not in the Act, and it would not be better for the road if it were. If shoes are to be used at all there must be an interval, and the question is whether the shoes are to be put on straight across or diagonally.

KELLY, C.B.—It appears to me that this conviction must be affirmed. The words of the Act of Parliament, by which of course we are bound, are not, when looked at, ambiguous in themselves, and they can admit of but one meaning, though, undoubtedly, when applied to the portions of a wheel of an engine, as in the present case, a doubt may be raised upon their true construction. Now, the words of the 3rd section of the Act of Parliament are "No locomotive shall exceed 7ft. in width." No doubt there the word "width" means the entire width of the locomotive across and through-out, from the outer edge of one wheel to the outer edge of the opposite wheel. The section then goes on—"or twelve tons in weight except as hereinafter provided, and the wheels of every locomotive shall be cylindrical and smooth soled." There is there a certainty of an equal uniform pressure from one side of the wheel to the other through-out both the entire width and the entire circumference, or the portion of the circumference of the wheel which passes over the road, and no question could arise upon that. But as the object is that there should be a certain degree of pressure upon the road under what is called the "bearing surface," we must look to see how the Legislature expresses itself when it deals with the case not of a cylindrical and smooth soled wheel, but of a wheel with "shoes or other bearing surface." Now the words are "or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width of not less than 9in." I think that means that whatever may be the portion of the circumference of the wheel which it is supposed presses the road at any one instant of time as the wheel moves along over the surface of it, there must be one uniform and one uninterrupted pressure from side to side of the wheel, whatever may be the amount of weight, and that such pressure or "bearing surface" should be of the uninterrupted and unbroken width of 9in. at least. Whether practically it really has any different effect upon the road itself which is thus pressed upon, if there is an interruption or interval between each of these shoes, when, although there may be a pressure upon the whole surface of the road of 9in. width between one side of the wheel and the other, it is still an interrupted pressure, or whether it has any different effect upon the motion of the engine or carriage, I cannot undertake to say. But if there were to be a pressure at three or four different points, or over three or four different spaces or portions of the spaces of the wheel, amounting altogether to not less than 9in., it by no means follows that that would cause the same degree of pressure on the road as if the pressure were an uninterrupted one. I care not whether the distance or space across from one side of the rim or outer circumference of the wheel is called "breadth" or "width." The "width," as the term is used in the Act of Parliament, means here the measurement from one side of the shoe to the other across its narrower space of 4½in. parallel with the circumference of the wheel, and not across or from one end to the other of the longer space of about 20in. of the shoe. But however that may be, I think that the "width" required by the Act cannot be made up of separated and interrupted portions of pressure, or by adding the 4½in. of one shoe to the 4½in. of the other, but that it must be the pressure of one uniform and uninterrupted "bearing surface" from one side of the tire of the wheel to the other, of a width not less than 9in. in itself, such width being a portion of the circumference of the wheel. Now, that is not the case here, and I cannot think that the statute has been complied with. I think it would be speculating upon mere possibilities and as to matter upon which nothing is demonstrated, and as to which nothing could be taken for granted, to say that the pressure may be divided into two or more parts; and if divided into two parts, it could be divided as well into a dozen. It is safer, therefore, in my opinion, to adhere strictly to the Act of Parliament, and to take the words of it in their ordinary sense, namely, as meaning that the pressure from one side of the wheel to the other must be not merely that of the 18in., the width between one edge of the tire or circumference of the wheel and the other, but also the pressure on the road at every moment of time of an uninterrupted and unbroken width of "bearing surface," of not less than 9in. Under these circumstances, and for these reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that this conviction must be affirmed, and that our judgment must be in favour of the respondent.

KEENE v. DASHWOOD.

CLERKEBY, B.—If I formally differed from my Lord Chief Baron, I should give my reasons fully for doing so; but, as I cannot bring my mind to give a different judgment from that which he has just pronounced, I do not think that it would be proper for me to give reasons for a conclusion which I do not think I can make the foundation of a judgment. I can only say that certainly, in the course of the argument, I felt disposed to think that the decision arrived at by the magistrates was wrong, and, indeed, at present, perhaps, if I were dealing with this case without the assistance of my lord, I might still think that there had been such a sufficient and substantial compliance with the Act of Parliament as to place the defendant (appellant) out of the reach of the penalty by the engine always having a bearing surface of at least 9in. But in a case where it is doubtful, and upon which I should always feel some doubt myself, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament contains no precise description of the way in which the required bearing surface of not less than 9in. in width is to be procured, and as my Lord entertains a tolerably clear opinion upon the subject, I agree with his decision, that there should be judgment for the respondent, affirming the conviction, and with costs.

Judgment for the respondent, affirming the conviction, with costs.

NOTE.—Forbes, at the conclusion of the case, asked for leave to appeal, the case being, he said, of great importance, especially in the North of England, where numerous engines of a similar construction were in use.

The Court expressed an opinion that they thought he ought to have such leave. But on a subsequent day (7th Feb.)

CLERKEBY, B., said he had looked into the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 58), and found that by sect. 20 of that Act the power to grant an appeal in such a case was taken away.

Forbes said he had also consulted the Act, and had come to the same conclusion, and had advised the appellant not to continue the appeal.

KEENE v. DASHWOOD.

Inhabited house duty—Exemption—House occupied for professional purposes with caretaker at night—57 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 1, 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11.

By 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 1, houses occupied for the purposes of trade, and in which no caretaker sleeps at night, are made exempt from assessment to inhabited house duty.

By 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, this exemption is extended to houses occupied for professional purposes in which no caretaker sleeps at night.

By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only is made exempt, even though a servant or other person may dwell therein for the protection thereof.

Held that the further exemption given by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, does not extend to houses occupied for professional purposes; and that, therefore, a house partly occupied for professional purposes and in which a caretaker sleeps at night, is liable to assessment.

CASE stated for the opinion of the Exchequer Division under 37 Vict. c. 16, s. 9.

At a meeting of the commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts and for the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties for the city of London, held for the purpose of hearing appeals, Mr Peyton Dashwood appealed against an assessment to the inhabited house duties of 2000*l.* at ninepence in the pound, in respect of the premises 74 and 75, Mark-lane, for the years 1874 and 1875.

The premises were occupied by Mr. Dashwood, who is a land speculator, as well as a land agent, and also by fourteen traders, as well as by two solicitors, one engineer and a naval architect, and by a caretaker at night.

The appellant claimed exemption under sect. 11 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, contending that the entire premises were occupied solely for the purposes of trade within the meaning of the above statute. The surveyor objected that, as Mr. Dashwood, the owner, and the other professional men above referred to, occupied the premises, they could not be considered to be used for the purposes of trade only.

The commissioners, however, granted relief on the grounds that the sect. 11 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14 must be read with and construed in harmony with 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4.

Whereupon the surveyor declared his dissatisfaction with their decision, and duly required the commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice, and this case was stated accordingly.

The material statutes are as follows:

57 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 1, after reciting that duties on inhabited houses were granted by 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, sch. B., continues:

And whereas it is become usual in cities and large towns and other places for one and the same person, or for each person where two or more persons are in partnership, to occupy a dwelling-house or dwelling-houses for their residence, and at the same time one or more separate and distinct tenements or buildings, or parts of tenements or buildings, for the purposes of trade, or as warehouses for lodging goods, wares, or merchandises therein, or as shops or counting-houses, and to abide therein in the daytime only for the purposes of such trades respectively which have been charged with the said recited duties, although no person shall inhabit or dwell therein in the night time. And it is expedient in such cases to exempt from the said duties such tenements or buildings, or parts of tenements or buildings, as are or shall be solely employed for the purposes herein-mentioned. Be it therefore enacted . . . that from and after the 5th day of April 1817, on due proof made in the manner herein directed, to the satisfaction of the respective commissioners acting in the exention of the said recited Act, that any person or any number of persons in partnership together respectively occupy a tenement or building or part of a tenement or part of a building, which shall have previously been occupied for the purpose of residence only, as a house for the purpose of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, no person inhabiting, dwelling, or abiding therein, except in the daytime only, for the purpose of such trade, such person or each of such persons in partnership respectively residing in a separate and distinct dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house charged to the duties under the said Act, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, according to the provisions of this Act, to discharge the assessment made for that year in respect of such tenement or building which shall be so used for the purpose of trade, or so employed as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, anything in this said Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sect. 4 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, after reciting the exemption by 57 Geo. 3, c. 55, sect. 1, to persons occupying houses for the purposes of trade, proceeds as follows:

And whereas it is expedient to extend the said exemptions to the cases herein mentioned, be it further enacted that upon all assessments to be made for any year commencing from and after the 5th day of April, 1824, the provisions in the said Act contained for granting exemptions from the said duties to persons in trade, in respect of houses, tenements, or buildings in the said Act described, shall and may be extended and applied by the respective commissioners and officers acting in the execution of the said Act, and of this Act, on due proof, to all and every person, or any number of persons in partnership together, for and in respect of any house, tenement, or building, or part of a tenement or building, in the said Act described, which shall be used by such person or persons as offices or counting houses for the purposes of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, business or calling, by which such person or persons shall seek a livelihood or profit, no person inhabiting, dwelling, or abiding therein, except in the day time only, for the purpose of such profession, vocation, business or calling, such person or each such person in partnership respectively residing in a distinct and separate dwelling house or part of the dwelling house charged with such duties.

32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, sect. 11 enacts that—

From and after the 5th day of April, 1869, any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting house, or being used as a shop or counting house, shall be exempt from inhabited house duties, although a servant or other person may dwell in such tenement or part of a tenement for the protection thereof.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Hardinge Giffard, Q.C.), (The Attorney-General, Sir J. Holker, and Dicey with him) for the appellant, contended that the decision of the magistrates was clearly erroneous, the case being, in fact, concluded by that of Busby v. Newton, L. Rep. 10 Ex. 322.

Herschell, Q.C. (Phillips with him).—I am not going to argue the point which was decided in that case, viz., that in assessing the premises no abatement can be made under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, in respect of those parts of a house which are occupied for the purposes of trade only. The point here to be argued is the one which was conceded by the counsel for the respondent in that case, and probably conceded because they were not aware of an Act which was not cited in the argument, viz., 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4. The argument of the respondent in this case is that the whole house is exempt from assessment. Sect. 11 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, must be construed by the light of the statutes which preceded it. The first is that of 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, sect. 1. That Act only exempted houses occupied for the purposes of trade, and in which there was no care-taker at night. The Legislature then thought it advisable to extend this exemption to houses occupied for professional purposes, and the Act of 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, was accordingly passed for that purpose. By this provision, supposing there was no care-taker at night, the house in question would clearly be exempt from assessment. I must concede, however, that here a care-taker did sleep in the house at night, but I contend that the house is exempt notwithstanding. The legislature deemed it expedient and right that these provisions should be extended to cases where the houses were occupied for the purpose above mentioned, and where persons may dwell for the purpose of protection only, and in consequence 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, was passed. That clearly must be taken to include both houses occupied for the purposes of trade, and those occupied for professional purposes. It is true the words used are, "occupied for the purposes of trade only," but by that expression the legislature must be taken to have intended to include houses occupied for professional purposes also. In this case the house was used partly for trade, partly for professional purposes. It is clearly exempt, therefore, under the first two Acts; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, which extends the exemption in the first case to cases where there is a care-taker at night, extends it also in a similar case to the second exemption.

The Solicitor-General in reply.—The sole question is this: Is 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, incorporated in the provisions of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11? Clearly not. The words of the Act are clear and precise, that the extended exemption as to care-takers shall apply only to houses occupied for the purposes of trade. He cited Appeal of Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Company, reported by the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue, from the shorthand writer's notes. Exchequer Cases of Great Britain, part 2, p. 8.

CLEASBY, B.—We have, in this case, to construe the 11th section of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, and we are called upon, in giving a construction to it, not to be guided by the words it contains. But I do not think they will bear such extension. The language of the Act is clear, and I should say precise, and free from all ambiguity. It makes use of the words "for the purpose of trade only." There is no ambiguity there. It is right to encourage trade, and it is satisfactory to be able to say that one can see a reason for using these words. But then the section goes on to enumerate other particular exemptions showing that there are premises exempted which are occupied for purposes not coming strictly within the expression "trade," but connected with it, as warehouse, &c. We are asked, then, to depart from this clear language on the ground that by a previous statute the exemption has been granted to a limited extent to houses occupied for professional purposes. Mr. Herschell, in fact, says that because by 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, the limited exemption given to houses occupied for the purposes of trade is extended to those occupied for professional purposes, therefore the further exemption granted by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, to houses occupied for the purposes of trade only must as a necessary consequence be supposed to be likewise extended to those also which are occupied for professional purposes. I think there is no ground for that argument, nor can I see any reason why the Legislature should so have enacted.

POLLOCK, B.—I am quite of the same opinion, and will only say a few words with regard to Mr. Herschell's argument. He spoke of this as being either a casus omissus or a use of language which amounts to elision of a part of the section; and he urges upon us to import words into the statute which are not to be found there. I do not think that the Legislature can be charged with that omission. The whole of the difficulty arises from the fact that it is not usual now to commence an Act of Parliament with a preamble. It seems to me that the Legislature may well have intended in sect. 11 to limit the extra exemption to houses occupied for the purpose of trade. In the case of a professional man it may well be that he may have a dwelling in the country as well as professional chambers which are substantially like a second residence, in which case one can understand why the Legislature should not wish to extend the exemption.

HINDS v. THRING.

Tolls—Exemption from—Carriage employed in Her Majesty's service under the provisions of the Mutiny Act (39 Vict. c. 8), sects. 68, 86.

By sect. 86 of the Mutiny Act (39 Vict. c. 8) a toll collector is made liable to a penalty if he shall demand and receive toll (inter alia) "for any carriages or horses belonging to Her Majesty, or employed in her service, under the provisions of this Act." By sect. 68, for the regular provision of carriages for Her Majesty's forces and their baggage in their marches, power is given to constables, upon warrants issued by justices within their several jurisdictions, to provide carriages and horses for employment in Her Majesty's service; and the section proceeds to enact how and under what circumstances this can be done. The respondent, an officer in Her Majesty's service, in pursuance of an order to proceed from his official residence at one place to another in the Isle of Wight, made a part of the journey in uniform in his own dogcart, drawn by his own horse, and upon arrival at the appellant's toll bar was charged a toll in respect of his carriage, which he paid under protest. It was necessary that the respondent should have a carriage to take several official books and things he was directed by order to take to his destination, and if he had hired a carriage the cost of hiring would have been allowed to him.

The appellant having been convicted by justices under sect. 86 of 39 Vict. c. 8, for taking this toll: Held, on appeal that sect. 86 only exempted carriages employed under and by virtue of sect. 68 of the Act; that the carriage in question was therefore not employed in Her Majesty's service under the provisions of the Act, and that the conviction was accordingly wrong.

Case stated by Justices for the County of Southampton for the division of the Isle of Wight, on appeal from their decision convicting the appellant on an information charging for that he, being a tollgate keeper and collector of tolls, did on 30th May 1876, at Hunnyhill, unlawfully and illegally demand and receive a certain toll, to wit 3d., from the respondent, in respect of a certain carriage employed in the service of Her Majesty, the respondent being an officer and on duty and in uniform, contrary to sect. 86 of 39 Vict. c. 8. Upon the hearing of the information it was found as a fact that the respondent was a lieutenant-colonel in the Royal Artillery and a colonel in the army. That on the 26th May 1876 he received an order to proceed from his official residence at Wimbourne, in Dorsetshire, to Yaverland Fort in the Isle of Wight. In pursuance of that order, and on the journey from Wimbourne to Yaverland, the respondent, on the 31st of May, left Yarmouth in uniform in his own dogcart, drawn by his own horse, and proceeded to the tollbar at Hunnyhill, where the sum of 3d. was demanded of him by the appellant and paid under protest. It was also proved that it was necessary that the respondent should have a carriage to take the several books and things he was directed to take to Yaverland Fort, and that if he had hired a carriage, the cost of hiring would have been paid and allowed to him; but that on the occasion in question the respondent drove his own carriage because it was necessary that he should have his horse to appear the following morning on parade. It was also sworn by the respondent that the carriage was employed in Her Majesty's service.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the toll was legally demanded and taken under the provisions of sect. 22 of 53 Geo. 3, c. 9 (local Act). That the exemption from toll conferred by sects. 73 and 86 of 39 Vict. c. 8 only applied to carriages belonging to Her Majesty or employed in her service under the provisions of that Act; and inasmuch as the carriage in question was the property of the respondent, and did not even under the circumstances mentioned belong to Her Majesty, and had not been supplied under sects. 68, 69 of 39 Vict. c. 8, it could not be said to be employed on Her Majesty's service under the provisions of that Act.

The justices were of opinion that the evidence given brought the case within the operation of sect. 86 of the Act, and convicted the appellant.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether under the circumstances the carriage in question was either the property of Her Majesty or employed in her service under the provisions of the said Act of 39 Vict. c. 8, and therefore not liable to toll.

By sect. 86 of 39 Vict. c. 8, if any toll collector shall demand and receive toll from (inter alios) any carriages or horses belonging to Her Majesty or employed in her service under the provisions of this Act, every such toll keeper shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 5l. nor less than 40s.

By sect. 68 of the same Act it is enacted for the regular provision of carriages for Her Majesty's forces and their baggage in their marches in Great Britain and Ireland, all justices of the peace within their several jurisdictions being duly required thereto, by an order from Her Majesty or the general of her forces, or other person, &c., may issue a warrant to any constable having authority to act, &c., requiring him to provide the carriages, horses, and oxen and drivers therein mentioned, &c.

The section then proceeds to set out the manner in which and the circumstances under which this is to be done.

Sutton, for the appellant, contended that the conviction was wrong. The toll was legally taken under 53 Geo. 3, c. 9, sect. 22 (local Act); and in order to be exempt the carriage must not only be employed in Her Majesty's service but it must be so employed under the provisions of the Mutiny Act, that is under the provisions of sect. 68.

The respondent did not appear.

CLEASBY, B.—It is quite clear that the conviction in this case was wrong in point of law. The toll for which the appellant was convicted was taken in respect of a carriage, and the only question is whether sect. 86 of 39 Vict. c. 8, which imposes this penalty, is applicable to this case. Now the case evidently does not come within the words "or for any carriage or horses belonging to Her Majesty," for here the carriage was the officer's own carriage, which he was using for his own convenience. Nor can it come within any of the preceding words of the section. Then follows the words "or employed in her service under the provisions of this Act." Now, suppose the words had simply been "or employed in her service," and had stopped there, a nice question might then have arisen as to whether this carriage was in fact so employed. But the section goes on, "under the provisions of this Act." The case then must be brought strictly within the meaning of these words if they have any meaning, and the carriage must have been employed in the service of Her Majesty under the provisions of this Act. When we look at the Act we find that the latter words have a distinct and definite meaning. They apply to sect. 68, in which power is given to have carriages provided for the employment of her Majesty under particular circumstances. If the carriage had been provided in the way directed by that section it would have been a carriage employed under the provisions of this Act. But the facts found in this case show that the carriage employed was not employed under the provisions of that section. That being so, sect. 86 does not apply; the toll-keeper was only doing his duty in taking the toll, and the conviction must be quashed.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion, and quite agree with what has fallen from my brother Cleasby. If any further argument were necessary it might be furnished by this fact, that when the legislature were dealing with volunteers very different words were used. There the Legislature expressly say that volunteers ought to be exempt, and, to encourage them, larger exemption is given them than to an ordinary officer. Sect. 45 of 26 & 27 Vict. was passed for that purpose, and that section clearly exempts all carriages, public and private, employed in carrying volunteers.

RODERICKS v. ASTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.
Sewers—Powers of local authority—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 16, 19, 32, 144—150, 303.

An urban or rural sanitary authority has power by the Public Health Act 1875, to make a sewer in private property, even though the sewer may be raised above the level of the ground and may necessitate an embankment of considerable height being built over it. In such case, ample compensation is provided by the Act.

THE plaintiffs are owners in fee of certain hereditaments, situate in the district of the Manor of Aston, in the county of Warwick, called Yew Tree House, with the grounds attached, which are laid out as ornamental gardens or pleasure grounds, in which are growing many ornamental timber trees, and a large rhododendron plantation and other valuable shrubs and plants. The grounds slope down in a natural hollow or dell to the river Tame.

The defendants are the Urban Sanitary Authority for Aston and the surrounding districts, and they proposed to run a sewer on, over, and across the plaintiff's property, across the hollow, and for the purpose of supporting the sewer, to make an embankment of earth on each side of the sewer, and more than one foot above it. The embankment was to be more than seven feet above the surface of the ground, and in some places sixty feet broad, and as the plaintiff alleged, completely surrounding his bar or taproom, and making it inaccessible and useless.

The plaintiff moved for an injunction against the defendants to restrain them from so making the sewer.

The question for the consideration of the court was whether under the Public Health Act of 1875, the defendants had power to make this sewer in the manner proposed, without actually buying the land.

Chitty, Q.C. and Alexander Glen, for the plaintiffs.

Davey, Q.C. and Woodroffe, for the defendants.
The sections of the Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) upon which the question turned, are the 16th, 19th, 144th, and following ss. to 150, the 32nd and the 308th. (a)

(a) Sect. 16. Any local authority may carry any sewer through, across, or under any turnpike road, or any street, or place laid out as or intended for a street, or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriageway of any street, and after giving reasonable notice in writing to the owner or occupier (if in the report of the surveyor it appears necessary), into, through, or under any lands whatsoever, within their districts.

They may also (subject to the provisions of this Act relating to sewage works, without the district of the local authority), exercise all or any of the powers given by this section without their district for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage.

Sect. 19. Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied.

Sect. 32. A local authority shall three months at least before commencing the construction or extension of

[CHAM. DIV.]

The 144th section gives to the urban authority of a district exclusive power, so far as consistent with the provisions of the act, to execute the office of surveyors of highways, and to exercise the powers, and to be subject to the liabilities which by the Highway Act of 1835, or any Act amending the same, were vested in the vestry of any parish.

The 145th section provides that the inhabitants of urban districts are not to be liable to rates for roads, &c., without the district, and for the powers and duties of retiring surveyors.

The 146th, 147th, and 148th sections refer to the powers of urban authorities to agree as to the making of new public roads, and constructing or adopting public bridges, and to enter into agreements with turnpike trustees as to the repairs, &c., of roads.

The 149th section vests all streets which are highways repairable by the inhabitants at large in the urban authority, and provides for the repair of the same, and the penalties to be imposed in case of injury to the pavement, stones or other materials of such streets.

The 150th section gives power to compel the paving, lighting, &c., of private streets.

JESSEL, M.R.—The question being one of pure law I am bound to give an opinion upon it. As I understand the practice of the court on motion for injunction, the only question that I consider I am deciding, or that I have to decide, is whether under the powers of the Public Health Act, the defendants, the Aston Local Board, have a right to carry a sewer partly under and partly above ground. That is the question before me. Now the words are these: "Any local authority"—the defendants are a local authority—"may carry any sewer"—this is a sewer—"through, across, or under any turnpike road, or any street or place laid out, or intended for a street, or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriage way of any street, and after giving reasonable notice in writing," which has been given, "to the owner or occupier, if on the report of the surveyor it appears necessary," and it does appear necessary, "into, through, or under any lands whatever within the district." They may also, subject to the provisions of this Act regulating such works, exercise all or any of the powers given by this section without their district, for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage. That is the whole of the section. The word "lands" by the definition includes buildings—that is the interpretation clause in the Act. Now, I am asked to say that the words "into, through, or under," mean "under." That is what I am asked to say. I decline to say so. Why any sewer or other work for sewage purposes without their district, give notice of the intended work by advertisement in one or more of the local newspapers circulated within the district where the work is to be made.

Such notice shall describe the nature of the intended work, and shall state the intended terminus thereof, and the names of the parishes, and turnpike roads, and streets, any other lands (if any), through, across, under, or on which the work is to be made, and shall name a place where a plan of the intended work is open for inspection at all reasonable hours, and a copy of such notice shall be served on the owners or reputed owners, lessees, or reputed lessees and occupiers of the said lands, and on the overseers of such parishes, and on the trustees, surveyors of highways, or other persons having the care of such roads or streets.

they should ask me to make three words into one I do not know. The word "under" is distinguished by the word "or" from "into" or "through." They are not only to carry it under, but "into, through, or under." It is said that that means that they must make the sewer by means of a tunnel, or if by a cutting that they must cover over the cutting so that the sewer shall be always carried under. As I said before, taking the ordinary meaning of the English language, if I am to carry anything "into, through, or under" land, it does not mean that that is to be wholly under; it may mean that it is to be something which is not "under" but "into" or "through." Standing alone I have no doubt whatever that this sewer, being partly under and partly above the surface, is carried "into, through, or under" the lands in question. If the argument stopped there, or if the distinction stopped there, I should have nothing more to add, but it does not stop there. It is first of all said that there is a context to show that whatever the ordinary meaning of the words "into" and "through" lands may be, or whatever their ordinary meaning may be, when contrasted with the word "under," under this particular Act of Parliament "through" is intended to mean under and nothing else; and for that purpose I will refer first to "through lands." Any local authority may carry any sewer through, across, or under, any turnpike road, or any street or place laid out, or intended for a street, or under any cellar or vault. Now, it is said that if you read the word "through" there, to authorise you to make a sewer above a turnpike road you may make it very unpleasant to walk or drive on the turnpike road; and it is not likely that the Legislature would have conferred any such powers. I do not think the argument from probability is sufficient; because the Legislature conferring powers of this kind on a public authority like a local authority, for the public benefit, will not impute to them the desire or the intention of using them, so as to obstruct the necessary traffic on the turnpike road. They leave it to their discretion whether they will carry the sewer above the turnpike road, but they must only carry it in such a manner as not to interfere with the traffic. For instance, the turnpike road at that point may be below the level of the turnpike road on each side, so that by carrying the sewer on the turnpike road they may make the turnpike road level, which before was in a valley, and benefit it, or they may make it to such an extent as will not interfere, with the level of the road. Where bodies like this have only the public benefit in view, you must impute to them a reasonable mode of carrying out the objects which they are empowered to carry out, more especially when you find there is a section in the Act, I think the 308th, giving compensation to everybody in the widest terms. What the result would be under this section of their interfering with the traffic of a turnpike road I need hardly say, for it is provided that "where any person sustains any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, in relation to any matter as to which he is not himself in default, full compensation shall be made." [Davey, Q.C.—Besides they are prohibited from committing a nuisance.] I was going to say so. So that in the first place they would be very careful not to interfere with the turnpike road,

RODERICKS v. ASTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

and in the next place, as Mr. Davey has said, they must not, in any of their works commit a nuisance at all, except, of course, that they may interfere.—What section is that? [Ohitty, Q.C.—The 19th. It has nothing to do with the roads—it is about keeping the sewers constructed, covered, and ventilated so as not to be a nuisance and injurious to health.] However, I think the 308th section without going into that is a check, but I think the general principle is wider, that the Legislature conferring these powers trusts to the public body exercising them, to exercise them discreetly; but really the matter does not stop there, for I think they have a power even as to the turnpike road, and I think that is shown pretty clearly. These bodies are divided into two classes, rural authorities and urban authorities; the urban authorities have special powers of altering the levels of the roads. By the 144th section the highways in the towns are vested in the urban authorities, and by the subsequent sections especially the 149th and 150th sections of the Act, the urban authorities have positive rights to alter the roads, and to alter their levels, make them higher or lower, and do pretty well what they like with them. Therefore, that the Legislature should give them this power to carry the sewers, is not only not inconsistent with the Act, but perfectly consistent with it, for they have, in fact, in express terms, vested in these urban authorities all the powers that may be necessary to deal with the roads. Therefore, there is nothing unlikely as far as they are concerned. But did they intend the rural authorities not being expressly empowered by this Act to interfere with the roads, to do it? I see no reason as I have said before to think that they did not, but I think that they did, from the 32nd section, which is this, that before commencing any sewage works without the district, the local authority is to give notice. What is the local authority to do? (the local authority includes the rural authority). "Such notices shall describe the nature and extent of the work, and shall state the intended termini thereof, and the names of the parishes, and the turnpike roads, and streets, and other lands, if any, through, across, under, or on which the work is to be made." Now, there it is not "through, across, or under," but "through, across, under, or on." There cannot be the slightest doubt, therefore, that the Act contemplated that there should be some work done on a turnpike road by local authorities, and if confirmation were wanted for the general meaning, I should say that that does afford confirmation to show that even as regards the road they have the right to construct works if reasonably necessary for the purpose they have in view. As I said before, it does not by any means follow that by so doing they will injure the turnpike road in the least. They may benefit it very much. I am, therefore, not pressed with the argument as to the meaning of the word "through," as to the turnpike road. But, again, even supposing the argument were valid, it would only amount to this, that the context of "turnpike road" would restrain the meaning of the word "through" to something less than the context of "any other lands." Because it by no means follows that because the court should think that the word "through," in the prior part of the clause, was restrained by its use in connection with "turnpike road," to something not far above the surface, or not above the surface at all, it should be so restrained by another part of the section, consequently it is not conclusive in any way as restricting the meaning of the words. But then we have got this in the next line. It is not "any street or place laid out or intended for a street" as to which the same observations do not apply, but it goes on, "or under any cellar or vault," leaving out the words "through or across," and restricting it to "under" as regards the vault, showing that in using the word "under" alone, they purposely left out that which would enable you to carry it over a cellar or vault, or through a cellar or vault. That being so it appears to me to be clear from reading the section that there is nothing to prevent them from doing what they are asked to do. But then it is said independently of the section they have power to purchase land, and that what they are doing is injuring the plaintiff to such an extent that it is equivalent to taking the whole of the land. In what way the plaintiff is damaged or injured I cannot see. He is only entitled to be paid for what he loses, that is to be paid for the whole of the value of the land minus the value of what he keeps, and he can sell the remainder. With an Act of Parliament so framed, giving full compensation, I do not see what he comes here for an injunction for. It is at the outside a mere money demand. If he is right he is only entitled to be paid the value of his land. Then I am referred to some cases; and, as usual with authorities on a question of this kind, they have very little bearing on the question of construction. Of course I am bound by authorities on the construction of a public Act of Parliament; but the authorities to which I have been referred not only have no direct bearing on the matter before me, but in themselves, if I may say so, with great respect for the learned judges who have decided them, seem to me to bear further and considerable discussion, which I refrain from going into. I may say that the principal authority to which I was referred was a case decided in the court below by a majority of judges against the opinion of a minority, affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber again by a majority. Of course, a case of that kind is not the less an authority because it was the decision of the majority, but still it would make the judge who applied it very careful to see that a case which gave rise to such a diversity of opinion between the learned judges really governed the case before him. But when I come to look at it it does not apply at all. The case is the Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, reported in the L. Rep. 4 C. P. 192. The simple point decided there was this: The board had made a sewer (I am stating it in my own language) through somebody's land, and then the owner of the neighbouring lands dug under his own land, and the consequence of his digging under his own land was that the sewer, not being constructed with sufficient strength to do without the lateral support of the neighbour's land, bulged and burst, and was, no doubt, seriously injured. It was said that the man's digging under his own land, or rather that the railway company's digging, was the cause of the bulging and bursting of the sewer, and that it was a wrongful act. The answer was: "I have only dug under my own land, which I have a right

REG. v. OLIVER AND AUSTIN.

[C. CAS. R.]

to deal with in any way I think proper; you have no right to a lateral support as an easement unless twenty years have elapsed," which answer was conclusive, unless the Board of Works could show a statutory right to the lateral support within the twenty years. Now, the only statutory right that they had was the power of constructing a sewer. The minority thought that that showed that the Legislature intended that the sewer when constructed should be maintained and kept, but the majority seemed to think that it was possible to construct the sewer so strongly that it could do without the lateral support. What the majority said was this: "If the construction contended for on the other side is correct, we cannot impute to the Legislature the injustice of supposing that they would take away from the owner of the soil the lateral support of which was wanted, the right to compensation for depriving him of the right to do what he liked with his own property, and we can find no provision in the Act of Parliament giving him compensation as we read it." I do not discuss whether they read it rightly or wrongly. "The right to compensation is confined to persons whose land is directly affected by the sewer being carried through or under it, and therefore there being no such right, we think there is no such right taken away from the owner of the soil adjoining, and consequently he is not liable in an action." That is the case which was decided. It has not only no direct application to the case before me, but when you come to examine its indirect application is the other way; because see what the reason for the judgment was. I gather that if the judges had found a clause giving compensation to the owners of the adjoining soil, they would have decided the other way on the ground that they got compensation. But here I find the largest possible clause of compensation, which I think would hardly admit of discussion, so that anybody whose rights are injuriously affected would be entitled to compensation. So that they might well hold, consistently with this Act of Parliament, that the incident of lateral support was given to the local authority, in connection with the sewer as well as the right to carry it over or under the road. This being my opinion which I have given at some length, as I was deciding once for all, and I thought the parties might desire it, I am of opinion that the motion should be refused and in accordance with the usual practice of the court, the costs will be costs in the cause.

REG. v. OLIVER AND AUSTIN.

Indictment—After verdict—Amendment—Debtors Act 1869.

The Debtors Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, subs. 15, enacts that any person adjudged bankrupt shall be guilty of a misdemeanor if within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, he being a trader, pawns, pledges, or disposes of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, any property which he has obtained on credit and has not paid for, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud.

An indictment stated that heretofore and before the committing of the offence next hereinafter mentioned, to wit on &c., A. and B. were adjudicated bankrupts, and that the said A. and B. afterwards, with intent to defraud their creditors, unlawfully, within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against them, they being traders, did pawn, pledge and dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of their trade, certain property which they had obtained upon credit, and had not paid for.

Held, on objection after verdict, that the indictment did not show substantially the offence under the above enactment, and that an amendment could not then be made.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of Hastings.

At the quarter sessions of the peace for the borough of Hastings, held before me as recorder, on the 27th Oct. 1876, an indictment came on to be tried against the defendants framed under subsects. 3, 9, 12, 14, and 15 of sect. 11 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 (The Debtors Act 1869). The defendants were acquitted on the first four counts, and convicted on the 5th, which was as follows:

And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do further present that heretofore [and before the committing of the offence next hereinafter mentioned] to wit on the 6th March in the year of our Lord 1876, James Oliver and Thomas Austin were adjudicated bankrupts, and that the said James Oliver and Thomas Austin [afterwards] with intent to defraud their creditors, unlawfully, within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against them, they being traders, did pawn, pledge, and dispose of otherwise than in the ordinary way of their trade, certain property which they had obtained upon credit, and had not paid for, against the form, &c.

A motion was then made in arrest of judgment to quash the count, on the ground that it was bad upon the face of it, and repugnant, inasmuch as it stated in the first part of it that the offence was committed after the bankruptcy, which it could not be; and in the other part of the count that it had been committed before the bankruptcy.

I held that, supposing the count as it originally stood to be bad after verdict, which I doubted. I had, at all events, power to amend it, and I did amend it by striking out the words in brackets as above, but I reserved the point for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, and bound the defendants over to come up for judgment at the next sessions.

If the Court should be of opinion that the count is bad after verdict as it originally stood, and that I had no power to amend it as above, then the count is to be quashed. But if the Court should be of a contrary opinion on either of these points, then the verdict is to stand, and the defendants are to come up for judgment accordingly.

R. H. HURST, Recorder of Hastings.

J. P. Grain, for the prisoner.—This conviction cannot be sustained. First, there is no power to amend after verdict under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 100, s. 25: (Reg. v. Larkin, Deane. C. C. 365,

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. OLIVER AND AUSTIN.

6 Cox C. C. 377; Reg. v. Frost, Dears. C. C. 474; 6 Cox C. C. 526.) Secondly, the 5th count of the indictment is bad; it is framed upon the Debtors Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, subs. 15. The Act section begins "Any person adjudged bankrupt shall, in each of the cases following, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and then the 15th subsection describes this case in the words following: "If within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, he, being a trader, pawns, pledges, or disposes of otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, any property which he has obtained on credit and has not paid for, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud." The words "Any person adjudged bankrupt" run through each of the subsections, and it would not be sufficient merely to allege in the indictment that the prisoners with intent, &c. unlawfully, within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against them did," &c. That would disclose no offence, as very often such petitions are not proceeded with or are dismissed, and no adjudication of bankruptcy takes place upon them. The averment, therefore, that the prisoners were adjudicated bankrupt is a material and necessary averment, and reading the indictment without the amendment, it stands thus, that before the offence the prisoners were adjudicated bankrupts, and they afterwards, within four months next before the presentation of a petition of bankruptcy, committed the offence, which could not be, as the offence must be committed before the adjudication of bankruptcy.

Willoughby, for the prosecution.—The introductory paragraph in the indictment as to the adjudication of bankruptcy, is mere inducement, and may be rejected as surplusage. It is only necessary to set forth the substance of the offence in the words of the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 29, without alleging or setting forth any debt, act of bankruptcy, trading, adjudication, or any proceedings in, or order, warrant, or document of any court acting under the Bankruptcy Act 1869. After striking out the introductory paragraph a sufficient description of the offence would remain. [LUSH, J.—What though the petition may have been dismissed. This indictment would be proved if the prisoners had been adjudicated bankrupts ten years ago, and afterwards a second petition in bankruptcy were filed which was ultimately dismissed, and within four months of the second petition they pawned their property. But that would be no offence.] In such a case as that supposed there would be no conviction, as the evidence would be insufficient. But here the objection arises after verdict, when the offence must be taken to have been proved. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 100, s. 24 and Reg. v. Parker (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 228; 11 Cox C. C. 478) were then cited.

KELLY, C.B.—I am always desirous to sustain a conviction when it is one of which the person convicted is undoubtedly guilty, but to hold this count after verdict to be a good count would, in my opinion, be opposed to the rules of criminal pleading. The offence, under the statute, is substantially this. When a trader has committed a fraud by pawning, pledging, or disposing of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, property obtained on credit within four months before a petition in bankruptcy against him, and that petition has been followed in due course by adjudication of bankruptcy, the offence is complete. Now the question is whether such an offence is stated in this count of the indictment? The count begins by alleging that "heretofore and before the committing of the offence hereinafter mentioned, these traders were adjudicated bankrupts, and that the said traders afterwards, that is after the adjudication of bankruptcy was pronounced against them, with intent to defraud their creditors within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition," did the act which constitutes the offence. Taking the whole count together it amounts to this, that after these traders had been adjudicated bankrupts, it may be a year or many years afterwards, they committed a fraud, and that was followed by a petition in bankruptcy against them, and there the count stops. Now, it is said that we are to presume after verdict that there had been an adjudication in bankruptcy upon this petition against these traders. If so, that would be to supply an allegation of an adjudication in bankruptcy upon a new petition, which we cannot do. I know of no authority for introducing such a statement by way of presumption after verdict. It was further said that we might strike out the words in the introduction "before the committing of the offence next hereinafter mentioned," and then the count would stand thus, "that heretofore, to wit on the 6th March, these traders were adjudicated bankrupts," and that then we might strike out the word "afterwards," and it would proceed "and the said traders, with intent to defraud their creditors within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against them," committed the offence. Then we must make this further amendment of charging the presentation of "a bankruptcy petition against them" into "the presentation of the bankruptcy petition against them." Now, where is the authority for making these alterations and amendments? I am of opinion that no such amendment or intentment as suggested can be made after verdict, when the contrary is alleged as here. The only clause in the Debtors Act which can raise a doubt on the point, is sect. 19, but that has no application to a case like the present. I think, therefore, that the conviction must be quashed.

MELLOR, J.—I cannot quite agree in the judgment of the Chief Baron. I do not wish to express a dissent from it, but rather a doubt upon it. I am inclined to think that we may read the count by the usual intendments after verdict, so that enough will remain on the face of it to show that within four months after the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy against these traders, and their being adjudicated bankrupts upon it, they committed the offence. I admit that the words I have to reject in so reading the count are difficult to deal with. But I think I can see, notwithstanding the allegation "that before the committing of the offence hereinafter mentioned, the prisoners were adjudicated bankrupts," an allegation that the prisoners were traders, and within four months before the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy against them they committed the offence, and that we may intend they were adjudicated bankrupts upon that. If I can do that the offence is complete. After verdict as we hold now, I think that the principle of sect. 19, countenances that intentment, and that we may and ought to reject words which are repugnant or which if taken literally would displace the effect of the whole count. These are the doubts I feel.

LUSH, J.—I agree with the Lord Chief Baron, and think that the conviction should be quashed. The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11, subs. 15, creates the offence in these terms [His Lordship then read the enactment], and sect. 19 enacts that “in an indictment for an offence under the Act it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged in the words of the Act specifying the offence or as near thereto as circumstances admit, without alleging or setting forth any debt, act of bankruptcy, trading, adjudication, or any proceedings in, or order, warrant, or document of, any court acting under the Bankruptcy Act 1869.” The substance of the offence charged is that the trader who commits the offence within four months of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him should be afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt upon that petition, that the act done while in a state of insolvency should be followed up by bankruptcy. Does this count state that? It states that before the committing of the offence hereinafter mentioned the prisoners were adjudicated bankrupts, and that afterwards, with intent to defraud their creditors, within four months before the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy against them, they did the acts charged. A man may be a bankrupt more than once, and the count may be read that after a first bankruptcy, and within four months before the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy against them, that must be taken a new petition, they did the acts charged. And as petitions in bankruptcy sometimes come to nothing, and it is not alleged in the count that there was any adjudication in bankruptcy upon this petition, why is it to be intended that there was such an adjudication. If such an interdictment cannot be made the count discloses no offence. To make the offence we must alter the indictment by intending that a bankruptcy adjudication occurred afterwards. I do not feel justified in making these alterations in the count. After verdict we may reject all superfluous averments, and if the averment “before the commission of the offence hereinafter mentioned” were struck out, no offence would be stated in the count, unless it can be intended that the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy alleged in the count was followed by an adjudication in bankruptcy. I do not think that we can fill up that omission by intendment, because a verdict of guilty has been found. Sect. 19 of the Act only makes an indictment good when it states the offence in substance. But here it does not state that the presentation of a bankruptcy petition was followed by an adjudication in bankruptcy, which is necessary to complete the offence.

DENMAN, J.—I agree with the Lord Chief Baron and my brother Lush, J.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I concur with my brother Mellor, J. in entertaining doubts in this case. I doubt whether all that is necessary after verdict to constitute the offence does not appear on the face of this count of the indictment. I am inclined to think that under sect. 24 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, which says that no indictment shall be held insufficient (inter alia) for omitting to state the time at which the offence was committed in any case where time is not of the essence of the offence, nor for stating the time imperfectly, may cure the objection that by the words “before” and “afterwards” in this count the time has been improperly stated. But on the point that this count is good after verdict, I am inclined to think that enough appears on the face of the indictment to show the offence substantially. I agree that the offence must be committed within four months before the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy which is followed by an adjudication in bankruptcy. But could they have been convicted upon this indictment if after having been bankrupts ten years previously they had within four months next before the presentation of a new petition in bankruptcy not followed up by an adjudication of bankruptcy against them? I think not, and if not, may we not after verdict reject the words “before the commission of the offence hereinafter mentioned” and the word “afterwards” as surplusage. I entertain some doubt upon this point.

Conviction quashed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by W. AFFLETON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, June 19, 1876.

LEWIS v. CARR.

Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), ss. 28, 52, and 53—Borough—Alderman's contract with council—Disqualification—Action for penalties.

By sect. 28 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, it is enacted that no person shall be qualified to be elected, or to be a councillor or an alderman of one of the boroughs named in the schedule to the Act during such time as he shall have either directly or indirectly any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the council of the borough. By sect. 53, if any person shall act as mayor, alderman, or councillor, for any borough after he shall cease to be qualified according to the provisions of the Act, or after he shall become disqualified to hold any such office, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 50*l.*, such sum to be recovered, &c.

The defendant was a burgess and an alderman of the borough of Macclesfield. On six different occasions, between the 19th of June and the 31st of Dec. 1874, goods were supplied from the defendant's shop to the town council according to the orders of the council, who subsequently paid for the goods.

The defendant subsequently, on the 19th of June, 1875, and afterwards, acted five times as an alderman of the borough.

The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover the penalties under sect. 53 of the Municipal Corporation Act for his having so acted.

Held (affirming the decision of the Eschequer Division below), that the defendant, under sect. 28, he was disqualified from being an alderman of the borough only so long as his interest in the contract with the council continued, and he did not cease to be qualified, or become disqualified after that interest had determined, and therefore that he was not liable.

CT. OF APP.] MAYOR, &C., OF WORCESTER v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF DROITWICH UNION. [CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the Exchequer Division. The plaintiff brought his action under sect. 53 of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), to recover penalties against the defendant for having acted as an alderman of the borough of Macclesfield. At the trial before Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the Chester Summer Assizes 1875, the learned judge thought that the case came within the mischief contemplated by the Act, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, execution having, however, stayed to enable the defendant to move.

A rule nisi calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial granted on the ground of misdirection, was accordingly obtained in the Exchequer Division for the defendant, and made absolute.

The plaintiff now appealed.

The case in the court below will be found fully reported ante p. 156; 34 L. T. Rep. N.S. 390.

J. Brown, Q.C. (J. Williams with him), for the plaintiff.—The office of alderman was vacated when the defendant took the contract with the council. It cannot be resumed when the contract has terminated. The defendant by acting as alderman after taking the contract has brought himself within the words of the 33rd section, and the mischief contemplated by the Act. Reg. v. Francis (18 Q. B. 526; 21 L. J. 304, Q. B.) is a decision upon this 28th section, but it only decided that a quo warranto might be applied for notwithstanding more than 12 months had elapsed from the time of the election. The court did not say more than that the disqualification continued during the existence of the contract. That case is not in point here.

M'Intyre, Q.C. for the defendant.—The disqualification continues only during the continuance of the contract; otherwise the burgess would be disqualified from acting as alderman for ever. Sect. 28 is aimed at continuous contracts. In sect. 52, where it is intended that a man shall "become disqualified and cease to hold the office," it says so in terms. It cannot be intended that that section should apply to a burgess taking contracts with the council, or it would have said so. Nicholson v. Fields (31 L. J. 233, Ex.; 7 H. & N. 810) is in point. He also referred to Burn's Justice of the Peace, vol. 3, p. 121; 18 Geo. 2, c. 20, s. 1.

J. Brown, Q.C. replied.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in this case must be affirmed. I think it is clear that some limitation to the period during which, under sect. 53, a man is liable to the fine for acting as alderman or councillor after he has ceased to be qualified, must be implied from the words of the section. Otherwise a person once disqualified could never again be elected, or re-elected, and act without incurring the penalty, although his disqualification might be removed. Under sect. 28 it is provided that no person shall be qualified "to be elected" or to be a councillor or alderman "during such time" as he shall be interested in a contract with the council. I do not think, under this section, that the limitation of disqualification is confined to the election only. Applying that limitation to the rest of the section the result is that the defendant was not capable of being a councillor or alderman "during such time" as he was engaged in business contracts with the council. Then we must apply the same construction to the 53rd section as we have done to the 28th, and it follows that the defendant was only disqualified from being an alderman during the continuance of his contract with the council, and as he is not asserted to have acted during that time, but afterwards, he is not liable to the penalty for acting after the disqualification had ceased.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. The acts provide four cases in which the alderman or councillor becomes disqualified. They are: If he shall be bankrupt or insolvent, or make a composition with his creditors, or be absent from the borough for more than six months at a time (unless in case of illness); but in the same section (the 52nd) it is provided that on payment of creditors or on return to the borough, if not otherwise disqualified, the person may be re-elected. I think that whatever may be the disqualification intended in the 28th section, if it had been intended that a person duly elected, who by entering into a contract with the council had become disqualified should be excluded from holding office until re-elected, it would have been specifically so stated, as it is in the class of cases mentioned in the 52nd. There are no such words in the 28th section, and I am of opinion that the judgment of the Exchequer Division was right and should be affirmed.

QUAIN, J.—If the contention for the appellant is right, a person once disqualified could never again act in his office of alderman. "During such time," in sect. 28, must be applied to sect. 53, and he then is liable to the penalty, if he acts in the office whilst interested in a contract with the council.

ARCHIBALD, J., concurred.

THE MAYOR, &C., OF WORCESTER v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE DROITWICH UNION.

Poor rate—Local board—Rateable value of waterworks—Charges limited by statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 93 (the Public Health Act 1848).

The local board of W. were the owners and occupiers of waterworks in the parish of C., and acting under sect. 93 of the Public Health Act 1848, they supplied the inhabitants of W. with water on an estimate which, after paying the expenses of maintaining the works, and supplying the water, left a very small margin of profit to the board. The respondents, within whose union the parish of C. was situated, rated the local board on a basis of the profit they might have made, if they had been a company occupying the works solely for the purpose of making a profit.

Held, (1) that according to the true construction of the Public Health Act 1848, s. 93, the local board were bound to make an estimate of the sum they actually required for the maintainance of the waterworks, and could not levy a larger sum by a water rate than they were so estimated to require, (2) (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court of Appeal) that they were rateable for the relief of the poor only in respect of the profit they actually derived from the occupation of the waterworks, and not in respect of the profit which a company occupying the works solely for the purpose of profit might make.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court of Appeal from Inferior Courts giving judgment for the appellants upon a special case stated for the opinion of the court by consent between the parties, and by order of Blackburn, J. in pursuance of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The special case, and the arguments and judgments in the court below will be found ante p. 140; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288.

For the purposes of this report the facts sufficiently appear from the head note above, and the judgments of the Court of Appeal (post).

By sect. 93 of the Public Health Act 1848, (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) it is enacted "That whenever and so long as any premises are supplied with water by the local board of health, for the purposes of domestic use, cleanliness, or drainage, they shall make and levy, in addition to any other rate, a water rate upon the occupier except as hereinafter provided, and the rate so made shall be assessed upon the net annual value of the premises ascertained in the manner hereinbefore prescribed with respect to special and general district rate," &c.

Sect. 94 provides that the water rate shall be payable in advance, and gives power to stop the water in case of non-payment of the rate.

Jelf (with him H. Matthews, Q.C.), for the Droitwich Union, the respondents below.—It is immaterial whether the local board make a profit in money out of the work, or whether they make a profit at all. Ability to make a profit is the true test of the measure of the rateability under the old statute 43 Eliz. [MELLISH, L. J.—But is that so when you are rating a public body who are bound not to make any profit?] By sect. 93 of the Public Health Act 1848, the local board are enabled to levy a water rate on the inhabitants, and by sect. 73 they are enabled to buy premises for the waterworks. It is their own fault if they do not get the rateable value out of the works. The test, as laid down in the Mersey Docks case is that the capability of owners and occupiers in the district to make profits in money or their equivalent is to be the guide in rating them to the relief of the poor. The local board are exactly in the same position as the inhabitants of Worcester, and these get substantial advantages, although not in money, out of the waterworks. This case differs from the Mersey Docks v. Jones and the Mersey Docks v. Cameron (11 H. L. Rep. 443; 20 C. B., N. S., 56), where the trustees were expressly forbidden to make any profit at all. Corporations might reduce their rates to nothing, if the contention of the other side is right. The case of the Mayor of Liverpool v. The Overseers of Wavertree (30 Justice of the Peace, 101) is distinguishable from the present, for there an express limit was placed to the profit which could be made. He also cited

Reg. v. Justices of Hull, 4 E. & B. 29; and sub nom. Reg. v. Cooper, 23 L. J. 183, M. C.; Reg. v. Longwood, 21 L. J. 215, M. C.; 17 Q. B. 871; Reg. v. Kentmers, 21 L. J. 13, M. C.; 17 Q. B. 551; Reg. v. Longwood, 18 Q. B. 116; Mayor of Liverpool v. Overseers of West Derby, 6 E. & B. 704; 25 L. J. 112, M. C.; Reg. v. Mayor of Manchester, 21 L. J. 160, M. C.

Powell, Q.C. and Casile for the local board, the appellants below.—The local board are not in the position of a hypothetical tenant without any restriction, for they are obliged to supply the town with water at a price. The rate is to be made beforehand to meet the board's expenses. There is no question of deducting the expenses from the rate. The position of the board is precisely that of the corporation in the Mayor of Liverpool v. The Overseers of Wavertree (ubi sup.), which is a direct authority in our favour. They referred also to

The Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 490; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 193; Commissioners of Leith Harbour v. Inspector of the Poor, L. Rep. 1 Sc. App. 17.

Jelf replied.

Our adv. vult.

QUAIN, J., who heard the arguments, died before judgment was delivered.

The judgment of the court was delivered on 10th Nov. by MELLISH, L.J., as follows.—The question to be determined in this case is on what principle the corporation of Worcester are to be assessed to the poor rate in respect of a certain reservoir and water works situate within the Droitwich Union, which were erected and are maintained by the corporation under the provisions of the public Health Act for the purpose of supplying the town of Worcester with water. The corporation contend that "the provisions of the Public Health Act contain the only authority for the appellants to charge a water rate on consumers of water, and that such rate only is authorised by the statute as might be reasonably expected to be necessary to defray the expenses incident to the water supply, and that they have no authority by the said Act or otherwise to receive any more money from the consumers than is required to pay the above-mentioned expenses. And further, that as the inhabitants have, on the faith of the existing rates, adopted the water supply of the appellants, and suffered their private resources to fall into disuse without special causes, it would be a breach of good faith to alter such rates. And that, therefore, the appellants are only rateable for the rent which a tenant from year to year would give for the land subject to the existing rates, and the same restrictions (if any) as those under which the appellants hold it, and not that which a tenant entirely unfettered might give. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that it is right to rate the appellants in respect of the waterworks in Olaines (as directed by sect. 1 of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96) at what a tenant would give with liberty to raise the price of water as he might think proper, so far as not restricted by law; that there were no restrictions by law in the present case, and that the fact that appellants, in fixing their rates, looked only to the benefit of the inhabitants and ratepayers of the city of Worcester, only transfers the advantage and benefit of the property from themselves to those inhabitants and ratepayers for whom they are trustees, and that it would be unfair that the inhabitants and ratepayers of the city of Worcester should enjoy this advantage and benefit at the expense of the parish of Claines and the rest of the Droitwich Union." It has been held by the Divisional Court of Appeal that the contention of the corporation is right, and we are of opinion that their decision ought to be affirmed. There are two questions to be considered. First, are the corporation, according to the true construction of the Public Health Act, prevented from charging for the use of the water a larger sum than the sum they actually require for the maintenance and repair of the waterworks; and, secondly, if they are, can they be rated as occupiers in respect of profits, which the law does not allow them to earn. Now, with respect to the first question, we think that the corporation in making a water rate under sect. 93 of the Public Health Act are bound to make an estimate of the sum they actually require for the maintenance of the water works, and cannot legally levy a larger sum by a water rate than the sum they so require. The 94th section makes the water rate payable in advance, and enables the supply of any persons who neglects to pay it to be cut off, and we think it cannot have been intended that the corporation should charge any person more than his fair share of the sum which is required to maintain the waterworks. There is nothing in the case to prove that the 651l. which is stated to be on the average of eight years, the whole net income the corporation have derived from the waterworks was not the whole sum they required for the maintenance of the waterworks. The question then is whether, in applying the rule given by the Parochial Assessment Act, the court is to consider what rent a tenant from year to year would give for the reservoir and waterworks, who was subject to the same restrictions the corporation are subject to, or what rent a tenant from year to year would give who was subject to no such restrictions, and we are of opinion that the hypothetical tenant is to be a tenant subject to the restrictions. The case of the corporation of Liverpool, and the overseers of Wavertree, as reported in the Justice of the Peace is directly in point, and we are of opinion that case was correctly decided. Blackburn, J., there says, "The whole question turns on the rule given by the Parochial Assessment Act, which says the occupier is rateable at what a tenant from year to year will give, subject to the same restrictions as those under which the tenant holds it." This decision seems to us to be right on principle. An occupier of land is not rateable in respect of the whole profit derived from the land, but only in respect of the profit which he himself derives from the land. If there be a common in the possession of the lord of the manor, he is not rateable in respect of the profits derived by the commoners from the common, although, in rating the lands of the commoners, the fact of their lands being rendered more valuable by reason of the occupier being entitled to a right of common is taken into account. So in the present case the rent, and, therefore, the rateable value of every house in Worcester, is increased by reason of the occupier being entitled to cheap water from the waterworks of the corporation, and if the corporation in respect of the reservoir and waterworks were rated at the profit which a tenant under no restriction could get from the waterworks, the same profit would be rated twice over. If the works were transferred to a tenant, who was under no restriction as to the price he charged for water, the rateable value of the waterworks would be increased, but there would be a corresponding diminution of the rateable value of the premises supplied with the water. We may also observe that the reservoir by itself without the power of connecting the reservoir with the houses by pipes running through the streets is, probably, worth nothing, and certainly is not worth 600l. a year, and it is the same Act of Parliament which gives the power to lay the pipes, and, therefore, creates the value of the reservoir which contains the restrictions on the amount of profit, which the occupier of the reservoir can earn. Even in the case of the reservoirs of public companies established by Act of Parliament to supply towns with water, in estimating the rateable value of the reservoirs, the court only considers the amount of profit which the terms of their Act enable the company to earn, not the profits which the company might earn if Parliament had enabled the company to establish the waterworks without restriction as to the price to be charged to consumers. So also in rating a railway, or any other work made under an Act of Parliament, the calculation must always commence with the profits, which are actually earned according to the terms of the Act of Parliament, not with the profits which might be earned if the company was unlimited in its charges. It follows, therefore, that, according to the contention of the appellants, the corporation are rateable in respect of their reservoir at a higher sum than a waterworks company established by Act of Parliament would be rateable, and are rateable on an assumption, which not only is not true, but which cannot be true, namely, that a tenant is in possession of a reservoir with the monopoly of the supply of a particular town with water, and is unlimited in respect of his charges.

[CT. OF APP.]

REG. v. COLLINS.

REG. v. COLLINS.

Local board—Election—Quo warranto—Scrutiny of votes—Certificate of chairman—When final—Miscounting—Judicial decision—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 27—Public Health Act 1848.

At an election of members for a local board of health, the chairman, acting under sect. 27 of the Public Health Act 1848, certified that seven persons, of whom the defendant was one, and had the smallest number of votes, were elected. The relator, who was a candidate, had three votes less than the defendant. Upon a scrutiny before a judge of assize without a jury, it appeared that by correction of mistakes in counting, the votes for the relator and the defendant were equal; that one vote for the relator had been mislaid and not counted at all; and that two votes for the relator which the chairman had found to be valid were in fact invalid, although no objection had been made to them at the time of their reception.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division below), on a quo warranto, that mistakes made in the chairman's ministerial capacity alone could be inquired into, but that his certificate was conclusive as to all matters upon which he could, by using the means provided by the Act, come to a judicial decision, and that, therefore, the chairman's addition of the votes could, but the validity of the votes could not, be questioned.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule to enter the verdict for the relator on a quo warranto issue.

The quo warranto called on the defendant to show by what title he acted as a member of a local board of health. Plea, that the defendant was duly elected, and traverse of the plea by the relator.

The issue was tried before Blackburn, J., without a jury, at the Dorchester Winter Assizes 1875. A verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being reserved for the relator to have the verdict entered for him.

The relator accordingly obtained a rule nisi pursuant to his leave reserved, and, upon cause being shown, the Queen's Bench Division (Mellor and Field, JJ., Blackburn, J. dissenting) made the rule absolute.

From this decision the relator now appealed.

The case in the court below is fully reported ante p. 173; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 447. The facts sufficiently appear from the head note above.

By sect. 27 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) it is enacted:

That the chairman shall on the day immediately following the day of the election, and on as many days immediately succeeding as may be necessary, attend at the office of the local board of health, and ascertain the validity of the votes by an examination of the rate books and such other books and documents as he may think necessary, and by examining such persons as he may see fit; and he shall cast up such of the votes as he shall find to be valid and to have been duly given, collected, or received, and ascertain the number of such votes for each candidate. And the candidates to the number to be elected, who being duly qualified, shall have obtained the greatest number of votes, shall be deemed to be elected and shall be certified as such by the said chairman under his hand; and to each person so elected the said chairman shall send or deliver notice of such election; and the said chairman shall also cause to be made a list containing the names of the candidates together with (in case of a contest) the number of votes given for each and the names of the persons elected; and shall sign and certify the same, and shall deliver such list, together with the nomination and voting paper which he shall have received to the local board of health at their first or next meeting (as the case may be), who shall cause the same to be deposited in their office, and the same shall during office hours thereat be kept open to public inspection, together with all other documents relating to the election, for six months after the election shall have taken place, without fee or reward; and the said chairman shall cause such lists to be printed and copies thereof to be affixed at the usual places for affixing notices for parochial business within the parts for which the election shall have been made.

The whole of this Act is now repealed by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, but the provisions of sect. 27, as to the duties of the returning officer at elections are reenacted in the new Act (Schedule 2, ss. 51 & 54), in precisely the same terms as in sect. 27, with the insertion of the following clause between the words "Such votes for each candidate," and "and the candidates."

Any candidate may himself attend, or may appoint any agent to attend the examination and casting up of the votes; any candidate or agent so attending who obstructs or in any way interferes with the examination and casting up of the votes, may, by order of the returning officer, be forthwith removed from the place appointed for that purpose, and shall not be permitted to return.

Cole, Q.C. (with him Pinder), for the defendant.

—The question is, whether the certificate of the chairman, the presiding officer at elections of local boards of health, is conclusive, or whether it can be afterwards questioned; and, if so, in what manner? Blackburn, J., in the court below, gives reasons, which are conclusive, to show that the Legislature did not intend, by the enactments in sect. 27 of the Public Health Act 1848, to make the chairman's certificate final. The Act provides that the voting and nomination papers should be kept open for the inspection of the public for six months, the object being to give the public an opportunity of examining the voting papers to ascertain whether the votes were valid. If no scrutiny can be held, why should the voting papers be kept open at all? Reg. v. Morgan (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 930; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 26), should have been cited in the court below in addition to the cases there mentioned. In that case a quo warranto went, where a chairman had wrongly held that a nomination, under sect. 24, was bad. Under that section a chairman can clearly hold a judicial inquiry into whether a nomination is valid or not. [BRETT, J.—The chairman is to come to a decision after using the means of inquiry provided by the Act. That is arriving at a judicial, or, at all events, a quasi judicial decision.] It is submitted that there is no distinction between what a chairman does judicially or what he does ministerially for this purpose. The two capacities cannot be separated. It would be impossible to ascertain how the chairman arrived at his result; whether by miscounting or improper rejection of votes.

Kingdon, Q.C. (with him H. C. Bennett), for the relator, were not called on.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we are asked to reconsider the question decided in the judgments of the court below, and it is suggested that the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn should be followed, and that of my brothers Mellor and Field overruled. The effect of the judgment of the majority of the court below appears to be this: that where, on an election of a local board, the returning officer has made an error in his ministerial capacity, the mistake may be inquired into by means of a quo warranto; but where the mistake has occurred otherwise, the certificate of the returning officer is final, and the mistake cannot afterwards be inquired into. I am of opinion that the latter view is the correct one. The statute is the Public Health Act 1848, and the important section is the 27th. [His Lordship here read the section (ubi sup.)] Now, by this section the chairman is to ascertain the validity of the votes, and he is to come to a conclusion on their validity or invalidity by the process and means which the Act affords. It might occur to some minds that other means and a better process could have been provided, but, taking the section as it stands, the Legislature has determined that the chairman may come to a decision whether the votes are valid or not, by examining the rate book and witnesses, &c., and that the decision cannot be questioned in so far as it is judicial. I am of opinion that, as has been pointed out by my brother Brett, a judi-sial decision means arriving at a decision after using means of inquiry, and I am clear that under this section the chairman's proceedings are judicial. In this Act, if the chairman has neglected or refused to comply with its provisions, he is liable (sect. 28) to a penalty of 50l. There is no question of that sort here. In this case there were only two votes with regard to which the question is important. It is not a question of miscasting, but of votes which ought not to have been received, because if objected to they would have been found invalid. Now upon this the point arises: Is the certificate of the returning officer valid and conclusive? I think it is; I think the Act of 1848 intends that the chairman should make his certificate on the result of examining books and witnesses if necessary, and not merely upon the result of his having cast up the number of the votes. So the matter would stand, I think, on the true construction of the statute. The extreme difficulty and inconvenience of providing for questioning the decision of the chairman by quo warranto is obvious, and the distinction between calling in question his judicial decision and merely questioning his addition, is also very plain. So obvious is the inconvenience in the former case, that in the case of municipal elections an Act has been passed to remove it, and provide a method of calling the certificate in question: (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33.) But we are not compelled to depend entirely upon the construction of the Act in this matter. The very question of the conclusiveness of the certificate has been raised before Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Cross (19 L. T. Rep. O. S. 35). Blackburn, J. appears to have been erroneous in thinking that Lord Campbell did not decide the point in Reg. v. Cross (ubi sup.) He decided it expressly, it being, as he said, a "novel and important one." There were two points raised: one, whether the chairman was properly appointed; and, secondly, whether his certificate was final and conclusive. Lord Campbell said that it was, as far as the validity of the votes were concerned, though he said it might not be so with regard to the correctness of the casting up. It is therefore a decision (although at Nisi Prius only) of a judge singularly competent to decide upon the construction of statutes, made after full argument by very learned counsel, and although inviting review, no one has yet asked to have it reviewed. We are, therefore, supported in the construction of this Act by the judgment of that eminent judge. I am of opinion that the majority of the court below put the true construction upon the Act, and that their judgment ought to be affirmed.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. According to the ordinary construction of statutes creating a new elective body, the proceedings of that body can be questioned in the Court of Queen's Bench, but when the Act provides otherwise, those proceedings cannot be questioned at all. Here judicial and ministerial powers are given by the Act to the Chairman of the Local Board. I think the words are clearly sufficient to give judicial powers, and the Act then says that he shall cast up such votes "as he shall find to be valid." I think that the finding of the votes to be valid is a judicial proceeding, because he is to decide after examination of the rate book and witnesses. It is true that he has not power to examine witnesses on oath, but the inquiry is still a quasi judicial one. The casting up of the votes is clearly only ministerial; I think the latter proceeding may be questioned, but not the former. It would be a great inconvenience that proceedings of this nature should be open to question on quo warranto, and the Legislature may have had that inconvenience in view when the 27th section was enacted. I think that the opinion of Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Cross was correct, and that we must follow it. Another Act has been passed as to municipal elections, making a reform in a similar case to this. And as to the election of local boards, there is a clause in a later Act (sects 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, sch. 2 and seq.) that any candidate or his agent may be present at the examination of voting papers, but not giving any appeal from the returning officer's finding on the validity of the votes. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division ought to be affirmed.

BRETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion.

AMPHLETT, J.A.—On the whole, I am not prepared to differ from the result of the judgment of the rest of the court, but I must say that, if not supported by the authority of Lord Campbell's opinion, I should have had great difficulty in coming to a conclusion in this case, because I think that the Act was not intended to give judicial power to the chairman, but when I find the contrary opinion in a decision of Lord Campbell, given so long ago, and not questioned up to this time, and when I find that the Legislature has passed an Act of Parliament to allow agents to be present, I come to the conclusion that it may have been intended in the Act of 1848 that the chairman should inquire judicially into the validity of the votes, and that his certificate should be final.

Judgment affirmed.

Dec. 9 and 11, 1876.

STONE v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF YEovil.

Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17)—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18) s. 9—Diversion of streams—Tenant for life—Injury to land—Compensation—Ultra vires.

A reference to valuation, under sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, may be had in the case of "permanent damage or injury" to lands held by a tenant for life, as well as to lands "to be purchased or taken from any party under any disability or incapacity," &c.

Defendants, a municipal corporation, were, under a local waterworks Act, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, empowered to "take, use, divert, and appropriate" certain streams and sources of water, and amongst others a stream which flowed to, and was essential to the working of, a mill, of which the plaintiff was tenant for life. Defendants accordingly gave plaintiff notice of their intention to divert the whole of the stream, and did take and divert a great portion of it.

Subsequently, by an agreement, made under the powers of the special Act, plaintiff and defendants agreed to refer to two surveyors "the amount of compensation money to be now paid by the corporation for the damage which the owner or owners for the time being of the said premises may sustain by the abstraction of the whole of the said streams, &c.," which the corporation were empowered to take and divert.

The surveyors were unable to agree, and a third surveyor was nominated under sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, who made his award, assessing a sum as compensation for the "permanent damage and injury which the owner or owners for the time being of the above-mentioned mill, &c., may have sustained, or shall or may sustain by the abstraction of the whole of the streams," &c.

The plaintiff sued the defendants to recover the sum so assessed, and filed his statement of claim setting out the above facts, and claiming the amount, and a mandamus directing the defendants to pay it into the bank, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

The defendants demurred.

Held (affirming the decision of the Common Pleas Division), that the defendants' reference to valuation was not ultra vires; that there had been a good valuation under sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845; and that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation in respect of the whole of the streams which the defendants had given him notice of their intention to take, and not merely in respect of so much of the streams as had been already taken.

APPEAL from a decision of the Common Pleas Division.

The case in the court below is fully reported ante p. 235; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 874.

The facts, for the purposes of the present report, sufficiently appear from the head note above, and the judgments (post).

Sect. 9 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18 enacts that,

The purchase money or compensation to be paid for any lands to be purchased or taken from any party under any disability or incapacity, and not having power to sell or convey such lands except under the provisions of this, or the special Act, and the compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any such lands, shall not, except where the same shall have been determined by the verdict of a jury, or by arbitration, or by the valuation of a surveyor appointed by two justices under the provision hereinafter contained, be less than shall be determined by the valuation of two able practical surveyors, one of whom shall be nominated by the promoters of the undertaking, and the other by the other party, and, if such two surveyors cannot agree in the valuation, then by such third surveyor as any two justices shall, upon application of either party, after notice to the other party, for that purpose nominate, &c.

Sect. 22 enacts that,

If no agreement be come to between the promoters of the undertaking and the owners or parties by this Act enabled to sell and convey, or release any lands taken or required for or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands, as to the value of such lands, or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, and if in any such case the compensation claimed shall not exceed 50*l.*, the same shall be settled by two justices

If exceeding 50*l.* the compensation is to be settled by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury: (s. 23.)

And sect. 68 enacts that,

If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or if any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l.*, such party may have the same settled by arbitration, or by the verdict of a jury as he shall think fit, and, if such party desire to have the same settled by arbitration, it shall be lawful for him to give notice in writing to the promoters of the undertaking of such his desire, stating in such notice the nature of the interest in such lands in respect of which he claims compensation, and the amount of compensation so claimed therein; and unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the amount of compensation so claimed, and shall enter into a written agreement for that purpose within twenty-one days after the receipt of any such notice from any party so entitled, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner herein provided.

The section then goes on to provide for the mode of settling compensation by a jury.

The 6th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), enacts that,

Where by the special Act the undertakers shall be empowered, for the purpose of constructing or supplying waterworks, to take or use any lands or streams, otherwise than with the consent of the owners and occupiers thereof, they shall, in exercising the powers so given to them, be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act, and, if the lands be situated in England or Ireland, to the provisions and restrictions contained in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all the parties interested in, any land or streams taken or used for the purpose of the special Act, or injuriously affected by the construction or maintenance of the works thereby authorised, or otherwise by the execution of the powers thereby conferred, full compensation, to be ascertained in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

And sect. 12 enacts that:

Subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act and any Act incorporated therewith, the undertakers may, amongst other things, from time to time divert and impound the water from the streams mentioned for that purpose in the special Act, or the plans or books of reference, and alter the course of any such streams, not being navigable, and also take such waters as may be found in and under or on the lands to be taken for constructing the works: Provided always, that in the exercise of the said powers the undertakers shall do as little damage as can be, &c., and shall make full compensation to all parties interested for all damages sustained by them through the exercise of such powers.

Kingdon, Q.C. and H. Cary Batten for the defendants.—The agreement for submission to valuation is ultra vires on the part of the defendants: (The Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Company v. Riche, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 450; L. Rep. 7 H. of L. 553; 44 L. J. 185, Ex.; see also Frend and Ware's Precedents as to Agreements ultra vires.) The plaintiff is only tenant for life, and the remainderman may repudiate the arrangement, and require to be paid again. When this agreement was made, the decision in Ferrand v. The Mayor of Bradford (21 Beav. 402) was supposed to be law, but it has since been overruled by Bush v. The Trowbridge Waterworks Company (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 182; L. Rep. 19 Ex. 291); affirmed by the Lords Justices (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 137; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 459). The latter case shows defendants are not purchasers. The plaintiff has mistaken his remedy in proceeding under sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Act, which does not apply to consequential damage, but only to property purchased and damage to such property. [BRAMWELL, J.A.—Does not "such" lands mean lands in possession of persons under disability?] The court below eliminated "such" from sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and introduced "or to be sustained" into sect. 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act; "such" may be referred back to the heading of the group of sections which is "with respect to purchase of lands by agreement." Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Company (3 B. & S. 436; 32 L. J. 113, Q. B.), which was relied on for the plaintiff below, does not apply. Hutton v. London and South-Western Railway Company (7 Hare 259) was also cited.

Petheram for the plaintiff.—It must be taken on demurrer that the allegations in the statement of claim are true. It is stated that it was within the defendants' power to take the water; that notice was given that there was a permanent injury to plaintiff's property, and that the agreement was duly made. By the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, the special Act, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts together, the parties are entitled to enter into an agreement as to assessing the amount under sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and by the Waterworks Clauses Act, and the special Act, they are entitled to make the compensation a sum payable at once, "Such" in sect. 9 is to be construed as Bramwell, J.A. has suggested. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The local Act treats the taking of the water as the acquiring of a right, not as a mode of injuriously affecting the land.] This is an actual purchase of property under the Acts; but if it were a case of "injuriously affecting" lands, sect. 22 and sect. 23 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act show that sect. 6 and sect. 9, were meant to apply to it. The defendants were intra vires in making the agreement to refer, and compensation has been rightly assessed for the taking of the whole stream.

Kingdon, Q.C. replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The appellants, the municipal corporation of Yeovil, the defendants in the suit below, were, by a local Act of Parliament passed in 1870, empowered to construct waterworks for supplying the borough of Yeovil and a certain adjacent district with water. For this purpose they were empowered to "purchase, enter upon, take, use, get, divert, and appropriate the streams, springs, waters, and sources of water shown on the deposited plans, and described in the deposited books of reference." The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845 are incorporated with the local Act. Among the streams so authorized to be taken was one which, rising some distance above a mill and premises of which the respondent, the plaintiff in the suit below, is seised as tenant for life, and flowing onwards to his mill and premises, was essential to the working of the mill. The appellants, under the powers of their Act, gave notice to the respondent of their intention to divert and appropriate the whole of the stream, and they proceeded to take and divert a great portion, but not the whole of such water; the necessary effect of this diversion of the water being to cause serious and permanent injury to the respondent's mill. A correspondence took place between the solicitors for the respective parties, and an agreement was drawn up, upon which, after reciting the Act of Parliament, and that the corporation, for the purposes of the waterworks, "intend from time to time to take, use, divert, and appropriate the waters" in question, and that Stone, as tenant for life of a certain mill called Withyhook Mill, was interested in such streams, each party proceeded, according to the terms of the 9th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, to appoint "an able practical surveyor to determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the corporation for the damage which the owner might sustain by the abstraction of the whole of the said streams, springs, and waters." The surveyors so appointed not being able to agree, application was made on behalf of both parties, according to the provisions of the section, to two justices to appoint a surveyor to determine the amount of compensation, which was accordingly done, and the amount assessed at 93l. 9s. 5d. The plaintiff having instituted a suit in the Court of Common Pleas for a mandamus to the corporation to deposit the amount according to the provision of the 69th section of the Lands Clauses Act, the defendants demur to the claim, their contention being that, in entering into the agreement, they were acting ultra vires; that having taken a portion of the water only, they were not bound to make compensation beyond the extent to which the abstraction of the water in the individual instance might injuriously affect the mill and premises; in support of which contention they mainly relied on the authority of a recent decision of the Master of the Rolls in a case of Bush v. The Trowbridge Water Company, upheld by the Lords Justices on appeal, in which a portion of the water of a stream having been diverted before it reached the plaintiff's land, it was held that compensation could not be claimed for the loss of the stream, but only so far as the diversion of the quantity taken injuriously affected the plaintiff's land. The present case is, however, plainly distinguishable from that of Bush v. The Trowbridge Water Company; for in the latter case the water company took power to divert only a portion of a brook which flowed through the plaintiff's land, and though the portion abstracted prevented the stream from being of the same practical benefit in the way of irrigation to the plaintiff which it had before, the brook or stream, though seriously diminished in quantity, continued to flow through the land as before, and it is upon this that the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices appear to have proceeded. In the present case the corporation have taken power to divert the whole body of the stream, and gave notice of their intention to the plaintiff so to do, and the case comes within the decision of Lord Romilly, in Ferrand v. The Mayor of Bradford, which is by no means overruled by the decision in the Trowbridge case. Under these circumstances the plaintiff becomes entitled under the section of the local Act, and under sect. 6 of the General Waterworks Consolidation Act, to compensation for the value of the entire stream, and not merely to compensation proportionate to the degree in which his land may be injuriously affected by their partial abstraction of the water. By sect. 8 of the local Act, the corporation are empowered to enter upon and take and appropriate the stream and waters to which the Act relates as a whole, not to take as much of them as they may find convenient, or as much as they think it expedient to take from time to time. The owner or occupier of a stream so taken would have a perfect right to say, "you must take the whole or none." He would equally have a right to

STONE v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSSES OF YEovil.

say, "you shall not take the water from time to time, leaving me in entire uncertainty when you will take all or none, or how much you will find it convenient to take next." And here the corporation gave notice, as I think by the Act of Parliament they were bound to do, of their intention to take the whole, and while they became entitled to take were bound to take the whole. The position of the respective parties would obviously otherwise be most unequal. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the corporation, if they took any of the water, were bound to pay for the whole before they could acquire the right to take any. If, having acquired the right to take the whole, they found it more convenient to take it by instalments, leaving the residue to flow on in its usual course, and giving the landowner the benefit of it in the meantime, they might possibly have the right to do so, but they could not compel the landowner to accept compensation on each renewed taking. Now, where the whole of a stream or other water is taken, both the general and the special Acts treat the right or interest in the water as a substantive right or interest which may be transferred and taken, and the value of which may be assessed and compensated, and not as something merely subordinate to the land, the loss of which must be looked at only as it injuriously affects the land. The 6th section to the general Act expressly says that compensation is to be made "for the value of streams so taken" as distinguished from damage to land or streams occasioned by the exercise of statutory powers given to take the water. No doubt, in estimating the value of a stream, it is necessary to take into account the use to which it can be put relatively to the land. In itself, except so far as the value of the fishing may be concerned, the value of a private stream is insignificant. It is only in so far as the water can be made available for purposes of irrigation, or for watering cattle, or the like, or as adding to the value of the property as ornamental water, that water can be said to have value, and the compensation to be paid for its loss must, practically speaking, be measured by the determination in the value of the land occasioned by such loss. Nevertheless, when a statute says that where water is taken its value must be assessed and paid for, it seems to follow that before any of it can be taken that value must be paid, and that the water cannot be taken in parts and compensation be made in proportion as the value of the land becomes from time to time affected by the loss. The difficulty consists in applying the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, to which it becomes necessary to resort for the purpose of determining the amount of compensation to be paid in such a case as the present. The plaintiff, being tenant for life only, could not, except by virtue of this last mentioned Act, claim for more than his life interest, or bar those in remainder; but by sect. 7 a tenant for life is enabled to do so whether in respect of an estate in land, or, as in this case, in respect of an interest in water. But by the 9th section the compensation, except where the same shall have been determined by the verdict of a jury, or by arbitration, or the valuation of a surveyor appointed by two justices (for all which modes of proceeding provision is made by later sections of the Act) shall not be less than

shall be determined by the valuation of two able practical surveyors, one to be nominated by each party, and, if these cannot agree, by a third surveyor to be nominated by two justices. Though dealing in this part of the Act only with the power of a person under disability to convey the whole estate, the framers of the 9th section have further applied, as it were by anticipation, its provisions to permanent damage or injury to lands held by these parties, that being obviously the meaning of the words "such lands," which words cannot, I think, be struck out as surplusage, being on the contrary words essential to the true meaning of the enactment. But with this we are not concerned, inasmuch as we are here dealing with the substantive right to the water, and not with any consequential damage either to the water or the land by reason of the obstruction of any part of the stream. The difficulty consists in applying the 7th and 9th sections of the Act to a case not of voluntary purchase and conveyance, to which this part of the Act and these sections relate, but to a case in which the water is taken compulsorily. Looking, however, to the fact that upon the amount of compensation or purchase money ascertained to be payable to persons under disability, but entitled under the statute to convey, being paid into the account of the accountant-general under sect. 69, such persons must, under the operation of sect. 75, convey the land or water, as the case may be, to the promoters of the undertaking, and that in sect. 9 the mode of proceeding adopted by the parties in this case is mentioned as one that may be adopted for ascertaining the value, though it is there referred to with reference more immediately to the matter of voluntary sale, it seems to me that upon entering into this agreement the plaintiff may be considered as having been ready and willing to convey and the defendants to accept the conveyance of the plaintiff's right in the water, on the amount of compensation being assessed by this mode of proceeding. The tenant for life was, under sect. 7, enabled to convey the interest in the water, provided sect. 9, which was intended to protect the interests of those in remainder, was complied with. It was competent to the defendants to agree to the necessary steps being taken to satisfy the exigency of sect. 9. It was to the interest of both parties that this should be done in order to obviate the necessity of any other form of proceeding. If this course had not been adopted, recourse must have been had to a jury, or to arbitration on a different form as provided by the Act. It was, as it seems to me, clearly competent for the parties to proceed as they have done under the 9th section. I cannot, therefore, say that, in entering into the agreement to which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendants bound, the latter were in any way acting ultra vires, and are therefore entitled to have the agreement treated as invalid. I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The judgment of the Common Pleas Division must be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. Notwithstanding that the Lord Chief Justice has stated the facts, I think it will be convenient if I shortly mention how I appreciate or understand them. Plaintiff, as the tenant for life of this mill, was entitled to the flow of water. The defendants have given notice to take the whole of the water; so that a wrong has been done to the plaintiff, if it were not that the defendants were authorised to do what they have done under the Act of Parliament. But that entails upon the defendants that they must in some way compensate the plaintiff, either by purchasing the right from him to do what they have done, or by compensating him for the damage they have done, and accordingly the plaintiff and the defendants have agreed that the defendants should. This is how I understand the facts; and I have no doubt the meaning is, that the defendants are to have for ever the right to do that which they are doing at this moment, and pay the price of compensation therefor. But the plaintiff, being only tenant for life, could not agree to a price less than should be fixed by two able practical surveyors, or in their default by a third able practical surveyor appointed by two justices. The plaintiff could agree to such sum as should be fixed by such able practical surveyor or surveyors, and he has agreed to take it on behalf of himself and his remainderman, and the defendants agreed to pay compensation in this way, and accordingly each appointed an able practical surveyor, and in default of the agreement of those two, the justices appointed a third surveyor, and he has estimated a value which, according to the agreement, ought to be paid by the defendants, but they object to do so. Therefore the plaintiff brought an action for a mandamus to compel them not to pay him, but to pay the money in at the appointed place. Under these circumstances—these being the facts as I appreciate them—the question is whether the agreement is ultra vires; that is to say, whether the defendants could agree—whether they could in point of law validly make such an agreement as this, and the question is just the same as though the plaintiff had been a tenant in fee and the money had only to be paid to him. Could the defendants agree with a tenant in fee for the purchase from him once for all of the right to do that which they have done and which they propose continuing to do? Now I am of opinion that they could lawfully and int a vires have entered into such an agreement as that. The first question I put to myself is what I put to Mr. Kingdon in the course of the argument. If this agreement cannot be entered into, what is the remedy of the plaintiff and those who shall come after him under this statute? And Mr. Kingdon answered, as I think he was bound to do: "He must, from time to time, as he is damaged, under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, which is incorporated with the private Act of this company, take proceedings under that section." Then are those proceedings to be taken daily, monthly, yearly, or every five years? It is said, Well, if there is a damage to the extent of 50*l.* in the course of a month, why should not the man have it at once, and if the parties cannot agree, take proceedings under the 68th section? or, if not monthly, why not every five years? Is it conceivable that the Legislature can have intended to leave the parties in such a condition that all that can be done to adjust their rights is that there must be continually recurring proceedings under the 68th section? I am convinced that it cannot be so, unless by some extraordinary oversight on the part of the Legislature, and I think it not unreasonable to approach the construction of the other sections of the Act with the idea that this cannot have been the meaning, and that there must have been some other. Looking at the private Act, it seems to me that under sect. 8 the defendants have power to purchase out and out the right which they propose to exercise for all time, because sect. 8 says that they may make and maintain the waterworks and enter upon, take, and use the lands described, and may purchase, enter upon, take, use, get, divert, and appropriate the streams, springs, waters, and sources of water. Now, what does it mean by saying that they may purchase the streams and sources of water? It does not mean merely that they may purchase of somebody the land in which the stream or source of water arises, for that would not be purchasing the water, because it is not the water of the landowner to sell. He may sell all the land, or he may sell all his rights in the springs which rise in the land, but he has no right of withholding the water from those persons to whom it would come in the natural course of things. Therefore that cannot be the meaning of the Act. The only sensible meaning that we can attach to these words is, that the water can be purchased in this sense—that no riparian owner to whom it may come shall have a right to complain. In other words, the defendants may purchase from all the riparian proprietors the right to divert the water without complaint. That, I think, is the obvious meaning of the Act. This opinion, so far as it goes, is not inconsistent with the decision in the Trowbridge case. If I thought it was, seeing who gave the judgment in that case, I should say what I am saying with the greatest hesitation and reserve; but in the Trowbridge case the question was different altogether from the one we have now to decide. As I understand the Trowbridge case, it was an attempt to make the corporation, who wanted a part of the stream only, take the whole of it, which was very properly refused. On these grounds, therefore, I think under sect. 8 of the local Act there was power to enter into this bargain. If I am wrong in this view, I think it would not matter, because I think the case would then come within sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Act. I do not think the word "such" in that section ought to be rejected, but it cannot, to my mind, be read literally as it stands, or there would be, as Mr. Justice Brett ruled, this absurdity, that compensation is to be arranged for permanent injury or damage to lands which did not continue to belong to the landowner, but which had been taken by the company themselves. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that the word "such" means "so owned," and that compensation is to be made for permanent damage or injury to any lands "so owned." The language of the section may be inaccurate, but I hold that to be the meaning of it. Mr. Petheram called our attention to the 22nd section. I suppose he meant to point out that under the agreement clauses an agreement was made for compensation. If that is so, supposing the case not to come within the 68th section, I think it is within the 9th section of the Land Clauses Act, and for the same reason as I have already given. Now is there a power given of compensating once for all? I hold that under the 68th and 9th sections together there is such a power. Consequently, whether this is to be treated as a purchase or as compensation for lands injuriously affected, it was clearly competent for the parties to enter into the agreement they have entered into; why should they not? We have been shown the enormous inconvenience that it should not be so. Take the case of lands injuriously affected. Suppose lights are obstructed. It could not be said that the tenant should bring his action and claim compensation under the 68th section, as the injury takes place "from time to time." It may be said that what obstructs the light is of a permanent character. I do not know that that is so. People may alter their works, or the obstruction may be made more permanent. Therefore you cannot say the damage is the same for all time. Then the case of a way may be put. It is an inconvenience to a person if a way be diverted so that his premises are made more difficult of access, and he is entitled to compensation. It may be that more people are coming by that way at one time than at another, and therefore the inconvenience is greater. But there is no doubt he may have compensation once for all. It may be said that it is impossible to put a value on so uncertain a thing as this, as the damage at one time may consist in taking half, or a quarter, or the whole of the water. Now I am satisfied a value can be put upon it. Any able practical surveyor might state a fair sum as what ought to be paid for any part necessary to be taken. I may refer to a case within my own knowledge, for I was counsel in it—that of the New River Company. That company bought the right of taking out of the Lea—not a certain quantity of water, but as much as they could take if they pleased by a gauge constructed in a particular way. It did not follow that they always took the whole. If the springs of the New River were abundant they took none; if they were low they took a great deal; and there was a proportionate value set upon what they did take. There are other arguments of inconvenience and otherwise why this should be so. What is the miller to do? When he knows once for all that he will have no further compensation for what has happened, he will adjust his mill to the probable supply of water which he expects to get. For instance, if the mill originally required a power of water called "A," and if he calculated that only half the water had been taken, he might reduce his mill accordingly. What is he to do when the supply is precarious? If he keeps the original mill he requires the whole of "A," and if he gets only half of "A" it will not work. That is hard upon him and on the corporation. But if he reduces the mill to the half of "A," and it works properly, the corporation may say, "You are not damaged at all; all the mill you have got is properly worked." That is a difficulty which may arise from this mode of compensation, that it may be either inordinate or inadequate. Another observation is this: If the plaintiff is to recover in consequence of his lands being injuriously affected by the execution of the works, he would be met by this difficulty—although I do not attach much importance to it: the company might say, "It is not by our works we have done what you complain of; it is because we choose to use certain sluices in a particular way." I think the Legislature meant to say that, when the works are executed in such a way as that they can be so used as to damage, compensation is to be paid, and it is giving a reason why the compensation should be once for all and not from time to time. It is to be observed that these words "from time to time" are not used in sect. 8 of the local Act. The case, I think, comes properly within that section. If not, it comes properly within sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. I think the words "from time to time" mean this, that it may be that "from time to time" there will be an alteration in the amount of permanent damage done, or within the power of the company to do, just as a railway company, or any company that takes lands, might obstruct lights by a permanent building, and then might afterwards, under their powers, further obstruct those lights. That is the sort of case of "from time to time" which the Legislature contemplates. In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that there was a power to purchase this right under the 8th section of the local Act; that if there was not, there was a power to agree upon a compensation to be paid under the 9th and 68th sections of the Lands Clauses Act; and that the case before us is equally good, whether the one or the other construction is right; and consequently that the judgment of the court below is right, and should be affirmed.

[Ct. of App.]

STONE v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN AND BURGESSES OF YEOVIL.

AMPHLETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. The case has been so fully gone into that I shall make but few observations. In fact I should make none were it not for the impression that seems to have been in the mind of the court below, and in which I am unable to agree, that the case of Ferrand v. Mayor of Bradford was, in fact, overruled by the case of Bush v. The Trunobridge Waterworks Company. I entirely agree with what the Lord Chief Justice has said, that those two cases stand perfectly well together—that one does not overrule the other; and I am firm in that view, because the case of Ferrand v. The Mayor of Bradford was cited both before the present Master of the Rolls and before the Lords Justices, and neither one nor the other ever alluded to the case, or ever stated that they overruled it, which they would, I think, as a matter of courtesy in so recent a case as that had they intended to do so. It is hardly credible that they would have overruled it, if they intended to do so, without giving some reasons. If you look at their judgment you will find they distinguish it altogether from the former case. What was the former case? The Corporation of Bradford, as it appears by the report, under their power to take the whole or what they wanted from time to time, had, before the Bill was filed, taken the whole of the water flowing through the plaintiff's lands. The question was whether that was a purchase, so that the corporation could be called upon to deposit the presumed value before they could be allowed to go on with the diversion of the water. They having, by the terms of their Act, power to purchase the stream, by taking the whole of the water, had destroyed the stream which came through the plaintiff's property, and the Master of the Rolls held in that case that it was a purchase of the stream, and therefore the provisions of the Act obliged them to pay the presumed value into court before they could take it. The subsequent case was this: there was a similar power to take the whole or a part. All the defendants had done there was to divert a portion of the stream. The wish of the plaintiff, because they had so taken a portion, was to say, "Now you have taken a part, and you must purchase the whole," and he prayed an injunction upon that ground. Both the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices held that that was not a case of purchasing the stream. The defendants had power, under their Act, to take a portion of the stream, and the plaintiffs must go, under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and obtain compensation for the injury done to the stream, and to his land, by their taking a portion of the water. It appears to me, therefore, that those two cases stand, and I should be sorry if it were understood that the former case overruled the latter. Now the present case is exactly the same as the case of Ferrand v. The Mayor of Bradford. There is power to purchase the stream, and looking at the General Waterworks Act, combined with the local Act, they have power if they like, to take "from time to time," either the whole or a portion. Under these circumstances I agree with what my learned brothers have said, that in this case, like the case of Ferrand v. The Mayor of Bradford, it is a purchase of the whole stream, and therefore the purchasing clauses appear to me to be the clauses that govern the case. But if I am wrong in that, supposing that it does not come within the purchasing clauses, but comes within the 85th section, which enables compensation to be given for damage done to land, I think the result in this particular case is exactly the same. The result would not have been the same if the application here had been to oblige them to pay the full value of the stream into court, as in Bush's case. That could not be done. The plaintiff is merely coming here for compensation for the damage done to him by diversion of the stream, and therefore, supposing that it comes under the 85th section, it appears to me that compensation can be obtained in that manner precisely in the same way as if it were a purchase. There is some little ambiguity in the sections, but when you examine them particularly you will find that there can be no doubt that a limited owner can obtain under the clause full compensation, both for himself and the remainderman, for the damage either done or apprehended to the land. It is admitted that if it were a purchase, that is so, because under the purchase clauses of the Act a limited owner can deal with a corporation or a company exactly the same as if he were the owner in fee, subject only to the reservation that if the price is not settled by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury, then the agreed price must not be less than what may be found by two able practical surveyors. Then you come to the 68th section, which provides for compensation for damage. The 68th section does not in so many words say that a tenant for life shall be on the same footing as a tenant in fee, and he can get compensation not only for himself but for those who shall succeed him, but if you look at the next section: it is necessarily inferred, because that section refers not only to the purchase-money of land arising from a sale, but provides also for the compensation to be paid for any permanent damage done to "any such land." The inference, therefore, is that any tenant for life is as much able to bargain for any such permanent damage as for purchase-money. Supposing that to be so, it is further confirmed by section 9, which, as my Lord Chief Justice and brother Bramwell have both said, clearly includes cases of compensation for damage as well as of purchase-money, because I cannot in the least agree with the suggestion of Mr. Kingdon that those words in section 9, "compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any such lands" may mean compensation for injury done to mines or anything of that sort. They don't appear to me to be thinking of that at all. I entirely agree with the construction my brother Bramwell mentioned in the course of the argument, that it means any lands belonging to parties under disability. Therefore I cannot agree with what the court below seemed to consider, that the word "such" might practically be eliminated from the section altogether. If you eliminate the word "such" altogether, you arrive at the absurd notion that a person having an absolute interest as tenant in fee, would have to submit to the valuation of a practical surveyor before forming a new contract. But when you construe "take such lands" as referring to a person under disability, then the whole thing is rendered perfectly clear and distinct. I think this shows the tenant for life had power to bind the remainderman. Then the question is raised whether under this statement of claim it is made out that he has done so. What the parties did was to enter into an agreement. I am now assuming that the tenant for life could if he liked settle the price with the corporation, subject only to the 9th section; well, then, they were evidently intending to go under the 9th section; they agreed that the price should be settled by two able practical surveyors whom they named, and if they agreed that should be the price, they did not intend to go any farther. Well, the surveyors did not agree. The tenant for life might possibly have objected to resorting to the justices in order to have a third able practical surveyor appointed. But the 8th paragraph of the claim says that the defendants themselves made application to the justices to appoint an able practical surveyor, and the plaintiff consented to it. Taking that allegation, what is it? The tenant for life having power to agree upon a price what he says is this, "We will not trouble ourselves to fix the price now. I agree with you that you shall have the stream for such a price as under the 9th section an able practical surveyor shall appoint." Having settled that price by reference, it seems to me all that is requisite. When he has reported that value, the 9th section is complied with, and then the whole matter is settled. For these reasons I think the demurrer is bad.

REG. v. ASPINALL AND OTHERS.

Conspiracy—Indictment—Intent to deceive persons buying shares in a company—Rules of Stock Exchange—Error.

The defendants were indicted for a criminal conspiracy and found guilty on the first two counts of the indictment.

The second count alleged that the defendants, who were directors, &c., of a new company, had conspired to deceive the members of the committee of the Stock Exchange, and to induce them, contrary to the intent of certain of their rules, to order a quotation of the shares of the company in the official list of the Stock Exchange, and "thereby to persuade divers liege subjects, who should thereafter buy and sell the shares of the said company, to believe that the said company was duly formed, and had complied with the said rules, so as to entitle the company to have their shares quoted in the official list of the Stock Exchange."

The defendants assigned error.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division below), that the second count contained averments which, if taken to be proved in a sense adverse to the defendants, sufficiently supported the charge of criminal conspiracy.

THE defendants were indicted for a criminal conspiracy, and were found guilty on the first two counts of the indictment.

The defendants afterwards moved in arrest of judgment in the Queen's Bench Division, and the Court discharged the rule. Judgment was thereupon entered up and sentence pronounced, and the defendants, Aspinall and Knockner, then brought error.

The case in the court below will be found reported ante p. 412; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 738.

The two counts of the indictment upon which error was assigned, were as follows:

First count against Joseph Aspinall, William Whyte, Charles Knockner, John Saunders Muir, and two others: That by a deed made and dated the 27th March 1802, an undertaking was proposed to be carried on thenceforth in a building then erected near Throgmorton-street, City, for the transacting of buying and selling the public stocks or funds of this kingdom, and a capital sum of 20,000*l.* had been then subscribed for setting on foot and carrying on the said undertaking under the name of "The Stock Exchange," and was then divided into 400 shares of 50*l.* each, and nine persons were then appointed trustees and managers of the undertaking, and due provision was then made for election of trustees and managers from among the proprietors of the undertaking to fill up vacancies, so that there should be nine such trustees and managers. And for the management and transacting the concerns of the undertaking, thirty persons had, previous to 27th March 1802, been chosen by ballot at a general meeting of the proprietors, a committee for general purposes, and due provision was then made for an annual election by ballot of thirty proprietors of "The Stock Exchange," to act for the term of one year as aforesaid, and the committee for general purposes were thenceforth empowered to have the sole management, regulation, and direction of all the concerns of the undertaking, except the treasurer'ship thereof, and the direction and management of the buildings, and were empowered to admit such persons, whether proprietors or not, as they should think proper, to attend and frequent the building called the Stock Exchange, for the transacting therein the business of a stockbroker or jobber for one year, to be computed from the 25th March in each year, and at a price of admission fixed by the trustees and managers aforesaid. And that from and after the date of the deed, and at the time of taking the inquisition, the management, &c., of the concerns of the undertaking, except as aforesaid, had been and were carried on by the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange, and who had from time to time adopted rules and regulations for the conduct of business on the Stock Exchange which were in full force and effect in respect of the members of the Stock Exchange and Stock Exchange transactions, and the committee for general purposes had full power and authority to expel any member of the Stock Exchange who violated any of the regulations so adopted, or failed to comply with any of the decisions of the committee. Averment, that heretofore J. Aspinall and W. Whyte had been directors of a public company, called the Expion Fuel and Gas Company (Limited), and one G. P. Knockner had been the secretary and public officer of the company, and G. S. Fry, J. S. Muir, and C. Knockner had been persons aiding and assisting in the establishment of the company, and that the company had proposed to raise a capital of 35,000*l.* by subscriptions of shares of 1*l.* each, in addition to 15,000*l.* represented by 15,000 fully paid-up shares, for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the company, and that the company was in all respects a new company. And that all persons dealing in the shares of a new company, according to the rules, regulations, and usages of the Stock Exchange, when such new company had not yet received the appointment of a special settling day in respect of the transactions in the shares of such new company, required, for the purpose of making their contracts and bargains in respect of the shares enforceable according to the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange, that a special settling day should be fixed by the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange, upon which settling day all shares which had been theretofore bought and sold should be delivered and paid for according to the rules, regulations, and usages of the Stock Exchange. And that on April 1, 1874, an application had been made by and on behalf of Aspinall, Whyte, G. P. Knockner, Fry, Muir, and C. Knockner to the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange to appoint a special settling day for transactions in the shares of the company, and thereupon it became and was necessary that the company should comply with the terms of certain rules duly issued and published by the committee, and which rules were and are as follows:—

"127. The committee will appoint a special settling day for transactions in the shares of a new company, provided that no allegation of fraud be substantiated; that there has been no misrepresentation or suppression of material facts; that sufficient scrip or shares are ready for delivery; and that no impediment exists to the settlement of the account. 128. The secretary to the share and loan department shall give one week's notice to the Stock Exchange of any application for a special settling day for transactions in the shares of a new company previous to such application being submitted to the committee, and shall require the production of the following documents, viz, the prospectus, the Act of Parliament, the articles of association, or a certificate that the company is constituted upon the oost book system, under the Stannary Laws; the original applications for shares, together with the allotment book signed by the chairman and secretary to the company, and a certificate signed in like manner, stating the number of shares applied for and unconditionally allotted, and the amount of deposits paid thereon; the banker's pass book and a certificate from the bankers, stating the amount of deposits received." And that Aspinall, Whyte, G. P. Knockner, Muir, C. Knockner, and Fry, knowing the premises, and contriving and intending to cheat and defraud had, on the 8rd of Feb. 1874, unlawfully conspired, combined, confederated, and agreed together, and with divers other persons to the jurors unknown, by divers false pretences, &c., to injure, deceive, prejudice, and defraud S. De Zoete, T. Fenn, and others, then being members of the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange, and to induce them, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the rule hereinbefore recited, to appoint a special settling day on the Stock Exchange for transactions in the shares of the company. And that Aspinall, Whyte, G. P. Knockner, Muir, C. Knockner, and Fry, in pursuance of the unlawful conspiracy, &c., unlawfully and knowingly did falsely pretend to S. H. De Zoete, T. Fenn, and others, then being members of the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange, that the number of shares of the company applied for by the public was then 34,365, that the number of shares of the company allotted unconditionally was then 34,365, and that the amount received by the company thereon was, on application, 10*s.* per share, amounting to the sum of 17,182*l.* 10*s.*, that 15,000 of the shares of the company had then been allotted to the patentee, and that no shares of the company had been conditionally allotted; whereas in truth and in fact, the number of shares of the company applied for by the public was not then 34,365, nor any number, and whereas the number of shares allotted unconditionally was not then 34,365; but the greater part of the shares had been allotted to the applicants for the same upon the condition that they, the applicants, should not be called upon to pay for the same, and whereas the amount received by the company upon the application for the shares was not 17,182*l.* 10*s.*, nor was any amount whatever received by the company from applicants for shares, and whereas 15,000 fully paid-up shares of the company had not been taken by the patentee, &c.

REG. v. ASPINALL AND OTHERS.

[Ct. of App.]

Second count.—That at the time of committing the offence hereinafter mentioned, Aspinall and Whyte were directors and G. P. Knoocker secretary of the Enpion Fuel and Gas Company (Limited), and Fry, Muir, and C. Knoocker were persons aiding and assisting in the establishment of the company, and application had been made on behalf of the company to the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange to order the quotation of the new company in the official list of the Stock Exchange, under and in pursuance of a rule duly issued and published by the committee as follows:—“129. The committee will order the quotation of a new company in the official list, provided that the company is of bona fide character and of sufficient magnitude and importance; that the requirements of rule 128 have been complied with, and that the prospectus has been publicly advertised, and agrees substantially with the Act of Parliament or the articles of association, and, in the case of limited companies, contains the memorandum of association; that it provides for the issue of not less than one half of the nominal capital, and for the payment of ten per cent. upon the amount subscribed; and sets forth the arrangements for raising the capital, whether by shares fully or partly paid up, with the amounts of each respectively, and also states the amount paid or to be paid in money or otherwise to concessionaires, owners of property, or others, on the formation of the company, or to contractors for works to be executed, and the number of shares, if any, proposed to be conditionally allotted; that two-thirds of the whole nominal capital proposed to be issued (shares reserved or granted in lieu of money payments to concessionaires, owners of property, or others, not being counted in such two-thirds), have been applied for and unconditionally allotted to the public; that the articles of association restrain the directors from employing the funds of the company in the purchase of its own shares, and that a member of the Stock Exchange is authorised by the company to give full information as to the formation of the undertaking, and able to satisfy the committee as to all particulars they may require. In cases where fully paid-up shares have been granted in lieu of money payments, an official certificate will be required that the contract providing for the issue of such shares has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, as prescribed by the 25th section of the Companies Amendment Act, 1867.” Averment: That the defendants had applied to and requested one Sir R. W. Carden and others, a firm of stockbrokers and members of the Stock Exchange, and authorized them to give the information hereinbefore mentioned, and to apply to the committee to order the quotation of the shares of the company in the official list of the Stock Exchange, and S. P. Knoocker had employed them to sell 5000 shares of the company on behalf of certain alleged vendors of patents, and they had bargained for the sale of 300 of the shares. And that Aspinall, Whyte, G. P. Knoocker, Muir, C. Knoocker, and Fry did, on the 3rd Feb. 1874, unlawfully conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, and with divers other persons whose names were to the jurors unknown, by divers false pretences, and artful and subtle means, devices, and stratagems, to injure and deceive the said members of the committee, and to induce them, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the rules in this count and in the first count of the indictment mentioned, to order a quotation of the shares of the company in the official list of the Stock Exchange, and thereby to induce and persuade divers of the liege subjects of our lady the Queen, who should thereafter buy and sell the shares of the company, to believe that the company was duly formed and constituted, and had in all respects complied with the rules and regulations of the said undertaking, in the first count of this indictment described and mentioned, to wit, the said Stock Exchange, so as to entitle the company to have their shares quoted in the official list of the said Stock Exchange. And that Aspinall, Whyte, C. P. Knoocker, Muir, C. Knoocker, and Fry, and the other persons, &c., in pursuance of the unlawful conspiracy, combination, confederacy, and agreement, unlawfully and knowingly did falsely pretend to De Zoete, Fenn, and others, members of the committee, &c., that the number of shares of the company applied for by the public was then 34,365, and that the amount received by the company thereon was on application 10s. per share, amounting to the sum of 17,182l. 10s., that 15,000 of the shares had been allotted to the patentees; that no shares had been conditionally allotted; and did thereby induce the committee for general purposes of the Stock Exchange to order the shares to be quoted in the official list of the Stock Exchange on and after the 28th May 1874.

The record having been formally made up, the defendants, Aspinall and C. Knoocker, assigned as error:

1. That neither the first nor the second count of the indictment discloses any criminal offence.

2. That the first count charges merely a conspiracy to deceive and defraud the committee of the Stock Exchange, and to induce them to appoint a settling day, and does not go on to aver an intent to defraud them or anyone of goods, money, or otherwise, or that any fraud was intended to result or would probably result from such appointment.

3. That the second count charges only a conspiracy to injure and deceive the committee, and to induce them to order a quotation of the shares of the company, and thereby induce persons who should thereafter buy and sell such shares to believe that the company was duly formed and had complied with the rules of the Stock Exchange, so as to be entitled to have the shares quoted. That it contains no averment that it was to defraud the committee of money, goods, chattels, or otherwise, or that it was intended thus to defraud such prospective buyers or sellers, or that any fraud would probably result therefrom.

4. That fraudulently and deceitfully to induce the committee to appoint a settling day or to order a quotation of shares is not necessarily unlawful by an averment that criminal fraud was intended or would probably result therefrom.

5. That to render a conspiracy indictable, either the means used or the object of the conspiracy must be unlawful, that neither of the counts shows either the means or the object to be criminally unlawful.

6. That it is quite consistent with the averment in both the counts that the company was good financially, and that the defendants Aspinall, Whyte, Muir, and Knoocker, only induced by irregular, but not by criminal or unlawful, means the committee to appoint a settling day and to order a quotation of shares, without intending ultimate fraud being a necessary or a probable result; and that an inference of such fraud ought not to be drawn, especially as it is negatived by the fact that the said defendants were acquitted and found not guilty upon the last count, which avers an intent thus to defraud the public of money.

7. That the only objects of the conspiracy averred in the first and second counts are to induce the committee to appoint a settling day and to order a quotation of shares, and to induce probable buyers and sellers to believe that the rules of the Stock Exchange had been complied with, and that the quotation of shares was properly made; but no inference of an intended fraud upon the public ought to be drawn therefrom, because it is too remote, and because the jury negatived all the suggestions of intended fraud made in the other counts by finding the said defendants not guilty thereon.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Metcalfe, Q.C., for the defendant Aspinall.—The first count of the indictment is clearly bad, as it only avers that the defendants conspired together to tell lies in order to induce the committee to give them a settling day in violation of their rules. It does not aver a conspiracy to cheat anyone out of anything, or to do any appreciable injury to anyone. At law nothing can be inferred in criminal cases against the accused, which is not plainly averred in the indictment. A statute is required to make a conspiracy to cheat generally an indictable offence. That is an argument that a general allegation of an intention to defraud would not be good unless by statute. The second count is also bad. The words "quotation of the shares of the new company in the official list" have no legal meaning, and the count does not explain them in common language. A dealing with the shares is averred only in the case of Knocker, who was found not guilty. The court will therefore infer that a similar averment could not be made against the other defendants. The court below held the second count sufficient upon the allegation "to induce divers of the liege subjects, &c., who should thereafter buy," &c. It is not alleged that the defendants induced the public to buy upon a false belief. It is consistent with the allegations in the count that persons might buy the shares, and having bought be deceived into believing that the regulations of the Stock Exchange had been complied with. There is no allegation of anyone being in fact deceived; no averment that the shares would be worth any more by being quoted in the official list. Reg. v. De Berenger (3 Mau. & Sel. 67) is distinguishable from this case; there the indictment was for conspiracy to raise the public funds on a particular day, and thereby injure all the liege subjects who should buy on that day. Blackburn, J., in the court below, decided on the authority of that case. A conspiracy becomes indictable in two cases only: first, when the means used are unlawful in the sense that those using them could be made civilly or criminally responsible; secondly, when the end to be obtained is unlawful. Thus the mere telling of lies is not indictable, but if those lies are told to lead up to the accomplishment of a criminal end, the conspiracy is complete. Reg. v. Dixon (3 M. & S. p. 11) was the case of a baker selling bread with alum in it for children, and the natural consequence of the act charged was to injure. It was not necessary in that case to infer a criminal intent. Here you have to infer by ratiocination and syllogism that the object of the defendants' conspiracy was to injure and deceive the persons who might buy the shares. No such inferences can be drawn in criminal cases. The names of the buyers of the shares should have been alleged, as in King v. The Queen (7 Q. B. 795, in error). In Reg. v. Warburton (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 274) Cockburn, C. J. said it had been doubted whether the law of England had not gone too far in extending the offence of conspiracy. In all the above cases there was alleged an intent to defraud; there is no such allegation here. If all the averments relating to the Stock Exchange are omitted from the indictment, and it is taken that the representations were made direct to intended buyers, there is no allegation of injury to those buyers.

C. Bowen for C. Knocker.—The second count does not aver that the belief which the defendants are accused of conspiring to induce in the public is incorrect. This is analogous to an indictment for obtaining by false pretences, where it is not sufficient to allege simply that the defendant falsely pretended without going on to allege that the pretence was in fact false. It is a rule of criminal law that no inferences can be drawn against the accused. Here everything must be assumed against them, which cannot be done even after verdict. The court can only infer after verdict that which it can see must have been proved. He cited and referred to

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard), Poland and Besley with him, for the Crown.—There is no distinction between the indictment the court will make after verdict in a civil and in a criminal case. That is decided in Heymann v. The Queen (ubi sup.), and the principle is affirmed in Reg. v. Goldsmith (L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 74.) See also as to imperfect averments being cured by verdict, Stennel v. Hogg (1 Wm. Saund. 228), and the judgments of Bramwell, B. and Grove, J. The analogies drawn for the defendants between indictments for conspiracy and obtaining money by false pretences do not apply. The latter is an offence under a statute, and the essentials are that the statement must be of an existing fact and false to the knowledge of the party making it; but in conspiracies the guilty concert is the gist of the offence. It is not even necessary to set out specifically the unlawful purpose; the conspirators may not have agreed upon it. The offence is complete when the criminal concert is complete. Here the offence is sufficiently set out in the second count. The ordinary and natural consequence of what the defendants are alleged to have done was to induce people to give more for the shares of the company through a belief that they had been quoted in the official list of the Stock Exchange. It is common knowledge which the court may take notice of that that belief would give a greater value to the shares. Sydeserf's case (11 Q. B. Rep. 245), and Gill's case (2 B. & Ald. 204) show that the conspiracy is the offence and not the overt act done in pursuance of it. In the present case the overt act as laid in the indictment explains the object of the conspiracy, although it is true it is not alleged specifically that no one of the rules of the Stock Exchange was complied with. The second count alleges that the defendants in pursuance of their conspiracy "unlawfully and knowingly did falsely pretend" certain things. This amounts to the same thing as if it had been alleged that in truth and in fact the company was not duly constituted.

Benjamin, Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgments were delivered on Dec. 21st 1876.

BRETT, J.A.—Every pleading, civil or criminal, must contain allegations of the existence of all the facts necessary to support the charge or defence set up by such pleading. An indictment must, therefore, contain an allegation of every fact necessary to constitute the criminal charge preferred by it. As in order to make acts criminal they must always be done with a criminal mind, the existence of that criminality of mind must always be alleged. If, in order to support the charge, it is necessary to show that certain acts have been committed, it is necessary to allege that those acts were in fact committed. If it is necessary to show that those acts, when they were committed, were done with a particular intent, it is necessary to aver that intention. If it is necessary, in order to support the charge, that the existence of a certain fact should be negatived, that negative must be alleged. The first allegation thus mentioned is always contained in the preliminary assertion that the accused did the thing or things complained of "fraudulently," "falsely," "unlawfully," or "feloniously," &c. And that is the whole effect of this preliminary allegation. The necessity and the form of the allegations may be exemplified in an indictment for false pretences or perjury. To support a charge of obtaining money, &c. by false pretences it is necessary to show, and therefore to allege, that the prisoner with a wicked or criminal mind stated something which, if true, would be an existing fact; that he did so with intent to procure the possession of money, &c.; that he knew his statement was, that is to say, that so far as his mind was concerned he intended that his statement should be, false; that by the statement he did so act on the mind of the prosecutor as that he did thereby obtain money, &c.; that the statement was in fact untrue in the sense of being incorrect. And both the last allegations are necessary facts of the charge; for although the accused had a criminal intent and believed that his statement was false, yet if in fact either the prosecutor was not thereby persuaded, or by chance the statement was not incorrect, the charge is not supported, the crime is not committed. And it was for want of the allegation, that the pretences relied on by the prosecutor as the material false ones were, in fact, untrue, that the indictment was held bad in Rea v. Perrot (2 M. & S. 379). So in perjury, it is a necessary allegation that the statement on oath relied upon as the perjury was false in fact, in the sense of being incorrect in fact. Though the accused believed he was swearing a falsehood, and was thereby morally perjured, yet, if by chance his statement were true in fact, he could not be convicted of perjury. There is another rule with regard to pleading which must be enunciated, the rule with regard to the effect to be given to pleadings after verdict. It is thus stated in Heymann v. The Queen (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 102): "Where an averment, which is necessary for the support of the pleading, is imperfectly stated, and the verdict on an issue involving that averment is found, if it appears to the court after verdict that the verdict could not have been found on this issue without proof of this averment, there, after verdict, the defective averment, which might have been bad on demurrer, is cured by the verdict." Upon this it should be observed that the averment spoken of is an averment imperfectly stated, i.e. an averment which is stated but which is imperfectly stated. The rule is not applicable to the case of the total omission of an essential averment. If there be such a total omission, the verdict is no cure. And when it is said that the verdict could not have been found without proof of the averment, the meaning is, that the verdict could not have been found without finding this imperfect averment to have been proved in a sense adverse to the accused. Another rule is, that in considering an indictment on a writ of error, and therefore after verdict, it is not necessary for and is not open to the court to inquire what facts were proved at the trial. The question is, whether, assuming the facts which are accurately alleged in the indictment to have been proved as alleged, and the facts which are imperfectly alleged to have been proved in a sense adverse to the accused, the charge would be supported. If it would, the indictment on error after verdict is sufficient. But, if, assuming both the above mentioned allegations of facts, the perfect and imperfect allegations to be proved respectively as before stated, the charge would not be supported for want of the existence of some other allegation, affirmative or negative, which has been totally omitted, then the indictment is bad notwithstanding the verdict. The verdict is only to be taken as conclusive evidence that the facts alleged in the indictment accurately and inaccurately were proved in a sense adverse to the accused. If those facts, so proved, would not support the charge, the indictment is bad on a writ of error. In order to apply these rules to the present case, it is necessary next to determine what are the essential facts to be alleged in order to support a charge of conspiracy. Now, first, the crime of conspiracy is completely committed, if it is committed at all, the moment two or more have agreed that they will do, at once or at some future time, certain things. It is not necessary, in order to complete the offence, that any one thing should be done beyond the agreement. The conspirators may repent and stop, or may have no opportunity, or may be prevented, or may fail. Nevertheless the crime is complete; it was completed when they agreed. It is not, of course, every agreement which is a criminal conspiracy. It is difficult, perhaps, to enunciate an exhaustive or a complete definition; but agreements may be described which are undoubtedly criminal. An agreement to accomplish an end forbidden by law, though by means which would be harmless if used to accomplish an unforbidden end, is a criminal conspiracy. An agreement to accomplish, by means which are, if done by themselves, forbidden by law, an end which is harmless if accomplished by unforbidden means, is a criminal conspiracy. An agreement made with a fraudulent or wicked mind to do that which, if done, would give to the prosecutor a right of suit founded on fraud, or on violence exercised on or towards him, is a criminal conspiracy: see Reg. v. Warburton (L. Rep. 1 C. C. 274). There may be, and probably are, others. If the second count in this indictment contains averments sufficiently stated which are enough to show sufficiently that the defendants unlawfully, i.e. with minds intending to do wrong, agreed, by false pretences, to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company, it sufficiently alleges a criminal conspiracy within the last rule above enunciated; for, if any person were cheated, by false pretences, into purchasing a commodity which, but for such falsehood, he would not have purchased, it is undoubted that he could maintain some suit for relief or remedy founded on the falsehood and fraud thus perpetrated on him. This is the case of Reg. v. De Berenger (3 M. & S. 67). It was there held that it was a criminal conspiracy to agree to endeavour to raise the price of the public funds on a particular day by false rumours. This was not because it is an injury to the public to raise the value of the public funds; but because it is fraudulent against those who purchase a vendible commodity to raise the price of it, at the time they purchase it, by fraudulent falsehoods on which they are intended to act. The conspiracy was held to be criminal, not because the article to be dealt in was the public funds, but because the public funds were a vendible commodity. And it was held that the offence was complete the moment the agreement was made, and that it was unnecessary to specify the persons who became purchasers. It may be well to notice, too, that the judges did not shrink from acting judicially on the knowledge that the public funds were a vendible commodity. The question therefore is, whether there are, in the second count of this indictment, allegations, some accurately and some inaccurately stated, which, assuming them to be proved in a sense adverse to the defendants, show that there was an agreement to cheat and defraud, by means of false pretences, those who might buy shares in the company named. The wicked mind or intention of the defendants is alleged in the usual form, namely that they "unlawfully agreed." There is an allegation that they agreed to use "false pretences." It was urged that this was too general and therefore unjust. The same argument was used and overruled in Res v. Gill (2 B. & Ald. 204); Reg. v. Gomperts (9 Q. B. 824), and in Sydsorff v. The Queen (11 Q. B. 245). There is an allegation that the defendants agreed by false pretences "to deceive the members of the committee of the Stock Exchange, and to induce them, 'contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said rules hereinbefore in this count and in the first count mentioned,' to order a quotation of the shares of the company in the official list of the Stock Exchange." Much minute criticism was exercised on this allegation; but it seems certainly capable, if found to be proved in a sense adverse to the defendants, of bearing this construction, "that the defendants agreed to make such false pretences as might appear necessary to deceive the committee, when the time for them to order should come, into ordering a quotation as if the rules authorising such a quotation had been fulfilled, although in fact the rules should not have been fulfilled. You do not deceive a person into doing a thing contrary to rules if the rules have been fulfilled. It was said that it was unfair and unjust not to point out to the defendants which of the rules, or what part of the rules, it was suggested they intended should not be observed. This is the argument which was urged in Gill's case and the others against the general allegation that the defendants agreed to use "false pretences." The answer to such an objection is, that the agreement in those cases may not have determined what the pretences should be, or in this case which rule or which part of a rule should not be observed. The agreement may have been to deceive the committee, by any falsehood which would do so, into believing that whatever part of the rules should turn out to be in fact incapable of being fulfilled had been fulfilled. As for instance, if two-thirds of the whole nominal capital proposed to be issued should not in fact, when the time for procuring the order for quotation should arrive, have been applied for and unconditionally allotted to the public, to deceive the committee by false pretences into believing that they had been, and so that rule 128 had been complied with. The next allegation is, "and thereby to induce and persuade divers of the Hegge subjects who should thereafter buy and sell the shares of the said company to believe that the said company was duly formed and constituted, and had in all respects complied with the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange, so as to entitle the said company to have their shares quoted in the official list of the said Stock Exchange." Take this to be proved in a sense adverse to the defendants, and it is certainly capable of this construction, that the defendants agreed to deceive the committee into granting a quotation as if the rules authorising a quotation had been complied with, although such rules should not have been complied with, in particulars which, if the committee had not been deceived, would have prevented them from ordering the quotation, and that the agreement of the defendants further was, that they would thereby, if they could, induce purchasers of shares to believe that the rules had been complied with, although they should not have been in essential particulars. It is not sensible to suppose that they agreed, by deceiving the committee, to induce purchasers to believe that the rules had been fulfilled only when the rules had in fact been fulfilled. In such case there could be no need to deceive or use false pretences. It was objected that the court could not take judicial notice that a non-compliance with the rules set out in the count would, if known, depreciate the price of shares. That is like suggesting that the judges in Res v. Berenger ought not to have taken judicial notice that the public funds were vendible commodities. But judges are entitled and bound to take judicial notice of that which is the common knowledge of the great majority of mankind, or of the great majority of men of business. They are therefore, in these days, bound to take notice that shares in limited companies are a vendible commodity, and that a purchaser of ordinary intelligence would prefer to purchase shares in a limited company which had fulfilled the requirements of rule 128, rather than in the same company when it had not fulfilled those requirements. They must, if that be true, also take notice that a quotation of a company by persons entrusted to examine whether such requirements had been fulfilled, and further entrusted not to allow such a quotation unless those requirements have been fulfilled, must have some effect on the mind of an ordinary purchaser of shares as to whether he would or would not purchase, or as to the price he would give. And therefore, the court may or must take judicial notice that the agreement imputed in the count to the defendants is an agreement to deceive the committee, and thereby, that is to say, by such deceit, to induce and persuade a purchaser to believe, at the moment he is making up his mind to purchase, in the existence of circumstances which do not in fact exist, the existence or non-existence of which must affect his decision if he be of ordinary intelligence. It is not stated that this agreement was made with intent to cheat and defraud. The statement, therefore, may be said to be imperfect. But to come to such an agreement with an evil mind is to agree to cheat and defraud, and the finding by a jury in a sense adverse to the accused that such an agreement to induce such a belief was come to, is to find that the agreement was come to with a wicked mind, that is to say, with an intent to cheat and defraud. If that be so, the count is, as has been said, sufficient on error after verdict. The case of King v. The Queen (7 Q. B. 782) was strongly relied on by the defendants; but it does not seem to us to be applicable. The defect on which the Court of Exchequer Chamber acted in that case was, that the indictment charged a conspiracy to cheat and defraud "certain liege subjects being tradesmen." It was held that such an allegation in such form in pleading meant "certain definite tradesmen alleged to be known to the defendants at the time of the criminal agreement," and therefore that such definite tradesmen ought, in describing the conspiracy, to be named or an excuse be averred for not naming them. If the second count in the present case had not averred that the persons intended to be induced to believe, &c. were those "who should thereafter buy and sell shares," the case would have been applicable, but as this indictment has such an allegation the case is not applicable. If in that case there had been added after the words "being tradesmen" the phrase, "who should thereafter deal with the defendants," the indictment in that case would have been sufficient according to Reg. v. Gill, Reg. v. Gompertz, and Sydeserff v. The Queen. We are of opinion, therefore, that the second count in this case is sufficient after verdict. We give no opinion whatever as to the first count. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench must be affirmed.

REG. v. ASPINALL AND OTHERS.

AMPHLETT, J.A.—The only question which we considered necessary to have fully argued before us was the sufficiency of the second count of the indictment to support the conviction of the plaintiffs in error (thereinafter called the defendants) of a criminal conspiracy. This count begins by stating that the defendants were directors or persons aiding in the establishment of the Eupion Fuel and Gas Company (Limited), and that application had been made to the committee for general purposes of the London Stock Exchange to order the quotation of the shares of the said new company in the official list of the said Stock Exchange under a certain rule No. 129, duly issued and published, by which the committee were to order the quotation of a new company in the official list, provided that the company was of a bonâ fide character and of sufficient magnitude and importance, and that the requirements of rule 128 set out in the first count, and the further requirements of the said rule 129, were complied with. Those requirements were evidently calculated and intended to insure as far as possible the respectability and solvency of any new company before it was allowed to be quoted in the official list; and amongst others there were the following important requirements, viz., that in case of limited companies the memorandum of association provided for the issue of not less than one half of the nominal capital, and for the payment of 10 per cent. upon the amount subscribed, and that two-thirds of the whole amount of the capital proposed to be issued, with certain exceptions not necessary to be here stated, should have been applied for and unconditionally allotted to the public. Now, as the rules of a public body of such celebrity as the London Stock Exchange must be widely known to brokers and others dealing with shares, it is plain that to obtain a quotation of their shares in the official list must be advantageous to companies and enhance the value of their shares. Purchasers, on seeing the shares so quoted, would have a right to believe that the requirements of the Stock Exchange had been complied with, and that the company had therefore satisfied an independent body like the committee of its respectability and solvency, and it cannot be doubted that they would be willing to give a higher price for the shares in consequence. This being so, I think it is established by the case of Rees v. De Berenger (3 M. & S. 67), that a conspiracy to procure by fraud and falsehood the shares of a company to be quoted in the official list, and thus give a fictitious value to the shares beyond what they would otherwise bring in the market, is a fraud upon the public and an indictable offence. This, in fact, was not denied on the part of the defendants; but it was contended that the averment of the conspiracy in the second count was not sufficient, even after verdict, to sustain the charge. That averment, omitting for the moment the overt acts subsequently charged, was as follows—[read the count.] In the first place, it was objected that there is no allegation of any design to injure and deceive purchasers, but only the members of the committee of the Stock Exchange; that omission, however, appears to me immaterial if the natural and probable effect of deceiving the committee in the mode alleged would be to injure and deceive purchasers. It was further objected that there is no allegation of any design to give a fictitious value to the shares, and that it ought not to be inferred in a criminal case; but here again I think that, if the design alleged was to induce purchasers to believe that the position and prospects of the company were better than they really were, the further design of inducing such purchasers to give a higher price for the shares, being the natural and probable consequence, ought to be inferred: (see Rees v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. p. 15.) But then it was argued with great force by Mr. Bowen that there is no allegation that what the purchasers were to be induced to believe was, in any respect that could affect the price of the shares, untrue, in which case it must be admitted that there could be no fraud upon the purchasers. Now the facts which the purchasers were to be induced to believe are as follows: first, that the said company was duly formed and constituted, which certainly is not negatived; and secondly, that they had in all respects complied with the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange, so as to entitle the company to have their shares quoted in the official list, and this is not in any way negatived, except by the allegation that the design was by false pretences to induce the committee, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said rules in the second count and in the first count mentioned, to order the quotation; and looking at those rules, it will appear that some of them relate merely to the convenient transaction of business by the committee of the Stock Exchange, and whether complied with or not, could have no effect upon the value of the shares in the market. It would therefore, it was urged, be consistent with all the allegations of the conspiracy that the only rules which the purchasers were to be induced to believe, contrary to the fact, had been complied with, were such as could not by possibility affect, in the mind of the purchasers, the value of the shares. This appears to me a serious objection; and I have considerable doubt, whether it is cured by the overt acts alleged in the subsequent part of the count; for, in the first place, it was held in the case of Rees v. Perrott (ubi sup.) that an indictment for obtaining money under false pretences must negative by special averment the truth of the pretences, and that it is not enough, even after verdict, to charge that the defendant falsely pretended a number of different facts; and I think that the reasoning of the judges in that case applies as much to an indictment for conspiracy as to an indictment for false pretences, where, as in this case, the unlawfulness of the end depends upon the nature of the false pretences employed to attain it, and where, therefore, the ordinary rule, that the false pretences need not be specially alleged in an indictment for conspiracy, does not, in my opinion, apply. And in the next place, the false pretences alleged are not necessarily inconsistent with full compliance with the rules; since, for instance, it may have been falsely asserted, as is alleged, that the number of shares allotted unconditionally was 34,365, and that 10 per cent. had been paid thereon, and that no shares had been conditionally allotted, yet it may be true, for anything that appears, that two-thirds of the whole amount of the nominal capital had been applied for and allotted unconditionally, and 10 per cent. paid thereon, which was all that the rules required. Under these circumstances I am by no means sure that this defect would not have been fatal to the count on demurrer or a motion to quash it; but it appears to me to be one of those defects which, according to the rule laid down in Serjeant Williams' notes to Saunders (vol. 1, p. 261) and acted upon in the two cases cited by the Solicitor-General, Heymann v. The Queen and Rees v. Goldsmith (ubi sup.) is cured by verdict. No injustice can be done to the defendants by acting upon this rule, because it must be assumed that the judge properly directed the jury as to what false pretences must be proved to justify a conviction. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the count is sufficient to sustain the conviction, and that the error assigned cannot be allowed. Having arrived at this conclusion, it is not necessary for me to express, and I abstain from expressing, any opinion upon the validity of the first count.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by E. S. ROGER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Feb. 14, 1877.

SYERS v. METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

Compulsory powers—Notice to treat—Right of tenant to compensation—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, s. 18.

Defendants had, under the powers of the Metropolitan Streets Improvement Act 1872, purchased a house of the owner, pending the plaintiff's tenancy, and had given the plaintiff, who was a quarterly tenant, notice to quit at the expiration of his tenancy.

On motion for an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering upon the premises until they had given the plaintiff the notice to treat required by sect. 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and should have paid him, or deposited in the bank, the compensation awarded to be paid under the Act, for his interest in the premises,

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the plaintiff, as a quarterly tenant, had no interest, legal or equitable, in the premises within the meaning of sect. 18 of the Lands Clauses Act.

The Board, in giving the notice to quit, were merely exercising their right as reversioners under their purchase from the freeholder.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Master of the Rolls. The plaintiff was quarterly tenant of No. 56, Turnmill-street, Clerkenwell. The house being required for the purposes of the Metropolitan Streets Improvement Act 1872, the Metropolitan Board of Works in Dec. 1875. purchased it of the freeholder, under the compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Having thus become owners of the premises, the defendants served the plaintiff with a notice to quit in June 1876, or at the expiration of his tenancy, on the ground that the house was required to be pulled down. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action with the object of having the defendants restrained from pulling down the house until they should have compensated him for his alleged interest therein. In the court below the plaintiff moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering upon the premises until they had given him the notice required by sect. 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and should have either paid to the plaintiff, or deposited in the bank, as in the Act provided, the purchase money or compensation agreed or awarded to be paid under the said Act for the interest of the plaintiff in the premises.

Jessel, M.R., said:—Speaking roughly, I understand the Act to mean this,—you shall not take possession of any man's land, whatever his legal interest may be in it, until you have paid or secured to him the amount eventually payable to him as compensation simply, or as purchase money and compensation for taking away the land—you shall not enter upon it nor interfere with his possession. And, again, you are not entitled to take a partial interest in the land to the prejudice of the owner of the rest of the land. He may compel you to say if you buy one you shall buy up all. Therefore, I consider that you have to decide, first, whether the man is entitled to any compensation at all. If he is not, there is no reason to prevent the company from taking possession of the land. If he has neither the legal estate nor an equitable interest, he cannot, as I read the Act, be entitled to any compensation at all. The position of the tenant in this case is a very simple one. He was tenant from three months to three months. Notice was given to the landlord; the three months tenancy of the tenant was not disputed; the purchase of the land was completed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, who gave the notice; then the notice to determine the tenancy was given by the then legal owners, and the tenancy expired by virtue of the notice. Therefore, the person who comes before me and complains has certainly no legal interest in the property in question. His legal interest, or whatever it was, has legally expired. Has he any equitable interest as distinguished from a legal interest? I cannot find out why he should have. The whole of the equitable interest which is in the landlord subject to his term has been bought and paid for by the Metropolitan Board of Works. Therefore, they have purchased up the whole equitable interest, and are entitled to possession. It was indeed suggested by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff that there is a duty binding upon the landlord to renew the lease or the tenancy if his tenant demands it. I have heard that such a notion prevailed in times past, but not in this country. In the country where such notions have prevailed they have not been sought to be enforced by the terror of the judiciary, but by other and more unpleasant means. But, as I said before, I never knew that there was such an idea in this country, and I repudiate the assertion that a man ceases to be an honest man as a landlord even if he refuses in the extreme case which was put, to renew a lease to his tenant, although that tenant, and his ancestors before him, had held the property in question for sixty years under a term, at the expiration of that term. That being so, I consider there was no legal nor equitable interest in the person in question. Then it is alleged, even assuming that he has neither a legal nor an equitable interest, yet he has acquired something by force of this Act of Parliament. The Act was intended to protect the persons whom I roughly call the landowners and occupiers who are already interested in this land, from being deprived compulsorily against their will of their ownership or possession. This man has not been deprived of either. Therefore, why should the Act of Parliament apply to him? It seems to me, from the reason of the thing, that he is not entitled to any compensation at all. But I must go to the words of the Act, because I am told they compel me to say that, on the reason of the thing, and the general purview of the Act, the result at which I ought to arrive could not be arrived at. The Act begins by a series of sections which are headed in this way: "And with respect to the purchase and taking of the lands otherwise than by agreement,"—"compulsory powers." It is very important to recollect that in this Act there are these headings. Now those are general provisions as to the purchase of lands. They begin with clause 16. After divers other headings we then come to a new heading "leases," which begins with the 119th section. This is an entirely new heading. The first question I have to consider is, whether the heading as to leases was intended to provide altogether for compensation in the cases specially provided for, because it is not every lease, but only certain leases, which are provided for. It does appear to me that the sections from 119 to 122 were intended to be specific provisions for those special cases, and to decide what is to be done in those cases, and to decide it once for all. Now the 119th section applies to a different case altogether, namely, to a case where only part of the land is required. The 121st section does apply to this case. It says, "If any such land shall be in the possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as tenant for a year, or from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein, he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands, and for any just allowance which ought to be made to him by an incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury he may sustain; or if a part only of such lands be required, compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy by severing the lands held by him, or otherwise injuriously affecting the same, and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by two justices, in case the parties differ about the same; and upon payment or tender of the amount of such compensation, all such persons shall respectively deliver up to the promoters of the undertaking, or to the person appointed by them to take possession thereof, any such lands in their possession required for the purposes of this special Act." Now, as I read the section, there is nothing to control it at all. All that is required on the part of the company, or public body, exercising the powers of the special Act, is to give to those persons having a less interest than that of tenant from year to year, notice demanding possession (it does not require them to give any notice to take) to go before justices, to get the amount assessed, and then to pay that amount. That being done, they are entitled to possession. They do not require any conveyance. They take possession, and I think they are then entitled to it, and that none of the other sections prohibiting companies, corporations, or other bodies to which this Act applies, from taking possession of land, control or overrule this section, which says that, upon payment being made, the tenant in question shall deliver up possession to the company. Well, if that is so—if these are put in a separate class, and it is provided that they are not to go out merely on a notice to treat, they are not to have their interest taken away under a notice to treat, but they may have it taken away under a demand of possession, and nothing more. Why should this tenant be entitled to a larger interest than anybody else of the same class? I cannot see it at all. I cannot see why, if the company does not require possession before the expiration of the interest, that that throws you back on the other clause, because, in the case I have put, his unexpired interest is nil, and, therefore, his compensation is nil. Why should he not deliver up possession for nothing, if he were there? It appears to me from the moment he is served with the notice, he is to be paid for his unexpired interest, and then to deliver up possession. But when that interest has expired, he is to have no compensation. As I read the Act, it is entirely consistent with the view I have taken of the general nature of these provisions; and, reading it as I do, I am of opinion that this application must fail. Costs to be costs in the cause.

SYMES v. METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

On the appeal,

C. H. Anderson contended that the plaintiff had a legal right to compensation, as a party interested in the premises, within the meaning of sect. 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, at the time when the notice to treat was served on the owner, and that the defendants ought also to have served the plaintiff with a notice to treat under that section, and could not now take possession without giving him compensation. The words of the section were, "You are bound to give notice to treat to all the parties interested in the lands,"

[CT. OF APP.]

RODERICK v. ASTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

[CT. OF APP.]

and if all the parties interested were to have notice, why should not a yearly tenant? [JAMES, L.J.—They cannot disturb the parties under the Act without giving them notice, but you are not within the Act at all. The defendants have merely, as owners of the fee simple, given the tenant notice to quit.] As the defendants were acquiring the interest of the plaintiff in the house, they ought to pay him compensation for a year's value of the tenancy before they took possession.

Cookson, Q.C. and Everitt, for the defendants, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that there is not the slightest foundation for this application. The truth is, it is contrary to the universal practice that has prevailed ever since railways have been established with statutory powers. Railway companies and other companies never do buy the interest of short tenants whom they can get rid of by legal notice, unless they want possession before the expiration of the notice, for which special provision is made by the Act of Parliament. The company deals with the freeholder. It acquires, either under compulsory powers or by contract with the freeholder (it may be by voluntary agreement) his interest, and with that the whole of his interest. Part of that interest is the right to determine the tenant's right by giving three months' notice. They have bought the freehold; they are assignees of the freehold; they do give the tenant three months' notice, as any other assignee of the reversion might do; and at the end of the three months the tenant must give up possession or be subject to be turned out by process of law—not under any statutory power, but under the right which is incidental to the property of the company. The Master of the Rolls could not have made any other order than the one he has made, and we must refuse this appeal with costs.

BRAMWELL, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants are not exercising any statutory powers here at all, nor threatening to exercise any. They are claiming to exercise that right which they have as reversioners at common law. Then there is another conclusive argument against the plaintiff. They are not bound to give notice at any particular time. They need not, therefore, have given notice until the three months had expired and the tenancy had expired; and what on earth were they then to ask the man to treat about? He had no interest remaining. It is rather strange to me that this experiment should have been tried in one court; that it should have come to a second court is something wonderful.

APPLETT, J.A.—I am of the same opinion.

RODERICK v. ASTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Sewer—Powers of local authority—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 16, 19, 32, 144, 150, 303.

An urban or rural sanitary authority has power by the Public Health Act 1875, to make a sewer in private property, even though the sewer may be raised above the level of the ground, and may necessitate an embankment of considerable height being built over it. In such case, ample compensation is provided by the Act.

According to the true construction of the words "into, through, or under" in sect. 16, it is not necessary to carry the sewer under ground, but it may be carried "on or over" any lands within the district of the local authorities.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported ante 485).

The question for the consideration of the court was whether under sect. 16 of the Public Health Act of 1875, the defendants had power "to carry any sewer, after giving reasonable notice in writing to the owner or occupier (if on the report of the surveyor it appears necessary), into, through, or under any land whatsoever within their district," without actually buying the land. In an action brought to restrain the defendants from doing what they proposed, the Master of the Rolls refused to grant an injunction.

On the appeal,

Chitty, Q.C. and Alexander Glen, for the appellants, contended that the word "through," in sect. 16 of the Act only authorised the defendants to construct their sewer under ground, unless they chose to purchase the land which the Act gave them power to do. If the defendants constructed the sewer as proposed without purchasing the land, the plaintiffs would sustain an injury for which the compensation clauses would supply a wholly inadequate remedy. They referred to

Public Health Act 1875, ss. 16, 19, 32, 144, 150, 303; Metropolitan Board of Works v. Metropolitan Railway Company, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 192;

Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Company, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542; 36 L. J. 204, Q. B.

Davey, Q.C. and Woodroffe, for the defendants, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—I think we must affirm the decision of the Master of the Rolls. It is said there may be some great injustice done. I do not know about that. I think the compensation clause, so far as pecuniary damage or any damage is concerned, will be sufficient to cover any compensation which may be required, and there does seem a very ample case for compensation. It may be said that it is very hard that a piece of a man's land shall be taken away without his consent or without the defendants buying it. On the other hand, I can easily see that if these local authorities were obliged to buy every bit of every house or property that they wanted, it might have the effect of making it impossible to make any arrangements for what is called the sanitation of the district. Those considerations may tell one against the other. All we have to consider is what is the plain meaning of the words, and I am of opinion that the plain meaning of the words is that you are at liberty to go "into, through, or under." I cannot find any sufficient reason whatsoever in those words or in the context of the Act of Parliament to show that when the Legislature says you may go "into, through, or under" they mean, in fact, only to say "under," because it must come to that. If the argument of the appellant prevails, it must be that the Legislature says you are to go "into, through, and under," but not "on or over." I think we cannot introduce that exception into this clause.

[CHAN. DIV.]

FLOWER v. LOCAL BOARD OF LOW LEYTON.

[CHAN. DIV.]

BRANWELL, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. I confess I had some misgivings whether it was intended that there should be a power to make a sewer above ground under this Act of Parliament. But I think it is very likely it never was thought of or contemplated, most sewers being subterranean, and therefore it may be that words were used which go further than the actual intention of the persons who drew the Act of Parliament. On the other hand, it may be that if their attention had been called to it, they would have used words sufficient to enable that to be done which is going to be done in this case; but we have not to consider the intention of the Legislature, but the meaning of the words which they have used; and as to that it appears to me nothing more can be said than has been said by the Lord Justice. If we read these words as Mr. Chitty wants us to read them, the word "through" has no meaning at all, and we must read the words with the copulative conjunction "into, through, and under" instead of "into, through, or under."

AMPHLETT, J.A.—I feel very strongly—quite as strongly as Mr. Chitty has expressed himself—that there might be cases of extreme hardship. You might have ornamental grounds going down to a river, and a sewer might be made to cut a man's house off from the river by going over the centre of his garden; or it may be, by going through a part of his house. But I think we cannot vary the plain language of the Legislature by any consideration of such circumstances as these; and perhaps it is a sufficient answer to the hardship to say that if anything was done at all vexatiously, on going to a jury to assess the damages, they would give something very enormous to mark their disapprobation of the way in which the board were carrying out their works. But, however that may be, I find words that I cannot get over, and therefore, whether it was intended by the Legislature or not, there the words are, and we must give effect to them.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

FLOWER v. LOCAL BOARD OF LOW LEYTON.

Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 55) sect. 264—Action against local board—Notice of action—When necessary—Demurrer to statement of defence.

The provision of the Public Health Act 1875, sect. 264, that a process shall not be sued out against a local authority for anything done or omitted under the Act until one month after notice, does not apply where the delay of a month would cause irreparable mischief, and defeat the object of the suit, but if the object of the suit clearly is damages, although an injunction may be asked as subsidiary, such notice is requisite.

DEMURRER to statement of defence.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that he was the lessee and occupier of a farm at Leyton, part of which consisted of a field called Blackbird's Field. The defendants were the local authority in whom all the sewers in the district were vested, and under whose control they were placed by the Public Health Act 1875, and an open ditch, which was one of such sewers, ran along the side of Blackbird's Field for 150 yards, or thereabouts. The plaintiff alleged that sewage matter was allowed to accumulate in the ditch, and overflow part of Blackbird's Field, to the damage of the plaintiff. That the sewage and water had for more than two years past occasionally overflowed the ditch, and that the plaintiff had on several occasions complained thereof, but that until the last nine or ten months the overflow was comparatively insignificant, and the damage caused thereby not of the serious character which it had within that time assumed. That after several previous complaints to the defendants, and promises by them that the nuisance should be abated, the plaintiff, in the month of December 1875, again complained, stating that unless the same was effectually reduced within one month from that time, proceedings in Chancery would be commenced against the defendants. That the defendants wrote, saying that new works were to be executed, which it was hoped would remove all cause of complaint. That, notwithstanding repeated subsequent complaints by the plaintiff, the nuisance still continued, to the great damage of the plaintiff. That the plaintiff had also made frequent applications to the defendants for compensation on account of the damage already caused to him, but that the defendants had neglected and refused to make any such compensation, and had on the 15th June 1876, informed the plaintiff that the defendants' board had resolved to repudiate every claim made by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff claimed: That the amount of damages which had been or should be sustained by him by reason of the overflow of sewage and water from the said ditch might be assessed, and the defendants ordered to pay the amount to the plaintiff, and that the defendants might be restrained from causing or permitting any sewage or water to overflow from the said open ditch on to Blackbird's Field, or any part thereof.

The plaintiff's writ was issued on the 4th July 1876. The defendants delivered their statement of defence on the 14th Nov. 1876, and as a separate and independent ground of defence, said that they were a local authority within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), and that no such notice of action stating the cause of action, and the name and place of abode of the intended plaintiff, and of his attorney or agent in the cause, as prescribed by the 264th section of the said Act, was served on the defendants prior to the issuing of the writ in the action, and on this ground alone the defendants claimed a judgment in their favour, with costs. (a)

(a) 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, sect. 264, provides that: "A writ or process shall not be sued out against or served on any local authority, or any member thereof, or any officer of a local authority, or person acting in his aid, for anything done or intended to be done or omitted to be done under the provisions of this Act, until the ex-

The plaintiff demurred to this defence.

The plaintiff had not moved for an injunction.

J. Pearson, Q.C. and Shebbeare for the demurrer.

—The plaintiff prays both for an injunction and for damages. Where the relief sought is an injunction, to delay which might cause irreparable damage to the plaintiff, the Public Health Act 1875, sec. 264, as to giving a month's notice of the proceedings does not apply: (Attorney-General v. Hackney Local Board, 33 L. T. Rep., N.S. 244; L. Rep. 20 Eq. 626.)

Glaspe, Q.C. and H. A. Giffard for the defendants.

—The plaintiff's real claim is for damages, and nothing else. He does not require the injunction. The 19th section of the Act requires the local authority to keep the ditch properly cleansed and emptied. Poulsom v. Thirst (16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 324; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 449) shows that this is an action requiring the prescribed notice to be given. They cited also Jolliffe v. Wallasey Local Board (29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 582; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 62). [MALINS, V.C.—I think the fair meaning of section 264 is that no writ in an action praying damages only shall be issued without notice. If I come to the conclusion that the substance and object of the action is an injunction, then I think the section does apply, but not if the object is damages.]

Pearson, Q.C. in reply.—The contention is, that because the plaintiff did not apply by motion for an injunction, the statement of defence is not demurrable.

MALINS, V.C.—This is an action in which the plaintiff claims that the amount of damages which have been or shall be sustained by him, by reason of the overflow of sewage and water from an open ditch adjoining the western side of Blackbird's Field may be assessed under the direction of the court, and that the defendants may be ordered to pay the amount thereof to the plaintiff, and that the defendants may be restrained by injunction from causing or permitting any sewage or water to overflow from the side of the open ditch on to Blackbird's Field or any part thereof. The defendants are a local board within the provisions of the Public Health Act of 1875. [His Lordship read section 264.] Now the object of that Act is plain, that these boards should not be liable to be continually vexed with actions. I think it is quite clear that, where damages only are the principal object of a suit, the board is entitled to notice of action under the 264th section, but it is said that this section does not apply where the object is to prevent irreparable mischief being done. Now, when the object of the suit is such that the delay of a month would be to defeat the plaintiff's object, I agree with Vice-Chancellor Bacon in the case of Attorney-General v. Hackney Local Board, that an action may be begun without notice and an injunction moved for the next day. I think it is the duty of the court to look at the nature of the case made, and ascertain whether the object of the action is damages or an injunction. If this had been a case like Attorney-General v. Hackney Local Board, I should have thought that the provision of the Act as to giving notice did not apply, but the primary object of the plaintiff here evidently was damages. [His Lordship referred to the statement of claim.] I look at the statement of claim, and I cannot help seeing from the statement itself that the real claim is for damages, and that the injunction is merely subsidiary. I think also that I am bound to look at the conduct of the parties, and it appears that, although this writ was issued six months ago, the plaintiff never moved for an injunction. My own opinion is, that the defendants might have moved to stay the action, but they did not do so. However, I think the defence is good, and therefore the demurrer fails.

HOLME v. GUY.

Charity—Action of ejectment by governors of charity—Sanction of Charity Commissioners—Charitable Trusts Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 17.

The sanction of the Charity Commissioners is not required under the 17th section of the Charitable Trusts Act 1853, to authorise the governors of a charity to bring an action to recover possession of land or other property belonging to the charity.

THE plaintiffs in this action were the governors of the Asby Endowed Grammar School, in the county of Westmoreland, and they brought this action against the defendant, the former schoolmaster of the said school, claiming an injunction restraining the defendant from presenting himself at the school, or teaching therein, or attempting to do so, or otherwise intermeddling therewith, and also an injunction restraining the defendant from remaining in occupation of the schoolhouse, or the land belonging thereto. By the statement of claim, it was alleged that the defendant had never been properly appointed to the office of schoolmaster, and was unfit for such office; that he had been formerly removed therefrom by a resolution of the governors, of which notice had been given to him; and that he had been required to deliver up possession of the schoolhouse and land, but he had neglected to do so, and continued to present himself at the school to teach, and to occupy the schoolhouse and the land belonging thereto.

The defendant demurred on the ground that an order or certificate from the Charity Commissioners, authorising the action, had not been obtained, as required by the 17th section of the Charitable Trusts Act 1853.

Shebbeare, for the demurrer, argued that this action came within the words in the section "suit or other proceeding."

E. Ouller, for the plaintiff, contended that the section applied only to suits and other proceedings relating to the administration of the property of the charity, and not to such an action as this, which was virtually a common law action of ejectment. He cited

HOLME v. GUY.

[CT. OF APP.]

Re St. Giles's and St George's Bloomsbury Trusts, 25 Beav. 313:

Re Ford's Charity, 3 Drew. 324.

JESSEL, M.R.—I have often had to consider this point in chambers, and I have a very clear opinion on it. The first question is, what is the purview of the Act? I cannot do better than quote what was said by Lord Cranworth in Re Lister's Hospital (sup.). He said, "The object of the Act was to stop the enormous abuses which had grown up in the administration of charities in reference to proceedings which used to be instituted to the good of no one. It would, however, be a very strong thing to say that if there is a matter in which the Court of Chancery ought to act, it cannot act until it is set in motion by the sanction of the Charity Commissioners. The Legislature never intended thus to tie the hands of the court; by any suit or matter actually pending, is meant pending at the time of the application, not pending at the passing of the Act." I also entirely agree with the criticism of Lord Hatherley on that judgment in Braund v. The Earl of Devon (sup.), where he says: "The object, no doubt, of the provision in the statute was, as is stated in Re Lister's Hospital, to put an end to certain very scandalous proceedings on the part of individuals"—these scandalous proceedings were Chancery proceedings—"who, ascertaining that there was a fund disposable for the purpose of charities which had been overlooked, and thinking that a considerable profit might be made in the way of costs, instituted proceedings which were not likely to produce good to any one. But the object with which that particular section was passed cannot, of course, confine its operation, except so far as the terms warrant it, to the particular cases which originated it. Of course, it is impossible to distinguish in any Act of Parliament the motives of those who might afterwards be induced to institute suits respecting charities, and therefore the Legislature thought it right that, in the case of every suit with reference to the administration of charitable funds, there should be an application to the commissioners, a matter of no very great difficulty, not precluding any parties interested in the charities from justice, but, on the contrary, very much facilitating and assisting them, and guiding them in the institution of their suits." And Lord Justice Selwyn, in the same case, says, "The suit is within the very terms of the Act—a suit for obtaining relief concerning or relating to any charity, or the estate, funds, property, or income thereof." Then he goes on to say, "There is no condition precedent in this section that those funds should have been ascertained, or should have been set apart, or any scheme directed for the administration of those funds. The words are general, and we are bound to follow them." There is no other authority on this point to which I think it necessary to refer. The next question is, what is the object of this action? The governors of a charity dismissed a schoolmaster, and he insists on retaining possession of the schoolhouse. The action is what would formerly have been an action of ejectment; it is to obtain possession of a schoolhouse. If the Judicature Act had not been passed, this would have been a mere action at law, demurrable in equity. If the Charitable Trusts Act did not intend to interfere with actions at law, the fact that actions are now brought in any division of the High Court of Justice can make no difference. Now, what are the words of the section, and how ought the court to construe them? Although the court is not at liberty to construe an Act of Parliament by the motives which influenced the Legislature, yet, when the history of law and legislation and prior judgments tell the court what the object of the legislation was, it must read the section with a view of finding out whether it fairly carries out that object, and not with a view of extending it to something that was not intended. Now, reading the 17th section in that way, I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, it was not intended to interfere or restrict actions at law. The more it is studied, the more, I think, this appears. It begins: "Before any suit, petition, or other proceeding (not being an application in any suit or matter actually pending) for obtaining any relief, order, or direction concerning or relating to any charity, or the estate, funds, property, or income thereof, shall be commenced, presented, or taken by any person whomsoever." An action at law is certainly a proceeding, but the Legislature would hardly describe an action at law by the words "suit, petition, or other proceeding." Again, the words "commenced, presented, or taken," are applicable to equity procedure, not to an action at law which is "brought." But that is not all. The words "relief, order, or direction," are not applicable to actions at common law, but to equity procedure. "Relief" was sought by a bill, an "order or direction" by a "petition or other proceeding." What you obtained at common law was a "judgment," which is a well-known distinctive term, though it is now applicable to all the actions in the High Court. Further, an action at law could not have related to a charity. It might, in a sense, relate to "the estate, funds, income, or property thereof," because they might happen to belong to a charity, but it does not relate to "the estate, funds, income, or property" of a charity quâ charity. An action for trespass for breaking and entering a close of a charity does in one sense relate to the property of the charity, but it in fact relates to the possession of it, and it would be in a very wide and remote sense that such an action could be said to ask "relief relating to a charity or the estate thereof." I am therefore satisfied, upon the words of the section I have referred to, if there were nothing more, that they cannot be fairly attributed to an action at law. Now come the words, "there shall be transmitted by such person"—that is, the complainant—"to the said board notice in writing of such proposed suit, petition, or proceeding;" again, the word "action" is omitted, and "such statement, information, and particulars as may be requisite or proper, or may be required from time to time by the said board for explaining the nature and objects thereof; and the said board, if upon consideration of the circumstances they so think fit, may, by an order or certificate signed by their secretary, authorise or direct any suit, petition, or other proceeding to be commenced, presented, or taken with respect to the charity." Now that is all they can authorise. The only proceedings which shall be taken are with respect to such charity. Although the former part of the section mentions "the estate, funds, property, or income thereof," when you come to look at the certificate, it is with respect only to the charity, and it is seen that the words "estate, funds, property, or income thereof" are used with reference to administration of the charity property. The section then says: "And every such order or certificate may be in such form, and may contain such statements and particulars, as such board shall think fit; and (save as herein otherwise provided) no suit, petition, or other proceeding for obtaining any such relief, order, or direction as last aforesaid shall be entertained or proceeded with by the Court of Chancery, or by any court or judge, except upon and in conformity with an order or certificate of the said board." Now it is suggested that the words "any court or judge" would include any common law court or judge. But is that the way they would have been described if the superior courts at Westminster were intended to be included? There were courts and judges besides the Court of Chancery, which had equitable jurisdiction, such as the Palatine Courts of Lancaster and Durham, and the County Courts. It is not necessary to import so violent a construction as that "any court or judge" shall mean the superior courts at Westminster. Then the section says: "Provided always that this enactment shall not extend to or affect any such petition or proceeding in which any person shall claim any property, or seek any relief adversely to any charity." But the next section throws more light upon the question, if any more light were wanted. The 18th section says, "Provided always that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty's Attorney-General, acting ex officio, to make such applications, and take and prosecute such proceedings with respect to any charity in the Court of Chancery, or otherwise as to him may seem fit, as if this Act had not passed"—the Attorney-General did not bring an action at law, but filed an information; no doubt he could have filed the information in almost any court as a matter of privilege—"and that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed as dispensing with the fiat or allowance of Her Majesty's Attorney-General with respect to any proceeding, not being an application under the jurisdiction created by this Act, where such fiat or allowance was necessary before the passing of this Act." Whether the Act is looked at historically, as by Lord Cranworth, or historically and judicially, as by Lord Hatherley, it appears to me that the fair meaning of the section is that it is not to interfere with an ordinary action at law, whether of trespass or ejectment, and I should be extending the operation of the statute passed for a totally different purpose, namely, to stop those costly proceedings which submitted the property of charities to equity litigation, if I were to hold it to apply to an ordinary action at law to recover the possession of a schoolhouse. Whether or not it is desirable that a check should be placed upon the proceedings of the governors of charities, even as to such proceedings as these, it is for the Legislature, and not for courts of justice to determine. In my opinion, the consent of the Charity Commissioners is not required for such an action as this, and I therefore overrule the demurrer.

IPSWICH GUARDIANS (apps.) v. GREAT YARMOUTH GUARDIANS (resps.); ASTON GUARDIANS (apps.) v. BIRMINGHAM GUARDIANS (resps.); ST. LEONARDS SHOREDITCH OVERSEERS (apps.) v. BURTON-UPON-TRENT GUARDIANS (resps.)

Poor Law—Settlement—Three years' residence—Completion before the Act—39 & 40 Vict. c. 61.

By sect. 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish upon conditions therein stated, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise.

Held, that a residence upon these conditions, which was completed before the passing of the Act, creates no legal settlement.

THESE appeals from quarter sessions raised the same point, and were heard together:—

IPSWICH v. GREAT YARMOUTH.

This was an appeal against an order of removal, whereby it was adjudged that the last legal settlement of Sarah Ann Elizabeth Goddard, a pauper, was in the parish of Saint Matthew, Ipswich, in the Ipswich Poor Law Union, and ordering the removal of the said Sarah A. E. Goddard to the said Ipswich Union. The appeal came on for hearing at the quarter sessions of the peace held for the borough of Great Yarmouth on the 8th Jan. last, and was dismissed with costs, and the said order of removal was confirmed subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice upon the following case.

On the hearing of the appeal the following facts were proved or admitted:

1. On the 20th Sept. 1857 the said Sarah A. E. Goddard, hereinafter called "the pauper," was born in the parish of Great Yarmouth, where her father was then living.

2. In the year 1867 John Goddard, the father of the pauper, went to reside in Church-lane, in the parish of St. Matthew, Ipswich, in the appellants' union, and resided in the said parish of St. Matthew continuously in such manner and under such circumstances in each of the years of such residence as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, down to Aug. 1873, when he left and went to America, leaving his wife and family (except the pauper, who was then absent, as in the next paragraph mentioned) still living in Church-lane, and he has not since resided in the appellants' union.

3. The pauper resided with her father in Church-lane, from the time he went to reside there till the autumn of 1872, when she was sent to a home near London to be treated for fits. She returned to her mother in Church-lane just after her father sailed for America, and continued to live with her and the other children there till the end of 1873; since which time they have not lived at Ipswich.

4. On the 20th Sept. 1873 the pauper attained the age of 16 years.

5. On the 19th June 1874 the pauper became chargeable to the parish of Great Yarmouth, where she was then residing, and she has been a pauper inmate of the workhouse of that parish,

Q.B. Div.]

[Q.B. Div.]

chargeable as aforesaid, from that time to the present.

6. On the 17th Nov. 1876 the order of removal was applied for and obtained, and due notice of appeal against it was subsequently given by the appellants.

7. On the 15th Aug. 1876 the Divided Parishes Act and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) was passed, and it was under the 34th and 35th sections of that Act that the order of removal was granted.

8. No evidence was given that the said John Goddard or the pauper had obtained any settlement in the appellants' union, unless they acquired settlements under the provisions of the said Act by reason of the said John Goddard having resided in the parish of St. Mary, Ipswich, from 1869 to 1873, as aforesaid.

9. No evidence was given of any settlement acquired by the pauper other than her birth settlement in the respondents' parish of Great Yarmouth as aforesaid, and any derivative settlement she may have acquired from her said father under sect. 35 of the said Act.

It was contended on the part of the respondents that the pauper's father acquired a settlement in the Ipswich Union by three years' residence in the parish of St. Matthew, Ipswich, under the 34th section of the above Act, and that the pauper took her father's settlement under the 35th section thereof.

It was contended on the part of the appellants, first, that the provisions of the said Act in regard to settlements by residence are not retrospective, and therefore the said John Goddard acquired no settlement in the said parish of St. Matthew, Ipswich, in the appellants' said union, by reason of his having resided there for three years and upwards; secondly, that if the Act is retrospective in regard to settlements by residence, it confers no settlement on persons who were not at the time of the passing of the said Act residing or have not since resided in the parish in which such settlement is claimed; thirdly, that even if the Act is so far retrospective in regard to its provisions as to settlement by residence as to confer a settlement in respect of a residence completed before the passing of the said Act, it has not a retrospective operation so far as regards the date of the actual acquisition of such settlement, and that no person whose residence was completed before the passing of the Act could actually be in possession of a settlement by virtue of such residence till the date of the passing of such Act, even if the said Act on coming into operation did confer a settlement upon him by virtue of such previous residence; fourthly, that as the said Act was not in operation when the pauper attained the age of sixteen years, viz. in 1873, her father had not then acquired any settlement by residence or otherwise in the said parish of St. Matthew, Ipswich, in the appellants' said union, and, consequently, that the settlement (if any) which the pauper then took of and from her said father (whatever it may have been) was not the settlement relied upon by the respondents, or any settlement in the parish of St. Matthew, in the appellants' union, and that by sect. 35 of the said Act she has, in the absence of evidence of her having since acquired any other settlement in her own right, retained the settlement (if any) which she then derived from her father, and has not derived from him any settlement he has since acquired by reason of the passing of the said Act or otherwise.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether on the above-stated facts the last legal settlement of the pauper was in the parish of St. Matthew, Ipswich.

If the court is of opinion that the answer should be in the affirmative, then the said order of removal and the order of the court of quarter sessions are to stand confirmed with costs, in the court below and in this court.

If the court is of opinion that the answer should be in the negative, then the order of removal and the order of quarter sessions are to be quashed with costs in the court below and in this court.

ASTON v. BIRMINGHAM.

This was an appeal against an order of two justices for the borough of Birmingham, for the removal of Maria Boden from the parish of Birmingham to the Aston Union.

The appeal was tried at Epiphany Quarter Sessions for the borough of Birmingham before the recorder, who confirmed the said order, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on the following case.

It was proved on the trial of the said appeal that the said Maria Boden was married to Charles Boden, and that after their marriage they resided together in Aston Union continuously from 1863 to 1868 without receiving relief, when the said Charles Boden died.

After his death Maria Boden received relief from the guardians of the Aston Union, and in Oct. 1875 she left Aston, and came to reside in Birmingham.

In July 1876 Maria Boden received relief from the guardians of the parish of Birmingham, and on the 27th Sept. 1876 the respondents obtained the said order for her removal to Aston.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that under the 34th section of the 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, the pauper's last place of settlement was Aston Union, either by reason of her husband's residence there, or in respect of her own residence there, as his wife until 1868.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the said 34th section did not apply to a case where the residence necessary to give a settlement under it had ceased before the application for the order of removal; and further that it did not apply where the said residence had ceased before the date of the passing of the Act.

If the court shall be of opinion that Maria Boden gained a settlement in the Aston Union under the said 34th section of the said Act, by reason of her own or her husband's residence therein, then the aforesaid order of removal is to stand confirmed; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the said order of removal and the order of sessions confirming the same are to be quashed.

ST. LEONARD'S SHOREDITCH v. BURTON-UPON-TRENT.

This was a special case stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Middlesex, in the matter of an appeal against an order for the removal of Thomas Worth from the said parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, in the county of Middlesex, to the said Burton-upon-Trent Union.

1. An order of removal was made by one of the Metropolitan Police magistrates on the 22nd Nov. 1876, adjudging the last legal settlement of one Thomas Worth, a pauper, to be in the parish of Burton-upon-Trent, in the said union, and ordering his removal from the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, in the county of Middlesex, to the Burton-upon-Trent Union.

2. The guardians of the said union appealed against such order to the January general sessions of the peace for the said county of Middlesex.

3. The grounds of removal and particulars of settlement as set forth in the notice of chargeability and statements of grounds of removal were as follows, that is to say: that in or about the year 1860 the said Thomas Worth commenced to reside in the parish or township of Burton-upon-Trent, in the said Burton-upon-Trent Union, and that he continued to reside continuously in the said township or parish for a period of three years and upwards, viz., till the year 1876.

4. The grounds of appeal were (among others which it is not now necessary to specify), that the said Thomas Worth had ceased to reside in the said township or parish of Burton-upon-Trent some months ago, before the passing of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, and did not acquire any settlement in the said township or parish by reason of his residence therein under the provisions of the said Act.

5. The appeal came on for hearing at the said sessions, when the following admissions were made by the parties thereto with regard to the facts and the matters at issue in the said appeal, that is to say:

It was admitted by the appellants that the said Thomas Worth had resided from the year 1860 until Feb. 1876 in the said township or parish of Burton-upon-Trent, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of the years of his said residence as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf have rendered him irremovable; but it was admitted by the respondents that he had ceased to reside in the said township or parish in the month of Feb. 1876, and consequently before the passing of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61).

6. The only question between the said parties in the said appeal was whether, upon the facts stated above, a settlement was acquired by the said Thomas Worth by his residence in the said township and parish of Burton-upon-Trent, under sect. 34 of the said statute.

7. It was contended by the respondents that, as the pauper was a person who had resided as mentioned in sect. 34 in the parish of Burton-upon-Trent, a new settlement was given to him by such section, although he had ceased to reside therein before the passing of the Act. It was contended by the appellants that the period of three years' residence contemplated by the said section was a period of three years, the whole or some part of which had taken place after the passing of the Act, and that a residence which had terminated before the passing of the Act could not confer a settlement under the said Act.

8. The said sessions decided in favour of the respondents, and affirmed the said order of removal with costs, subject to a special case.

The question for the opinion of this honourable court is, whether the pauper gained a settlement under sect. 34. If this court shall answer this question in the affirmative, the order of sessions is to stand; but if in the negative, the order of removal and the order of sessions confirming the same are to be quashed.

The following are the three sections of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), relating to this subject:

Sect. 34. Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise, provided that an order of removal in respect of a settlement acquired under this section shall not be made upon the evidence of the person to be removed, without such corroboration as the justices or court think sufficient.

Sect. 35. No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another. An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires an other settlement. If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

Sect. 36. The provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to any pauper removed under any order of removal, or without such order under the provisions in that behalf contained in the Union Chargeability Act 1865, before the passing of this Act, or in receipt of non-resident relief lawfully given, or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act.

Metcalf, Q.C. (with him Temple Cooke) argued for the respondents in the first case, that whatever might have been the intention of the Legislature, the words used had clearly a retrospective effect, and made a three years residence at any period of a person's life a legal settlement to be acted upon after the passing of the Act.

Buszard, Q.C. (with him A. P. Stone) was heard in support of the same argument on behalf of the respondents in the second case.

J. F. Clerk followed on the same side on behalf of the respondents in the third case.

W. Graham and Poyser appeared for the appellants in the first case, F. M. White, Q.C. and J. O. Carter for the appellants in the second case, and E. Lumley for the appellants in the third case, but they were none of them heard by the court.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think these rules to set aside the judgments of quarter session must be made absolute. I myself entertain no doubt of any kind. Clearly, in my opinion, the words of the 34th section relate only to a residence which must be completed after the passing of the Act. All enactments must have a merely prospective operation, unless the words are distinct in their reference to the past. These are not words which are necessarily retrospective, and if we can adopt another construction we ought to do so, in order to carry out the admitted intention of the Legislature. But further than that, the language used in the section will not to my mind lend itself to any retrospective meaning. The words are, "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish." "he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise." The provision is concerning a period until a person shall acquire a settlement in some other parish; if the provision were intended to relate to a settlement which a person might previously have obtained during the whole of his life, the limiting words would have been "until he has acquired." That is sufficient to show that the words of the section were never meant to lend themselves to any construction but that which is admitted by the intention of the Legislature. This last "shall" in the section simplifies the matter, and makes the meaning of the whole provision quite clear. If a person becomes a resident after the passing of the Act, and continues so under the conditions mentioned for three years, or if a person completes such a residence after the passing of the Act, he obtains thereby a settlement in the parish of his residence. In order to give a retro-active operation to any legislative enactment we ought to see clearly that it was so intended. I do not believe there was any such intention on the part of the Legislature with respect to this provision; but even if I were satisfied that there was, I should not consider the words used sufficient to justify us in carrying out that intention. The orders, therefore, must all be quashed, and the appeals allowed.

REG. (on the prosecution of Cookson) v. LAND TAX COMMISSIONERS.

MELLOR J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think it is a very clear case, and I have no doubt about it whatever. It would require the strongest words to make me suppose that the Legislature intended that a residence of three years at any past period of a man's life should be his settlement for the future; and the limitation of the period to the person's hereafter acquiring another settlement is enough to my mind to show that the residence which gives a settlement must at least be completed after the passing of the Act.

REG. (on the prosecution of Cookson) v. LAND TAX COMMISSIONERS.

Land tax—Transfer to other district—38 Geo. 3, c. 5, ss. 36 and 53—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 60, s. 1.

Two properties in one parish had been assessed to the land tax, from the time of the earliest schedule in existence, as part of the district or place, in which were comprised the next adjoining parish, these two properties, and a third property which had been reputed to be extra-parochial. The only lands in this district liable to land tax since 1806 have been those belonging to these three properties.

In 1873 the two first mentioned properties were transferred to and assessed in the parish in which they are situated, under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 60, s. 1; and upon appeal by the owner of the third property, the Land Tax Commissioners affirmed the transfer.

Held, upon mandamus to the commissioners, obtained at the instance of the said appellant, that the usage established under such circumstances ought to be sustained, and that the transfer and new assessment must be set aside, under 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, ss. 36 and 53.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice by order of the said court, dated the 1st June 1876, and with the consent of the parties.

1. Meldon is a parish in the county of Northumberland, adjoining the parish of Mitford in the same county. Mr. John Cookson is the owner of a property called River Green situate between and adjoining the said parishes of Meldon and Mitford, and in the said county of Northumberland. This property has been generally reputed to be extra-parochial, but it has the longest common boundary with the parish of Mitford. Overseers, however, have been appointed and have acted continuously downward from the year 1836, and are still acting down to the present time.

2. For a considerable time before the year 1873, the said property of River Green and two other properties known as Edington and Molesden, both in the parish of Mitford, had been together assessed to the land tax in a district or place which furnished its separate quota. This district or place in the schedules for earlier years was headed "Meldon, with River Green, Molesden, and Edington;" and in those for later years Meldon. The said properties had annually paid their respective portions of and in the quota furnished by the said district or place according to their respective values. A search made among the schedules in the office of the clerk of the peace for the said county shows that this had been the case in every year since 1748 (before which year there is no land tax schedule there in existence), with the exception of the years 1754, 1768, 1770, 1775, 1777, 1780, 1805, and 1827, for which years the schedules are missing. Since the year 1806 at least, the said properties of River Green, Molesden, and Edington have been the only properties comprised in such district or place which remained liable to the land tax, and have, for the purposes of the annual assessment, constituted the whole of such district or place.

3. Down to the year 1862 the district or place mentioned in the last paragraph formed part part of the division of Castle Ward, but in that year it was transferred with its quota under the provisions of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 60, s. 1, to the division of Morpeth ward, and has since remained in the last-mentioned division.

4. Since the year 1862 the assessment for such district or place, together with that of the adjoining district or place of Mitford, have been made in the form and manner shown by a document (made part of the case) which was a copy of the same for the year 1872-3. In such document, of the properties assessed under the head of Meldon, the first two comprise the property called Edington aforesaid; the third, fourth, and fifth comprise the property called Molesden aforesaid, and the last four comprise the property called River Green aforesaid. All of such properties are equally assessed to their respective portions of the quota of 39*l.* 12*s.* 7½*d.*

5. The properties assessed under the head of Mitford in the said assessment are all equally assessed to their respective portions of the quota of 85*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*

6. In the early part of the year 1873, Sir Arthur Monck (who has now taken the name of Middleton), who was and is the owner of the property called Edington aforesaid, was desirous of redeeming the land tax thereon, when it was for the first time discovered by the officials at the Land Tax Redemption Office, Somerset House, that Edington had been assessed in the parish of Meldon instead of the parish of Mitford, in which it was situated, and they refused to allow the redemption on that ground. After ascertaining, as the fact was, that the said properties called Edington and Molesden aforesaid were situated in the parish of Mitford, and not in the parish of Meldon, the said Land Tax Commissioners, on the application of the said Sir Arthur Monck and of Colonel Mitford, the owner of the property called Molesden, ordered that the said properties called Edington and Molesden should be transferred to and assessed in Mitford; and accordingly in the assessment for 1873-4, the said properties were transferred and assessed under the head of Mitford, and not as before under the head of Meldon. No portion of the quota payable by the district assessed under the head of Meldon was transferred with them.

7. The commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury never either assented to or dissented from the transfer in the last paragraph mentioned.

8. The assessment for the year 1875-6 was practically the same as the above-mentioned assessment for 1873-4. In such assessment the said properties of Edington and Molesden are shown as the last five items placed under the head of Mitford, and they are, together with the other properties, placed under such head assessed to their respective portions of the quota of 86*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, payable by the district assessed under the head of Mitford at the rate of about 2½*d.* in the pound, according to their respective annual values, as shown in the first column of such assessment.

9. The property called River Green is in the said assessment the only property placed under the head of Meldon, and is assessed to the whole quota of 39*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*, payable by the district assessed under the head of Meldon, at the rate of about 1*s.* 10½*d.* in the pound, according to the annual value of such property as shown in the first column of such assessment.

10. The following table shows in a tabular form the alterations above mentioned:

	1872-3.			1875-6.
Quotas Payable.	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.
Mitford	85	16	6	86	14	2
Meldon	39	12	7½	39	16	10
	1872-3.			1875-6
Rate in the Pound.		s.	d.		s.	d.
District of Mitford	3½			0	2½
District of Meldon	7½			1	10½
Edington	7½			0	3½
Molesden
River Green	7½			1	10½

11. Mr. John Cookson, the appellant herein, and the owner of the property called River Green, was prevented from appealing to the said commissioners in the year 1874, owing to an informality in the proceedings taken on his behalf; but in the year 1875 he appealed and contended that the commissioners had no power to make the transfer above mentioned, and that if they had such power they had exercised it improperly. He also claimed before the commissioners that if they transferred the properties called Edington and Molesden to the district or place assessed under the head of Mitford, they should also transfer the property called River Green to the same, because by virtue of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 27, it had been annexed to and incorporated with the parish of Mitford for the purpose of collecting and assessing the land tax. The commissioners maintained the transfer of the properties called Edington and Molesden, and declined to transfer the property called River Green.

12. On the 18th May 1876, a rule nisi for a mandamus was obtained, and by the consent of the appellant and respondents the same was made absolute by the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, subject to the present special case. The questions for the opinion of the Court are:

1. Whether the Land Tax Commissioners had power to transfer the said properties of Edington and Molesden from the district or place assessed under the head of Meldon to the district or place assessed under the head of Mitford, or ought to have transferred the same?

2. Whether, if such transfer was within the power of the commissioners, and ought to have been made, the property called River Green ought or ought not also to be transferred?

3. Whether the assessment for the year 1875-6 is good and valid in law?

If the court is of opinion that the commissioners had power to transfer, and ought to have transferred the properties called Edington and Molesden to the district or place assessed under the head of Mitford, but ought not to transfer the property called River Green to such district or place, then the assessment is to stand.

If the court is of opinion either that the commissioners had no power to transfer, or ought not to have transferred, the properties called Edington and Molesden to the district or place assessed under the head of Mitford, or that they ought to have transferred, and ought to transfer, the property called River Green to such district or place, then the said assessment is to be altered in accordance with such opinion of the court; and

If the court is of opinion that the said assessment is valid, and ought to stand, then judgment is to be given for the said commissioners with such costs as the said court shall direct; but if the court is of opinion that the said assessment is invalid and ought to be altered, then judgment is to be given for the appellant with such costs as the said court shall direct.

Herschell, Q.C. (with him Ridley) argued for the appellant, the prosecutor.—The last of the Annual Land Tax Acts (38 Geo. 3, c. 5) was made perpetual in the same year 1798, subject to redemption and purchase in the manner therein stated, by 38 Geo. 3, c. 60. This latter Act being partly re-enacted in the Consolidating Act of 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 116), sect. 180 of this Act of 1802 provides for a continued assessment of the district as long as any part of the land tax charged thereon remains unredeemed in the same terms as sect. 74 of 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, except that the reference therein to the quota for each district is applied to 38 Geo. 3, c. 5. In 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 60, s. 1, the commissioners are empowered "if and as they shall see fit (subject as herein provided) to transfer the jurisdiction of any of the parishes, townships, hamlets, tithings, or places, in any county from the division or divisions to which the same respectively now belong, together with the quotas payable by them respectively at the time of such transfer, to any adjoining or other division or divisions of the same county, or to any new division or divisions," subject to certain formalities, "and the commissioners whose respective divisions shall be extended or created in manner aforesaid shall have full jurisdiction and control in, over, and throughout the several parishes, townships, tithings, hamlets, or places, so as aforesaid transferred, and shall and may execute all the powers and provisions of the Acts relating to the land tax, and of the Acts relating to the duties of assessed taxes, in assessing, charging, raising, and enforcing payment of the said taxes respectively, in and throughout the same; and the parishes, townships, tithings, hamlets, or places so as aforesaid respectively transferred shall be considered as forming part of the division to which they shall be or shall have been transferred, for all the purposes of the Acts relating to the land tax and the assessed taxes respectively, anything in any former statute contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding." The only other statute relating to this case is the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, which by sect. 27 incorporates all places reputed to be extra-parochial with the next adjoining parish with which it has the longest common boundary. The statutes concerning the land tax were elaborately considered in Reg. v. Land Tax Commissioners (2 E. & B. 694), and it was laid down by the Queen's Bench that the duty of the Commissioners of Land Tax, in assessing the contributions by the several parishes within a division, is regulated not by 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 8, but by 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, s. 74 (re-enacted by 42 Geo. 3, c. 116, s. 180), which treats the quota payable by each parish towards making up the amount charged on the division as permanent at its then proportion to the other parishes of the division. And this is not altered by any later enactment. And it was held that, where such quota had, up to the year 1852, been unchanged for 150 years, the commissioners were right in continuing the assessment for that year at such quota, although the result was that an unequal poundage was levied in the several parishes. The section which especially applies to the particular case of these two estates being assessed to the parish adjoining that in which they are situated is the 36th of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, by which it is enacted "that, for the avoiding all obstructions and delays in assessing and collecting the sums by this Act to be rated and assessed upon any manors, lands, tenements, rents, tithes, or other hereditaments, all places, constablewicks, divisions, and allotments which have been used to be taxed and assessed shall pay and be assessed in such county, hundred, rape, wapentake, constablewick, division, or place of allotment within England, Wales, and Berwick-upon-Tweed, as the same have heretofore been usually assessed in, and not elsewhere."

A. L. Smith (with him C. Hall) for the commissioners, the defendants.—There is nothing in the case cited to interfere with this decision of the Land Tax Commissioners. The quotas of these parishes have not been disturbed, and the unequal poundage is the same result as that which was held to be no objection to the commissioners' decision in the case then before the court. By the 53rd section of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, it is expressly provided that "every person who shall be rated and assessed for or in respect of any manors, messuages, lands, or tenements, or other the premises, according to the former clauses of this Act, shall be rated and assessed in the places where such manors, messuages, lands, and tenements and other the premises respectively do lie, and not elsewhere." The commissioners have, according to the discretion vested in them by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 60, s. 1, seen fit to transfer the jurisdiction of these places to the division in which, by this section 53 of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, they ought originally to have been assessed.

Herschell, Q.C. was not heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this writ of mandamus must be made absolute. If the statutes had from the first been strictly interpreted and acted upon, these lands of Edington and Molesden would have contributed to the quota of the parish of Mitford, but by some mistake they have from the original imposition of the tax been assessed as part of the adjoining parish of Meldon. It would be in the highest degree unjust that the long established assessment of land in Mitford should be lowered at the cost of the adjoining parish, the quotas of both remaining the same; and it would be monstrous if a transfer causing such an injustice, although by order of the Land Tax Commissioners, could not be rectified. It seems to me, however, that by the case which has been cited, we are at liberty to hold that an assessment, so long established as this has been, is as unalterable as the quota to which it contributes. The commissioners therefore should not have disturbed the usage by which these lands had always been rated and assessed in Meldon, but should have allowed the appeal of the landowner who was interested in the continuation of the old assessment.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It may be that either conclusion must be attended with some injustice, and it may well be contended that the intention was to assess lands in the places where they lie. But I feel we ought to uphold this usage, however it arose, by which the several contributions have become definitely and equally fixed, if we have any authority to do so. I think we may under the case cited, and our judgment will therefore be for the prosecutor, who was the appellant before the commissioners.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Reported by HENRY LINGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Jan. 30, 1877.

(Before CLEASBY and POLLOCK, BB.)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

BROADHEAD (app.) v. HOLDSWORTH (resp.)

The Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1871 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, s. 20) Schedule Form O; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 98, sects. 7, 11, 15)—"Insusceptibility of successful vaccination, or child having had small pox"—Certificate of in "Form O" as altered by Poor Law Board—Transmission of certificate to vaccination officer—Duty of parent in that respect—"Casus omissus."

A parent who holds a certificate of his child having had small pox, but not one of its "insusceptibility of successful vaccination," is not within, and is not required by, the terms of sect. 7 of the Vaccination Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98), to transmit such certificate to the vaccination officer; nor, inasmuch as "having had small pox" and "insusceptibility of successful vaccination" are two distinct and different things, is he liable to the penalty imposed by that section upon persons failing to transmit a certificate of such "insusceptibility."

So held, by the Exchequer Division (Cleasby and Pollock, BB.), who thought the case was "casus omissus" in the Act of Parliament.

1. THIS was a case stated by two justices of the borough of Huddersfield for the opinion of the court under 21 Vict. c. 43.

2. On the 2nd June 1876, the appellant, Wm. Broadhead, laid an information before a justice of the peace against the respondent, Arthur Holdsworth, of Marsh, in Huddersfield, for that he had reason to believe that a certain child called Arthur Perrier Holdsworth, under the age of fourteen years, residing within the Huddersfield Poor Law Union (for which the appellant acts), had not been successfully vaccinated. That the appellant had duly given the respondent, as the father of the said child, notice to procure its being vaccinated, and that such notice had been disregarded.

3. The charge against the respondent arose under the 30 & 31 Vict. cap. 84, sect. 31, under which the information was laid. That section enacts that "if any registrar or any officer appointed by the guardians to enforce the provisions of this Act, shall give information in writing to a justice of the peace that he has reason to believe that any child under the age of fourteen years, being within the union or parish for which the informant acts, has not been successfully vaccinated, and that he has given notice to the parent or person having the custody of such child to procure its being vaccinated, and that this notice has been disregarded, the justice may summon such parent or person to appear with the child before him at a certain time and place, and upon the appearance, if the justice shall find, after such examination as he shall deem necessary, that the child has not been vaccinated nor has already had the small pox, he may if he see fit make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated within a certain time; and if at the expiration of such time the child shall not have been vaccinated, or shall not be shown to be then unfit to be vaccinated, or to be insusceptible of vaccination, the person upon whom such order shall have been made shall be proceeded against summarily, and unless he can show some reasonable ground for his omission to carry the order into effect, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s."

4. Upon the hearing of the said information, it was proved by the respondent, and admitted, that his child, the said Arthur Perrier Holdsworth, had then already had the small pox, and the justices thereupon discharged the respondent, holding that the Vaccination Acts did not require a certificate of the child having had the small pox to be transmitted.

5. It was, however, contended on behalf of the appellant that, although the respondent had not been found guilty of the offence of not taking or causing to be taken his child to be vaccinated, he was yet guilty of an offence by not transmitting a certificate of the fact of such child having had the small pox, according to Form O in the schedule to the General Orders of the Local Government Board, issued on the 30th Nov. 1871, and the appellant sought to have the respondent convicted upon the ground of the non-transmission of such a certificate, relying upon the 4th paragraph of sect. 11 of the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91 (the Vaccination Act 1871), which enacts as follows: "Where a person is charged with the offence of neglecting to take, or cause to be taken, any child to be vaccinated, and on the defence made by such person it appears to the justices having cognizance of the case that such person is not guilty of such offence, but has been guilty of the offence of not transmitting any certificate required by the principal Act or this Act with respect to the vaccination of such child, the justices may convict such person of the last mentioned offence in like manner as if he had been charged therewith."

6. The justices were of opinion that in point of law the respondent was not required, either by the principal or the amending Act, to transmit a certificate of the fact of his child having had small pox, since, although sect. 20 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, requires the medical practitioner, in cases where a child brought to him has already had small pox, to deliver to the parents a certificate of such fact, yet there is no provision requiring the parent to transmit such certificate to the vaccination officers; and further that sect. 7 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 98, only requires certificates of a child being "unfit for or insusceptible of successful vaccination" to be transmitted by the parent to the vaccination officer, and does not in terms extend to the case of a child having had small pox; and that, as the penalty is imposed upon those only who act in contravention of the last mentioned section, the respondent was not guilty of any offence.

The justices therefore ordered the respondent to be discharged.

The question of law arising hereon was, whether the justices were right in deciding that the Vaccination Acts did not impose any penalty upon persons who fail to transmit to the vaccination officer a certificate of a child having had small pox.

The following sections of the Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1871, and the forms under the said Acts respectively, are those on which the question turned, and are material:

The Vaccination Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84) enacts:

[Ex. Div.]

BROADHEAD (app.) v. HOLDSWORTH (resp.).

[Ex. Div.]

Sect. 20.—If any such public vaccinator or medical practitioner shall find that a child whom he has three times unsuccessfully vaccinated is insusceptible of successful vaccination, or that a child brought to him for vaccination has already had the small pox, he shall deliver to the parent or other person, as aforesaid, a certificate under his hand according to the form in the schedule herunto annexed, marked C, or to the like effect; and the parent or such other person, as aforesaid, shall thenceforth not be required to cause the child to be vaccinated.

The Form C above referred to is as follows:

I, the undersigned, hereby certify that I have times unsuccessfully vaccinated, the child of, of, in the parish (or township) of, in the county (or borough) of, aged, [or that the child has already had small pox (as the case may be)] and I am of opinion that such child is insusceptible of successful vaccination. Dated, &c.

(Signed) A.B.,

Public vaccinator of the union (or parish);

or, A.B.,

Medical practitioner (i.e., M.D., L.A.C., or F.R.C.S., or otherwise, as the case may be).

MEM.—This is to be kept by the parent or other person to whom it is given.

The other forms in the schedule are (B) a certificate of postponement of vaccination on account of unfitness by reason of health, which is also to be kept by the parent, &c., to whom given; and (D) a certificate of successful vaccination, which is to be transmitted by the public vaccinator, or if given by any other medical practitioner, then by the parent, &c., to the registrar of the district in which the operation is performed.

The Vaccination Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98) enacts:

Sect. 7. Every certificate of a child being unfit for, or insusceptible of, successful vaccination, if given by a public vaccinator, shall, instead of being delivered by him to the parent, be transmitted by such public vaccinator, and if given by any other medical practitioner, shall be transmitted by the parent of such child to the vaccination officer in like manner as if it were a certificate of successful vaccination, and within seven days after the examination of the child upon which such certificate is founded; and the public vaccinator shall, upon request, and without fee or charge, deliver to the parent a duplicate of such certificate transmitted by him. . . . Every person who acts in contravention of, or fails to comply with, any provision of this section, shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding 40s. . . .

The following is Form C, as altered by the Poor Law Board, under sect. 15 of the Vaccination Act 1871.

Medical certificate of insusceptibility of successful vaccination, or of child having had small pox.

I, the undersigned, hereby certify that, the child of, aged, born at, in the parish (township) of, in the county (borough) of, [has been times unsuccessfully vaccinated by me, and is, in my opinion, insusceptible of successful vaccination] or [has already had small pox.]

Dated, &c.

(Signed)

[Public vaccinator of the union (parish) of Medical practitioner duly registered.]

Notice as to transmission of certificate (C).

The certificate, if given by a public vaccinator, is to be transmitted by him through the post to the vaccination officer, whose address is on the other side. The public vaccinator is bound, upon request, and without fee or charge, to deliver to the parent or person having the custody of the child, a duplicate of the certificate so transmitted by him.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. X.

The certificate, if given by any other medical practitioner, is to be transmitted by post to the vaccination officer, whose address is on the other side, by the parent or person having the custody of the child. In either case it must be transmitted within seven days after the examination of the child upon which the certificate is founded.

The other forms (B and D) under the Act of 1871 are similar to forms (B and D) under the Act of 1867, but Form (B) instead of being kept by the parent, &c. as before, is now to be transmitted to the vaccination officer by the public vaccinator or the parent, &c., as in the case of the above certificate Form (C).

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.) (with whom were A. L. Smith and S. Romilly) for the appellant.—The scheme of the Vaccination Acts with reference to this question must be looked at. Sect. 20 of the Act of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84) enacted, that if any public vaccinator should find that a child that he has three times unsuccessfully vaccinated was insusceptible of successful vaccination, or that a child brought to him for vaccination had already had small pox, he should deliver to the parent or other custodian of the child a certificate in the form marked (C) in the schedule to the Act, the intention being that the parent should be furnished with a defence upon any future attempt to cause the child to be vaccinated. There were thus two grounds upon which "insusceptibility" was declared, namely, the three unsuccessful attempts to vaccinate, and the having had the disease. That that was so, and that both were treated as amounting to insusceptibility, was shown by the form of the certificate itself. It certified that the child had been so many times "unsuccessfully vaccinated," or that "it had already had small pox," each of those things being a preliminary condition, then came the conclusion, "and I am of opinion that such child is"—what? "insusceptible of successful vaccination. Either contingency, therefore, satisfied the certificate of "insusceptibility." This certificate was to be kept by the parent, and so the public vaccinator, having no means of knowing the fact, might on imperfect or no information summon the parent, and then, upon the certificate being produced, the whole proceedings would be shown to be needless. To remedy this, sect. 7 of the amending Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98) was passed, which provided that the certificate of insusceptibility given by a public vaccinator, instead of being delivered to the parent, should be transmitted by such vaccinator, and if given by any other medical practitioner, should be transmitted by the parent, to the vaccination officer, and a duplicate be given to the parent on request without charge. The Act of 1867 contemplated three conditions of things: first, unfitness to undergo the operation by reason of health; secondly, insusceptibility from whatever cause arising; and, thirdly, successful vaccination. In the two former cases the parent who was to be protected from the law being put in force against him was to hold the certificate. (Forms B and C respectively). Then came sect. 7 of the amending Act of 1871, but there was no trace in that Act of any intention to alter the law on the subject as declared by the Act of 1867, or to place the having had small pox in a different category with respect to insusceptibility from that of unsuccessful vaccination. The respondent contended, and the justices so decided, that the child having had small pox, the Vaccination Acts did not apply to it at all, and thus the main object of the statutes would be defeated. Sect. 15 of the later Act of 1871 empowered the Poor Law Board by order from time to time to "repeal, alter, and add to" the forms in the schedule to the earlier Act of 1867, and directed that the reference in either of the Acts to the form in the schedule, or to any forms, were to be construed to refer to the forms prescribed by any such order, and accordingly Form C was altered in pursuance of an order of the board. Now, reading the original Form C together with sect. 20 of the Act of 1867, it was clear that the statute imported that "insusceptibility" might be produced in two ways; namely, by the unsuccessful attempts to vaccinate, or by the child having had the disease, which two are treated as the same thing. The respondent contended, however, that the altered Form C made a distinction between the two, and treated them as different conditions, and that, therefore, the cogency of sect. 20 no longer applied where small pox had previously existed. The appellant, on the contrary, submitted that sect. 15, which authorised only an alteration in a mere form, was not intended to, and could not, effect an alteration in the law, or in any way prevent or override the operation of the Vaccination Acts themselves upon a very large class of children. To hold that it did would be a very startling construction, and would involve the absurdity that the very form relied upon to escape the operation of the earlier statute did itself contemplate the certificate of the child's having already had small pox. Having had the disease created, or at all events was equivalent to, insusceptibility. [POLLOCK, B.—You say that, at any rate, the law by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, sched. Form C, has so laid it down?] Just so. The obligation was independent of the form, and was interpreted by it, but the form was not to outweigh the substance or to override the statute, and if it were to do so, a very numerous body of children would be outside the Acts altogether. Insusceptibility, in the sense contended for by the appellant, was to be certified under the new Act in the like manner as successful vaccination was to be certified under both the Acts; and the question for the court was whether or not, in the indirect way contended for by the respondent, one of the most important provisions of the Vaccination Acts had been repealed.

BROADHEAD (app.) v. HOLDSWORTH (resp.).

Poland (with him was F. J. Clerk) for the respondent, contra.—The decision of the magistrates was right, and the respondent could not be convicted, under sect. 7 of the Act of 1871, of not sending a certificate which he in fact did not possess. He had a certificate of the child "having had small pox," but not one of "insusceptibility of vaccination." On looking at the different sections it will be seen that the change made by the Poor Law Board was in accordance with the Act of 1867, and that the mistake made in that Act was in Form C in the schedule, and not in the Act itself. Sect. 20 treated the two things, insusceptibility and having had small pox, as separate and distinct. The words are, "if any such public vaccinator shall find that a child whom he has three times unsuccessfully vaccinated is insusceptible of successful vaccination." The insusceptibility arose from the fact of three attempts to vaccinate having been made: the section then went on—"or that a child brought to him for vaccination has already had small pox." Then in either of those separate and distinct cases, he was to deliver to the parent, &c., a certificate in the Form C in the schedule, or to the like effect, and the parent, &c., should thenceforth not be required to cause the child to be vaccinated. Now the enactment having treated the two things as separate and distinct, the form in the schedule seems to have been taken from the marginal note, which is, "Provision for insusceptibility of successful vaccination," instead of from the Act, and so no doubt the certificate was open to the argument urged on the other side, that, construing it as a legal document, the words at the end of it, "and I am of opinion that such a child is insusceptible," &c., might be read as if they were, "and I am of opinion, therefore, that such child is insusceptible," &c. Now, however that may be, sect. 20 was plain in its terms, and it was fair to consider that the Legislature, in passing the Act of 1871, had that section before them, and then enacted that every certificate of a child being unfit for or insusceptible of successful vaccination, if given by a public vaccinator, should be transmitted by him, and if given by any other person, then that it should be transmitted by the parent. Now the "insusceptibility of successful vaccination" was that which was referred to in sect. 20 of the Act of 1867, namely, insusceptibility by reason of unsuccessful attempts to vaccinate; in such case there would be proof positive of "insusceptibility," and that was treated of in the body of the statute as being "insusceptible of successful vaccination." But a person who had had the small pox had a certificate of a fact which was a different matter. That being so, it was no doubt noticed that the forms in the earlier Act were not correct, and power was given by sect. 15 to the Poor Law Board to repeal, alter, or add to them. The board, reading the provisions of the statute, found that it dealt with separate things, and they headed their form in accordance therewith, as "medical certificate of insusceptibility of successful vaccination, or of child having had small pox." [He was here stopped by the court.]

CLEASBY, B.—I cannot help regretting the conclusion to which we are obliged to come in this case, but it seems to me that it is a case in which, unfortunately, legislation has been somewhat imperfect. It is, in fact, an instance of a casus omissus, and it is quite clear that we cannot supply such an omission, especially in an enactment creating an offence and inflicting a penalty upon its commission. It is not because the Legislature might have meant to include such a case as the present one within the terms of sect. 7 of the Vaccination Act of 1871, that we can therefore read that section as bringing the present case within it. The question which we have here to consider and determine is, whether or not the offence with which the respondent has been charged is an offence against the statute under which he has been proceeded against, and we cannot convict him of such an offence if the evidence in the case points entirely to another and different thing altogether. Now, on looking at the words of sect. 7, which creates the offence, we find that it is thereby enacted that "every certificate of a child being unfit for or insusceptible of successful vaccination, if given by a public vaccinator, shall, instead of being delivered by him to the parent, be transmitted by such public vaccinator, and, if given by any other medical practitioner, shall be transmitted by the parent of such child, to the vaccination officer." We have nothing to do on the present occasion with the case of a child being "unfit for vaccination," but have only to deal with the case of its being "insusceptible of successful vaccination," and with regard to that there is this positive enactment in sect. 7, that the certificate of such insusceptibility shall be transmitted either by the public vaccinator or by the parents (as the case may be) to the vaccination officer; and the section proceeds to enact that "every person who acts in contravention of or fails to comply with any provision of this section shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding 20s." Now this case is no doubt peculiar in this respect, that there was in the schedule to the former Act of 1867 a Form C, which apparently treated "insusceptibility of successful vaccination" and "having had small pox" as the same thing, that is to say, it made the certificate given of a child having been three times unsuccessfully vaccinated, or having had the disease, conclude with these words, "and is insusceptible of successful vaccination." The alteration made in the present form is, I think, easily to be understood, and the reason for it apparent, because it might well be that persons of skill might have some hesitation in signing such a certificate as that given in the form as it originally stood, and might feel that to certify that, because a child had had small pox once, it was therefore "insusceptible of successful vaccination," or that, in other words, it could not have small pox a second time, would be to certify as a fact that which was by no means a certain or assured thing. Accordingly, we find that power was, by sect. 15 of the Act of 1871, given to the Poor Law Board, from time to time, by order to "repeal, alter, and add to" the forms in the schedule to the Act of 1867, and this alteration in Form C was accordingly made by the board. When we look at this new form, and see what the alteration really is, the matter seems to be tolerably clear. It is headed "Medical certificate of insusceptibility of successful vaccination, or of child having had small pox." It then proceeds as follows: "I hereby certify that such child," and so on, and then comes, between brackets, the following words: ["has been times" (it must not be less than three) "unsuccessfully vaccinated by me, and is, in my opinion, insusceptible of successful vaccination."] Then it goes on, "or," and then between brackets again come these words: ["has already had small pox."] There are then directions, referred to by the figure 5 in the margin, that the set of words between brackets which do not apply to the particular case are to be struck out, so that the form will stand as a certificate of one of two things (and it must be of one or the other of them), namely, of the child either having been three times unsuccessfully vaccinated, and so, therefore, being "insusceptible of successful vaccination," or of its "having already had small pox." The certificate in the present case stands as a certificate that the child in question "has already had small pox." Now, sect. 7 of the Act of 1871 having directed that a certificate of a child being "insusceptible of successful vaccination" shall be transmitted to the vaccination officer, and having imposed a penalty upon the person who fails so to transmit it, we are asked by the appellant to extend by construction the operation of that enactment so as to make it include the case of a person failing to transmit a certificate of a child "having had small pox," in other words, to say that every person who does not transmit a certificate of "insusceptibility of successful vaccination," whether he has one in his possession or not, deserves and is liable to punishment. It is quite impossible, I think, for us to do that, or to say that a person having, not a certificate of his child's "insusceptibility," but only of its "having had small pox," comes at all within the terms of this section of the Act of Parliament. The two things are quite distinct and different. Prior to the Act of 1871, and the altered form of the Poor Law Board, they would, no doubt, to a certain extent, have been the same thing, but they are now distinctly made two separate things. If a man possesses only a certificate of one particular kind he cannot be punished for not having transmitted a certificate of a totally different kind which he does not possess. It is of course much to be regretted that we should be compelled to decide this case upon the ground of its being a casus omissus in the Act of Parliament; but we have no alternative, and must therefore give judgment in favour of the respondent, and affirming the decision of the justices below.

BLACKPOOL PIER COMPANY v. FYLDE UNION.

BLACKPOOL PIER COMPANY v. FYLDE UNION.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Poor rate—Pier below low water mark—31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 27.

The portion of a flying pier below low water mark is neither an accretion from the sea, nor an extra parochial place, within the meaning of sect. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1868.

THIS was an appeal by way of special case from the decision of local magistrates. The question was whether the plaintiffs should be rated to the relief of the poor in respect of that portion of their pier which is situate below low water mark, and in respect of tolls taken by them as occupiers under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, sect. 27. That section enacts (amongst other things) that every extra parochial place shall for all civil parochial purposes be annexed to and incorporated with the next adjoining parish with which it has the longest common boundary; and every accretion from the sea, whether natural or artificial, and the part of the seashore to the low water mark, shall for the same purposes be annexed to and incorporated with the parish to which such accretion or part adjoins, in proportion to the extent of the common boundary.

A. L. Smith, for the company.—The pier is not an accretion, because the low water mark remains where it always was. Before the recent statute, even the land down to low water was not always rated :

Reg. v. Musson, 8 E. & B. 900 ;

Reg. v. Kohn, L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 63.

W. G. Harrison, for the Union.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The pier is carried upon piles some 500ft. beyond low water mark, and therefore it is beyond the realm of England, unless Parliament has expressly brought it within our jurisdiction. The second part of the 27th section of the Act referred to is that which is applicable to this case. The pier is not an accretion, that is it is not an uprising of new land where the tide has heretofore flowed. We are not called upon to decide whether it would be such if the pier were of solid masonry, which it is not, for it is only a deck carried on piles, which does not affect the ebb and flow of the sea. The fact that the licensees described themselves as of Blackpool does not alter the question.

GROVE, J. concurred, and added that the pier head was not an extra-parochial place within the meaning of the first part of the section, because it was a place wholly beyond the jurisdiction.

Held that it would not lie.

DEMURRER to statement of claim. The plaintiff alleged that he, whilst duly filling the rectory of Llandough, in Glamorganshire, obtained permission from his patron to exchange livings with some clergyman to be approved by his said patron; that the plaintiff submitted the name of one Pinckney, who was duly approved both by the patron and the Bishop of Llandaff, whereupon the patron promised to do all things necessary to enable the exchange to be carried out; that the plaintiff, relying on such promise, executed a deed of resignation of the living of Llandough, and delivered it into the hands of the registrar of the diocese, at the same time explaining to him the object in view; that the deed was accepted by the registrar to be held for the purpose of an exchange only; and that, notwithstanding his promise, the patron presented to the rectory his own son, the defendant, who entered into possession, and now fills the living.

The defence was, that the deed of resignation was an unconditional one; that the living being vacant, the defendant was duly presented; that if any such promise as alleged was made by the patron, it had been waived by the plaintiff, and that the dispute had already been referred to arbitration.

W. G. Harrison for the demurrer.—The deed of resignation was absolute. The temporal courts cannot interfere in this matter. How can they eject a rector from his living? The court can only deal with the fact that the rectory is full.

McClymont, for the plaintiff, contended that the deed was conditional, and the condition not having been fulfilled, the deed was no more than an escrow in the hands of the registrar.

The facts and arguments appear more fully in the judgment.

DENMAN, J.—This was a demurrer to the statement of claim. The plaintiff claimed possession of a certain house and glebe lands, and 4000*l.* for meane profits from Nov. 1867 until possession should be given. If the statement of claim had merely been confined to allegations that the plaintiff had been duly presented, instituted, and inducted to the rectory and living in question, and that the defendant had broken and entered the rectory house and glebe lands and expelled the plaintiff from his possession thereof, there can be no doubt that the statement of claim would have been perfectly sufficient, and would have made it incumbent upon the defendant to plead facts showing his right to the possession of the rectory house and glebe. That ejectment will lie for a rectory house and glebe by the person duly instituted and inducted, even as against a tenant under notice to quit at a future time from the last previous incumbent, appears from the case of Dos dem. Kerby v. Carter (Ry. & Moo. 237). See also Cook v. Elphin (5 Bligh N.S. 103). But the statement of claim in the present case contains allegations which the defendant's counsel contends are sufficient to prove that the plaintiff, upon his own showing in that statement, is not entitled to maintain ejectment, and on that ground he demurs to the statement of claim. The statement of claim, in addition to the allegations which would be necessary, and if unaccompanied by more, sufficient to make out a case in ejectment, contains other allegations so intermixed with them, that it is not on the face of the whole statement easy to say what the case of the plaintiff is. But upon careful perusal of it as a whole, I think it is sufficiently clear that it intends to admit that the defendant is in actual possession, not only of the rectory house and glebe, but of the living itself, which can only be by presentation, institution, and induction; and it does not, in my opinion, state any facts which, if that be the case, would give the plaintiff a right to sue the defendant in ejectment. The statement of claim, after stating the plaintiff's presentation, institution, and induction to the rectory and living, contains four paragraphs (Nos. 2-5) upon which the plaintiff's counsel relied as amounting to a statement that the plaintiff still remained in possession of the living until the patron, in violation of an agreement of exchange assented to by himself, the bishop, and the plaintiff, falsely claiming an absolute right to present by reason of a deed of resignation which was only conditionally delivered by the plaintiff, presented the defendant to the living. It was contended that, under the circumstances set out in these four paragraphs, the alleged resignation amounted to no resignation at all, the exchange contemplated not having been effected; and Watson's Clergyman's Law, and 2 Burn's

[C.P. Div.]

Ecclesiastical Law, p. 242, and Holt and Glover v. Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (Hob. 152), were cited as establishing the proposition that if a resignation deed is executed, resigning a living into the hands of the ordinary with a view to an exchange, and the exchange fails before the institution and induction of both incumbents into their new livings, the resignation is void. No doubt this is recognised as the law, at least to the extent of holding the deed to be defeasible where one of the parties dies before the change is completed (see Downes v. Craig, 9 M. & W. 176, per Parke, B., and p. 177, per Rolfe, B.); but I can find no authority for saying that, as between an incumbent who has resigned his living by deed with a view to an exchange and a new incumbent, the mere fact of that exchange having failed will enable him to sue in ejectment the actual incumbent, even if unconscientiously presented by the patron, in a case where he is in full possession of the living by institution and induction. In such a case I apprehend that the remedy of the incumbent who should have so resigned would be against the patron, and not against the new incumbent. In the present case, however, the statement goes on, in paragraph 6, to state that the defendant, "in full knowledge of all the premises," and "pretending right therefrom," accepted the presentation, and expelled the plaintiff from his possession of (amongst other things) the living; and I am not prepared to say that if I had thought that the four preceding paragraphs of the statement of claim had clearly shown facts which would have rendered it unconscientious in the defendant to have accepted the presentation, and to have applied for institution and induction, I should not have thought that he should be called upon to answer. But in the statement of claim, I only find what appears to me to amount to no more than this, viz., that at some time between January 1867 and the date of the writ (January 1876), all parties were willing and agreed that one Robert Pinckney should be presented to the living, and that the plaintiff executed and delivered the deed to the registrar of the bishop with that intention, and for that purpose only. But there is a total absence of all explanation of the circumstances under which Pinckney was not presented; and it is perfectly consistent with the statement of claim that Pinckney may for good cause have had no desire to be presented to the living; and that owing to intermediate proceedings the deed, though originally delivered with a view to an exchange, being an absolute resignation on the face of it, may have been well understood by all parties to have remained in the hands of the bishop without any condition at all long before the presentation of the defendant. This would indeed appear from the words in the statement of claim, "and at the time of execution and delivering the said deed, and before and after such execution and delivery," unaccompanied by any words showing that the original intention and understanding spoken of in paragraph 4 continued down to the time of the presentation of the defendant, and his taking possession of the living. I am, therefore, of opinion that, even if paragraph 6 of the statement of claim so far as it refers to the knowledge of the defendant were made out, it would not prevent the defendant from relying on the presentation alleged; and inasmuch as the latter part of that paragraph states him to be in possession, not only of the rectory house and glebe, but of the living itself, he is for the reasons given above not liable in ejectment upon this statement of claim.

GAY v. CADBY.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120)—Construction of sects. 125, 126, 127, 128, and 129—"Refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business"—Ashes from steam engine employed as motive power in a factory.

The Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 directs (s. 125) that vestries or district boards shall contract with a scavenger for the removal of refuse at the expense of the rates; but (s. 128) in case the scavenger be required by the owner or occupier of any house or land to remove "the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business," he shall be paid an extra sum for so doing.

The ashes of coals consumed by a steam engine used as a motive power in a pianoforte manufactory are "refuse" within the meaning of sect. 128.

Semble, the ashes of coals consumed in an hotel or bakery are "refuse" within the same section.

Case stated by one of the magistrates for the Metropolitan Police District of Hammersmith, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the court upon a question of law.

The question depended upon the construction of sects. 125, 126, 127, 128, and 129 of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, which are as follows:

Sect. 125. It shall be lawful for every vestry and district board, and they are hereby required, to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons, or to contract with any company or persons, for the sweeping and cleansing of the several streets within their parish or district, and for collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth, and for, &c., within their parish or district, and such company or persons are hereinafter referred to as scavengers; and such scavengers, or their servants, shall, on such days, &c., sufficiently execute and perform all such works and duties as they respectively are employed or contract to execute or perform; and if such company or persons fail in any respect properly to execute or perform, &c., they shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l*.

Sect. 126. Any occupier of any house or land, or other person who refuses or does not permit any soil, dirt, ashes, or filth to be taken away by the scavengers, &c., shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5*l*.

Sect. 127. All dirt, dust, night soil, ashes, and rubbish collected as aforesaid, shall be the property of such vestry or board, &c.

Sect. 128. In case any scavenger be required by the owner or occupier of any house or land to remove the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business, or of any building materials, such owner or occupier shall pay to the scavenger a reasonable sum for such removal, such sum, in case of dispute, to be settled by two justices.

Sect. 129. If any dispute or difference of opinion arise between the owner or occupier of any such house or land, and the scavenger required to remove such refuse, as to what shall be considered as refuse, it shall be lawful for any two justices, upon application made to them by either of the parties in difference, to determine whether the subject-matter is or is not refuse of trade, manufacture, or business, or of any building material; and in every such case the decision of such justices shall be final and conclusive.

The appellant was a scavenger within the meaning of the 125th section.

The respondent was a pianoforte manufacturer, occupying for the purposes of his manufacture extensive works within the parish.

The respondent used a 25-horse power steam engine, which consumed about one ton of coals a day. The ashes from these coals had been kept in a separate ashpit, and not mixed with any other materials. They had never been removed during the respondent's occupation, he refusing to pay for such removal, whilst the appellant required him to do so under sect. 128.

The steam engine was used for the purposes of respondent's business as manufacturer, as a motive power.

The respondent contended that the ashes were not refuse within the meaning of sects. 128 and 129, which refuse must consist wholly or in part of the things consumed in the manufacture or business.

The appellant contended that the words included all refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business.

It was admitted that the ashes of coal burnt in bakers' ovens had always been removed by scavengers without payment.

The magistrate decided in favour of the respondent, but stated this case, with the consent of the parties, in order to have the decision of the Superior Court, the decisions of the metropolitan magistrates on the point being conflicting.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was: Whether ashes produced in the manner stated in the case are or are not in point of law the refuse of a trade, manufacture, or business, within the meaning of the said Act.

Day, Q.C. and Rose, for the appellant.—The scavenger is bound to remove the ashes, but he is not bound to assist a tradesman to carry on his business by doing so free of expense. The question was decided in Lyndon v. Standbridge (28 L. J. 386, Ex.).

Herschell, Q.C. and Tickell, for the respondent.—The ashes here merely arise from a fire on the premises. The premises stand on the same footing as those of bakers and hotels. Refuse means in the Act refuse of materials worked up in the business, and not refuse of such things as coals, which are destroyed by use. In Lyndon v. Standbridge there was no such obligation as here upon the occupier to permit the removal of refuse.

Day, Q.C. in reply.—Hotels and private houses cannot be distinguished. [Grove, J.—It is a question of degree. In some trades the refuse of the trade can hardly be distinguished from domestic ashes.] That is the distinction. If the two kinds were kept separate, the scavenger might object to remove the one without payment.

Grove, J.—I am of opinion that the appellants are entitled to our judgment. This is a case primis impressionis to some extent, because different opinions have been entertained on the subject by police magistrates, which is not to be wondered at. I think that these ashes come within the 128th section. The reason and object of the Act is that the refuse of the town is to be removed by the vestry or district board, or by persons contracting with them. The words of sect. 125 are,

"all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth," &c. that is, the general refuse of the town, shall be removed by the scavenger at the expense of the rates. No doubt, questions of degree might occur in the case of ordinary houses. The refuse of one house might, for various reasons, be greater than the refuse of another. Then comes sect. 128, the object of which seems to be this, that whereas persons in trade, manufacture, or business, create what may be termed substantial refuse, independent of domestic refuse, that shall not be thrown on the scavenger to be removed gratis. Such persons create the refuse for their own profit, and may cause it to be a nuisance to their fellow inhabitants, therefore it is right that they should pay for its removal. The word "refuse," in sect. 128, means all that is created by the trade itself, as distinguished from the ordinary refuse of the household. Then, looking at the facts of this case, I think the ashes are "the refuse of a trade or business." Of course, logically, there can be no refuse of a business, but only of something produced in or by the process of manufacture. I cannot see why refuse should be less applicable to the ashes caused in the operation than to the residuum or cast off portions of the materials. It appears to me that the refuse of coals used in producing power for a business are fairly within the meaning of the words used and the object of the statute. The scavenger is required to remove all refuse by sect. 126; it is not at his option. But you cannot call upon him to remove this unless you pay him something extra. I have no doubt that in this case the refuse is that of a "trade, manufacture or business" within the meaning of the Act. As to the business of the baker, of which the refuse is removed without charge, there is no decision on record. The liability in that business will have to be settled when it comes to be tried.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for substantially the same reasons. If we look at sect. 125 alone, it is clearly the duty of the scavenger to remove all ashes, and the inhabitants might call upon him to do so. But sect. 128 shows that, whatever is the true meaning of the word "refuse" there, it is something a scavenger is bound to remove under sect. 125. Then what is the just and reasonable construction of sect. 128? It is obvious that there are two classes of refuse contemplated—that which falls within the scavenger's contract, and certain extras, as it were, for which when removed he is entitled to be paid. Again, the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business may include two classes of matter. First, the refuse of the thing manufactured; and this is all the magistrates thought was intended by the section, though I think their construction of it too narrow. Secondly, the refuse of coal used for the purpose of the manufacture, which I think as much a refuse as the chips of wood which are thrown away.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Inclosure Act—Award—Rates for inclosure purposes—Remedy by distress or action.

A private inclosure Act gave the commissioners power by their award to direct by whom and in what manner certain necessary drainage works were to be made and maintained. The commissioners having directed by their award that the expenses of the said works should be paid by a rate to be levied and recovered by certain surveyors in the same manner as parish rates were by law recoverable in the parish, Held, that the rate must be recovered by distress and not by action.

THIS was an appeal from the County Court of Lincolnshire, who decided that the rate mentioned in the head note was properly recoverable by distress only.

Cave, Q.C. and Horace Smith, for the plaintiff, a surveyor.—Though an action will not lie for a poor-rate, yet where a statute imposes a duty, an action will lie for the breach of it: (Underhill v. Ellicombe, McC. & Y. 450.) Where a local Act empowered commissioners to detain a ship for non-payment of tolls, the right of action was not taken away: (Goody v. Penny, 9 M. & W. 687.) Again, where certain duties were required to be paid by ship-owners, and on non-payment the ships were to stand charged with payment of the same, a remedy was allowed either by action or distress: (Shepherd v. Hills, 11 Ex. 55.) An action is the common law remedy where no other is provided:

Kingsford for the defendant, a ratepayer.—The rate is to be levied as a parish rate, for which no action will lie: (Stevens v. Evans, 2 Burr. 1152; 1 Wms. Black 284.)

Cave, Q.C. in reply, cited B. v. Cottingham (6 T. Rep. 20.)

GROVE, J.—In this case an action was brought in the County Court to recover the amount of a rate made under an award of commissioners purporting to be in pursuance of powers given by an Act of 36 Geo. 3, for inclosing certain fields, &c., in the Lordship of Hibaldstowe, Lincolnshire. By that Act, p. 20, the commissioners were "empowered and required by their said award to order and direct by whom, at whose expense, at what time, and in what manner the said brooks, ditches, drains, water-courses, tunnels, water-gates, banks and bridges shall be made, and thereafter repaired, cleansed, scoured and maintained." By their award the commissioners provided that such cleansing, repairing, maintaining, &c., should be paid by a rate to be made by two surveyors (elected in manner provided for), and should "be levied and recovered by such ways and means as parish rates or assessments are by law recovered within the said parish." It was contended on behalf of the defendant that as a mode was pointed out by the award of enforcing the provisions in question, viz., in the same way as parish rates, i.e., by distress, no action would lie (Stevens v. Evans). For the plaintiff it was contended contra that, as the commissioners had no power given them by the Act to direct how the payment of rates was to be enforced, that portion of the award, if not more, was void and inoperative, and that therefore a remedy by action for breach of a statutory duty would lie. The judge held that, another mode of enforcing payment being provided by the award, an action would not lie, and nonsuited the plaintiffs. I am of opinion that the nonsuit was right. Though the words "in what manner the brooks, ditches, &c., shall be made and repaired," do not, grammatically construed, confer any power for prescribing how the rates for that purpose are to be enforced, it may, I think, not unreasonably be contended that the clause providing that the commissioners may order "by whom, and at whose expense, the said brooks, &c., are to be repaired and maintained," gives by a necessary implication a power to direct how their order is to be enforced. This argument receives some support from the sense in which the word "manner" is used in other parts of the statute. Thus at page 13 (the clauses are not numbered), where provisions are made for roads, it is said "the same," i.e., public bridle roads and footways, &c., "shall be made and erected, and at all times thereafter repaired, maintained, and kept in repair, either by a parochial rate or assessment, or by such person, or in such manner as the said commissioners shall direct and appoint." Here, the statute uses the words "in such manner" as alternative to the words "either by a parochial rate and assessment," obviously, as it seems to me, including in the word "manner" the manner in which the expenses shall be provided. But irrespective of this argument, or rather in addition to it, I am of opinion that the powers given to the commissioners at page 23 of the Act, where the provisions of the award are stated, and where the statute says it "shall also contain proper orders and directions for and concerning the laying out and making the public roads, and the breadth thereof, and for and concerning the laying out, making, maintaining, cleansing, and keeping in repair, of the private roads and ways, fences, ditches, banks, drains, bridges, gates and stiles hereby directed to be made; and by this Act mentioned, directed, required or authorised to be made or established, and such other orders, regulations, matters and things as shall be necessary or proper, conformably to the time, tenor, and meaning of this Act, for the more early, convenient and effectual execution thereof, and for the preventing all difficulties and disputes in relation to the matter herein contained." In this clause it appears to me the words "private roads" are only used in contradistinction to "public roads" mentioned in the previous sentence, and the words, "ways, fences, ditches, &c., are used generally for those provided for in the Act; if so, these words, and the words "such other orders, regulations, matters and things as shall be necessary or proper conformably to the true tenor and meaning of this Act, and for the more early, convenient, and effectual execution thereof," seems to me, taken as applied to the previous provisions in respect to these same matters, to give ample power to the commissioners to direct by their award the means of enforcing payment of rates, the making of which they have undoubtedly the power of ordering. If so, the mode prescribed in the award is within the power given by the Act, and excludes the remedy by action. I do not enter into any criticism of other portions of the Act and award not necessarily bearing upon the question before us, as the only point we have to decide is whether or not an action will lie. I do not dissent from my brother Denman's view that the rate being a creation of the award, and no action being authorised by the award, an action will not lie, but I prefer to rest my judgment on the ground above stated. We agree in the conclusion, viz., that the decision of the county court judge be affirmed.

DENMAN, J.—In this case the question left to the court by the County Court judge is whether an action will lie for a drainage rate assessed by surveyors elected under an award of 36 Geo. 3, for inclosing lands in the lordship of Hibaldstowe, in Lincolnshire. I think it is quite a sufficient answer to the contention of the appellant that the whole authority of the surveyors (that is, the plaintiffs in this case), whether to make or to levy a rate, is derived from the award. This is a part of the machinery provided by the award itself for carrying into effect the purposes of the Act, so far as the drainage is concerned. It has no existence from the mere provisions of the statute itself. This being so, I think it would be impossible to give effect to any act of theirs coming within the provisions of the award as to their power, except it be done in the mode pointed out by the award itself. The award, after directing that the drains, &c., shall from time to time, and at all times, be maintained by the surveyors to be elected annually by a majority of the proprietors and occupiers of land in Hibaldstowe respectively, proceeds as follows: "But such maintaining, &c., to be made by means of a rate, &c., which said rate shall be made by two surveyors so to be annually elected for the time being, and be levied and recovered by such ways and means as parish rates or assessments are by law recovered within the said parish." I think it impossible to give effect to the award, so far as to hold the surveyors entitled to make a rate, and at the same time to reject that part of the award which provides the only mode pointed out in the award by which that rate is to be recovered, viz., in the manner in which parish rates are by law recovered, that is, by distress. On the argument of the case other points were suggested besides that left to us by the learned County Court judge. Some of them are not free from difficulty, but I think it better to express no opinion upon them beyond this—that after an usage of seventy-four years from the date of the award I should feel it to be the duty of any court to be reluctant to hold, without conclusive reasons, that the commissioners had exceeded their power by such very reasonable provisions as those contained in the award as to the election of the surveyors, the making of the rate, and the provisions as to its recovery. As at present advised I see no ground for questioning the power of the surveyors to make a rate, and levy it by distress; but I wish only to be understood as deciding that the award must be taken as a whole, or that the same provision of it which creates the plaintiffs themselves as the persons to carry the Act into effect, gives them their powers subject to the restriction that the money required for their exercise is to be raised by a rate, and that rate levied by distress, and not by action.

On this ground I think the judgment of the learned County Court judge ought to be affirmed.

REG. v. J. F. BULL.

False pretences—Master and servant—Obtaining payment of wages due, by fraud.

The prisoner, on entering the service of a railway company, signed a book of rules, a copy of which was given to him. One of the rules was, "No servant of the company shall be entitled to claim payment of any wages due to him on leaving the company's service until he shall have delivered up his uniform clothing." On leaving the service he knowingly and fraudulently delivered up, as part of his uniform, to an officer of the company, a great coat belonging to a fellow servant, and so obtained the wages due to him.

Held, that he was properly convicted of obtaining the money by false pretences.

CASE stated for the opinion of this Court by the chairman of the Second Court of the Surrey Sessions.

At the general quarter session of the peace, holden by adjournment at St. Mary, Newington, in and for the county of Surrey on Wednesday, the 7th day of March 1877, John Frederick Bull was tried before me in the second court upon the following indictment.

Surrey. The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that John Frederick Bull, on the 13th Dec. in the year of our Lord 1876, unlawfully and knowingly did falsely pretend unto Samuel Clark, a station master in the employment of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, that the great coat which he the said John Frederick Bull then handed to the said Samuel Clark, was the same great coat and part of the uniform clothing which had been supplied to him the said John Frederick Bull by the said company. By means of which said false pretences the said John Frederick Bull did then unlawfully obtain from the said Samuel Clark one pound in money with intent to defraud. Whereas, in truth and in fact, the said great coat was not the same great coat, nor did it form part of the uniform clothing which had been supplied to him the said John Frederick Bull by the said company, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

The evidence adduced by the prosecution was as follows:

Albert Stuart.—I am clerk in the traffic manager's office of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company at London Bridge Station. It is part of my duty to give out books of our rules and regulations to persons on entering the company's service. I produce an application for a copy of the rules and a receipt for them, signed by the defendant and countersigned by myself. One of those rules is that no servant of the company shall be entitled to claim payment of any wages due to him on leaving the company's service until he shall have delivered up his uniform clothing. That rule is not one of the company's bye laws. Defendant entered the company's service 10th May 1875.

Samuel Clark.—I am station master at the Norwood Junction Station of the company, at which station the defendant is employed as a shunter at weekly wages. On the 22nd Dec. defendant gave me notice in writing of his intention to leave the service on the 29th. On the morning of the 30th he brought a portion of two suits of old uniform, consisting each of a jacket, vest, and trousers. I said, "Where's the greatcoat?" He replied, "Perhaps it may have been stolen" or words to that effect. He then went away, and returned in a few minutes with the coat produced. I asked him for his rule book, and he said he had never had one. I remarked it was very strange that a person who had been two years in the company's service should not have a rule book, and told him he must produce it before I paid him. He went away again, and in a few hours returned with the rule book, and believing all to be as he stated, I paid him his wages, amounting to 1*l*. It was owing to his having brought in his uniform and rule book, as I believed, that I paid him the 1*l*. The coat issued to the defendant has not been returned to me.

Samuel Hanmore.—I am a labourer in the company's service at Norwood Junction. On 30th Dec. I went into the lobby at breakfast time about eight, and seeing Bull there, said to him, "So, you're off this morning." He said, "Yes, but the governor won't pay me." I asked him, why? and he replied, "Because I haven't got all my clothes to send in," and I understood him to say he had lost his coat. He then picked up the coat produced, saying, "I'm not going to lose my wages for a coat, I shall take this," and he took it, adding that he had lent his own to some one at New Cross. He then went away. I can't say whose coat he took, but I have since heard that one was missing.

James Southwick.—I am a shunter at Norwood Junction, and had a coat issued to me as part of my uniform about ten months ago. I had it last on the 29th Dec. when, it being wet, I left it in the lobby to dry. Next morning I missed it and reported the loss. The coat produced is the one; it is numbered twelve.

This was the whole of the evidence for the prosecution.

The defendant, who was not represented by counsel, called

William Cayer, who proved that he was a shunter at Norwood Junction, and that some time before the defendant left, but the witness could not say how long, he told witness that some one had taken his dry coat out of his locker and put a wet one in its place, but that he never told the witness the number of his coat, and the witness did not know the number.

Upon this evidence I left the four following questions to the jury, viz.:

1. Did the defendant hand over the coat to the station master, knowing that it was not the coat supplied to him by the company?

2. Did he do so for the purpose of obtaining his wages from the station master, knowing it was necessary to do so before the wages could be obtained?

3. Did the station master believe that the coat was the one supplied to the defendant, and was it in consequence of that belief that the station master gave the wages to the defendant?

4. Did the defendant intend to defraud the railway company? And I directed them that if their answers to all four questions were in the affirmative, they ought to find the defendant guilty; but that if they answered any one of them in the negative, they should acquit him.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty; but as the defendant was undefended by counsel, and as I doubted whether my direction to the jury was right in point of law, I respited judgment, and allowed the defendant to go at large on bail, and I now state this case for the opinion of this honourable Court, whether on the above evidence the defendant was rightly convicted of obtaining money by false pretences.

If the Court should be of that opinion, the conviction is to be affirmed; if not, it is to be quashed.

of the Second Court.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. X

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

B. L. Moseley appeared for the prosecution.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is not necessary in this case to call on the counsel for the prosecution. It appears that the prisoner was in the service of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, and that it was one of the rules of that company, which were signed by the prisoner, that no servant of the company should be entitled to claim payment of any wages due to him on leaving the company's service until he should have delivered up his uniform clothing. The prisoner signed the rules, was aware of this rule, and in fact delivered up his copy of the rules on leaving the service. He gave notice to leave, and went to the station master, and gave up part of his uniform. The station master then asked him for his great coat. He went away, and some time afterwards brought one, and so obtained his wages. It turned out that the great coat belonged to another servant of the company, as the prisoner well knew. I take it that this was not an act of theft, but that he took it for the purpose of obtaining his wages. Now we must take it that it was part of his contract with the company that he was not to be entitled to the wages due to him on leaving the service until he had returned to the company all the articles of uniform that he received from the company. It is clear that the prisoner perpetrated a fraud on the officer of the company, and so got from him the money due to him; in other words, he obtained the money by the false pretence that the great coat he produced to the company's officer was the one he had received from them. The conviction will therefore be affirmed.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., MELLOR, J., GROVE, J., LINDLEY, J., and HAWKINS, J.)

REG. v. G. RICHARDS AND J. RICHARDS.

Accessories after the fact—Indicted with the principal—Murder—Manslaughter.

Four prisoners were indicted together for murder, and the indictment went on to charge two other prisoners with having, well knowing the other four to have committed the said murder, afterwards feloniously received and harboured them. On the trial the prisoners charged with murder were found guilty of manslaughter only, and the other two guilty of having been accessories after the fact to manslaughter.

Held, on motion in arrest of judgment, that the other two were properly found guilty upon this indictment as accessories after the fact to manslaughter.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this court by Cockburn, C.J.

The prisoners were tried before me at the last assizes for the county of Somerset, on an indictment, which after charging one George Baker, and three persons named George Hutchings, the elder, Giles Hutchings, and George Hutchings, the younger, with the wilful murder of one Nathaniel Cox, went on to charge the two prisoners George and James Richards with having, well knowing the said George Hutchings the elder, Giles Hutchings, and George Hutchings the younger, to have committed the said murder, afterwards feloniously received, comforted, harboured, assisted, and maintained them.

On the trial the prisoners charged with murder were found guilty of manslaughter.

The two Richardses were found guilty as accessories after the fact.

Whereupon it was objected in arrest of judgment that the prisoners being charged in the indictment as accessories after the fact to murder could not be found guilty of having been accessories after the fact to manslaughter.

I was of opinion that as according to the established law, the offence of manslaughter is involved in that of murder, and a person indicted for murder may be convicted under such an indictment of manslaughter, so a person charged as accessory to murder may be found guilty on such an indictment of having been accessory to manslaughter. But as the point appeared to have never before presented itself for decision I reserved it for the consideration of this court, and request their decision upon it.

A. E. COCKBURN.

H. T. Cole, Q.C., for the prisoners. It is submitted that the conviction cannot be sustained. The point has not been expressly decided, but there are some old cases bearing on the subject. Goff v. Byby and others (Cro. Eliz. 540), was the case not of an indictment but of an appeal for murder against divers persons, one as principal and the rest as accessories. The principal was found guilty of manslaughter only. The court held that the accessories before the fact ought to be discharged, for the verdict for the principal found that there was not any precedent intent to kill, but that the accessories after the fact should answer. [MELLOR, J.—Did not the declaration in appeal for murder set forth the indictment?] No, but as appears from Ashforth v. Thornton (1 B. & Ald. 405), it used similar terms. The case of Goff v. Byby as far as it goes is in favour of the prisoners. It was not until the recent statute 24 & 25 Vict., c. 94, s. 3, that an accessory after the fact could be indicted along with the principal. Sect. 3 enacts:

Whosoever shall become an accessory after the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any act passed or to be passed, may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory after the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal felon, or after the conviction of the principal felon; or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice, and may thereupon be punished in like manner as any accessory after the fact to the same felony, if convicted as an accessory, may be punished.

But for that enactment the Richardses could not have been indicted along with the principal. In Rez. v. Greenacre and Sarah Gale (8 Car. & P. 35), the two prisoners were indicted together, Greenacre for murder, and Gale, for that she, well knowing that the said Greenacre had committed the felony and murder aforesaid, feloniously did receive, harbour, and assist him. Tindal, C.J. in summing up said: "It will not be necessary in order to find the prisoner Gale guilty of the offence with which she is charged that the prisoner Greenacre should have been guilty of murder, but if he was guilty of another felony, viz., the offence of manslaughter, if she consorted with him, and knowing that he had committed the offence, assisted in any way to screen him from the hand of justice, it will be sufficient." No doubt the dictum of Tindal, C.J., is against the prisoners, but his ruling was not questioned. Great prejudices may arise to an accessory if he is liable to be convicted of manslaughter when indicted with his principal for murder. If there be a charge of murder against four persons, two of whom are arrested and the other two escape, and all four are included in the same indictment, and another person is also included therein as an accessory after the fact for harbouring the four principals, is the accessory liable to be tried twice, first with the two prisoners who are taken, and then again subsequently when the other two are taken? This seems very hard when the punishment of accessories under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 67, is taken into account. Sect. 67 provides:

In the case of every felony punishable under this Act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act (except murder), shall be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and every accessory after the fact to murder shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and whosoever shall counsel, aid, or abet the commission of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, shall be liable to be proceeded against, indicted, and punished as a principal offender."

So that not only may an accessory after be tried twice for the one act of harbouring, but he may be convicted and suffer two sentences. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The offence is of harbouring each person. Although the four persons are included in the indictment, the offence is separate as to each, and the accessory is an accessory as to each. [MELLOR, J.—According to your contention two could not be acquitted of the murder and found guilty of manslaughter, but it is on the ground that all are separate offenders, that two may be found guilty of manslaughter, and two of murder.] In such a case could the accessory on the second trial plead autrefois acquit or convict on the first trial as a bar to the second? [COCKBURN, C.J.—No; for if A., B., C. and D. be indicted for murder, and A. only be in custody, and tried, autrefois acquit or convict on A.'s trial would be no bar on the trial of B., C. or D.]

J. J. Hooper, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed that the conviction was right, and that the objection taken in arrest of judgment must fail. As to the difficulty of the accessory knowing how to plead upon being put upon his trial a second time, that was disposed of in the course of the argument. The harbouring of several offenders is a distinct offence of harbouring each of them, though the act may be of harbouring all jointly. That being so then comes the question upon which I entertain no doubt. Inasmuch as a man indicted for murder may be found guilty of manslaughter, so I think that an accessory either before or after the fact may be found guilty of being accessory either to the murder or to the minor offence of manslaughter of which the principal may be convicted. Indeed that proposition follows as a corollary. The conviction will, therefore be affirmed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case four persons were jointly indicted for murder, and the jury might have found each of them guilty of murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances. It follows that an accessory, according as the case turns out, is liable to be indicted in respect of every offence contained in the charge of murder, and as the offence of manslaughter is included in the indictment for murder, in respect of manslaughter as well as of murder, the offence charged.

[Ct. of App.]

NEWCOMEN v. COULSON.

[Ct. of App.]

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by E. S. ROCHER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before JESSEL, M.R., JAMES and BAGGALLAY, L.JJ.).

NEWCOMEN v. COULSON.

Right of way—Award under Inclosure Act—Agricultural uses—Extension of properties.

By a deed of award made in 1760, under an Act for the inclosure of common lands in East Cotham, it was provided that the owners of certain parallel strips, having a common boundary line on the east, should have and enjoy "a way, right, and liberty of passage for themselves and their respective tenants and farmers of the said lands and grounds, as well on foot as on horseback, as with their carts and carriages, and to lead and drive their horses, oxen, and other cattle as often as occasion should require," from their respective allotments to a certain highway at the north-east corner of the lands over the east ends of the allotments "doing as little damage to the soil, or the corn, grass, or herbage," as might be.

The owners of one of the allotments were now converting it into building land, and had begun making a metalled road near the east end of the adjoining plots.

In an action by the adjoining owner for an injunction.

Held (affirming the decision of Malins, V.C.), that the user was not restricted to agricultural purposes, and that the right was not lost by the division of the dominant tenement into parts. The right was a general right of way for all reasonable purposes, and the defendants were therefore entitled to fit it for the purposes for which it was now intended to be used.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C. An action had been entered claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting a bridge across a stream so as to rest upon or otherwise interfere with a piece of land belonging to the plaintiff situate at East Cotham, in the county of York, and from making a road upon the eastern boundary of the said piece of land, and from exercising any rights of ownership thereon, and from using the said piece of land otherwise than in accordance with their rights under an award made on the 23rd April 1760, whereby a right of road solely for agricultural purposes over the plaintiff's piece of land was given to the owner and owners for the time being of certain lands situate to the south of and adjoining the plaintiff's piece of land, and now occupied by the defendants, and for damages.

By the award of the 23rd April 1760, which was made under an Act of Parliament (32 & 33 Geo. 2) for inclosing and dividing the common fields of East Cotham, the commissioners allotted and assigned to Nathaniel Agar seven acres and four perches of land lying in the common, and the commissioners ordered and awarded that Nathaniel Agar and other persons therein named, and the owner and owners for the time being of the lands thereby allotted to them, should for ever thereafter have and enjoy a way, right, and liberty of passage for themselves and their respective tenants and farmers, of the said lands and grounds, as well on foot as on horseback, as with their carts and carriages, and to lead and drive their horses, oxen, and other cattle as often as occasion should require from the common highway, leading from Redcar to the north-east end of Robert Agar's allotment, and from thence to the old inclosures called West Dyke Closes, in, over, and through the east end of their respective allotments, without interruption or paying any consideration for the same, doing as little damage to the soil or the corn, grass, or herbage as might be; and that in case the said Nathaniel Agar or any of the other persons named, or any of the owner or owners for the time being of their respective allotments, should street out the same way leading through their allotments the same should be made, and for ever remain, eleven yards broad at the least between the quicksets, but such way was not, nor was intended to be, admitted to be a right of way for any other person or persons whomsoever than as aforesaid. The defendants were the purchasers of land called the West Field, being part of the seven acres originally allotted to Nathaniel Agar, and they had recently laid out the said lands for building sites and intended to erect thereon a number of houses, and for the accommodation of such houses it was the defendants' intention to build a bridge over the stream, and to construct a macadamised road or street upon that portion of the land over which the beforementioned right of way was granted by the award.

The plaintiff was the lord of the manor and owner of the land adjoining that of the defendants, and his contention was that such right of way was intended only for agricultural purposes, and could not mean a paved road or street for the convenience of houses erected upon the allotments.

Upon a motion in the court below that the interim injunction, which had been granted, should be continued in the terms of the prayer as far as regarded the right of way, the question as to the right of building the bridge being given up by the defendants for the purposes of the motion;

The Vice-Chancellor considered that this was not like the case of a right of way or easement where there was a dominant and servient tenement, but a right of way over inclosed common land expressly awarded under the powers of an Act of Parliament. The right of the allottees was to use the road for their horses and cattle, carts, and carriages, passing from the common highway to the land in question. At the time of the award the land was used only for agricultural purposes, but the allottees had full right to build houses, if they thought fit, upon their own land, and their tenants had, as usual, a right to use the road as they had. The award contained nothing about agricultural purposes, but it was a right of way for all purposes for which a road was required, and there certainly was nothing in the award by which the parties using it could be prevented from laying down the most approved materials in modern use for the construction of roads over which horses and carriages were to pass. He, therefore, refused the injunction as to the road, but the interim order would be continued as to the bridge.

The plaintiff appealed.

Higgins, Q.C. and Proctor, for the appellant, contended that the right of way was given solely for agricultural purposes, and that as the land had now been applied to new purposes, and had become severed, the owners of the severed portions could no longer exercise the right of way. Even admitting there was a right of way to each house, still the grant would not extend to entering upon the allotments for the purpose of laying down a metalled road. At all events, assuming the defendants had such a right, they were preparing to make their road before it was required, and were thus interfering with a valuable right of property in the enjoyment of which the plaintiff ought to be protected.

The following cases were referred to:

Glasse, Q.C. and W. W. Karslake for the respondents, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think that this appeal cannot be maintained. The first question to be considered is what is the effect of the grant. Now, when you come to look at it, though not very artificially worded, you must consider what the nature of the rights of the parties to the grant were. It is, in fact, an old inclosure, and this is the way they carried out the inclosure in former times. All the allottees are parties to the deed, and then we find this: "That the commissioners do order, award, direct and appoint that the allottees"—naming them, beginning with Turner and the rest—"and the owners and owner for the time being of the lands thereby to them respectively allotted in the said upper half acre, shall for ever hereafter have and enjoy the way, right, and liberty of passage for themselves and for their respective tenants and farmers, of the same lands and grounds as well as on foot, as on horseback, as with their carts and carriages, and to lead and drive their horses, oxen, and other cattle as often as occasion shall require"—from one point to another point—"doing as little damage to the soil, corn, grass, and herbage thereof as may be"—that is, the people who use the way. Then there is a power to "stretch out the same way leading through their said respective allotments so that the same shall be made, and ever after remain eleven yards broad at the least, and every part thereof between these points, but such way is not nor is intended to be admitted to be a right of way for any other person or persons whomsoever than as aforesaid." The first point made was this: It was said, it being a grant to the owners and owner for the time being of the lands, that if the lands became severed, the owners of the several portions could not exercise the right of way. I am of opinion that the law is quite clear the other way. Where the grant is in respect of the lands and not in respect of the person, it is severed when the lands are severed; that is, it goes with every part of the severed lands. That I should have thought was clear and well settled law, and consequently, when you find a grant in this shape, "to the owners and owner for the time being of the lands," it gives a right of way to the owner for the time being of every part of the land. That this is clear on principle I think is obvious to any one who considers the nature of the property. It never could have been imagined for a moment, in the case of an award like this, that the property should not be divided in any shape or way; nor is it to be contended that if a man died and left two or three daughters co-heiresses the right of way was lost, and that their allotments of the estate, which might be behind other allotments intervening between them and the highway, would be for ever deprived of all access whatsoever to the highway. Of course such a proposition is extravagant. But in addition to that I think the case is fairly covered by authority. In the first place there is the case of Harris v. Drew (2 Barn. & Ad. 164). That was a grant of a right to a pew by a faculty, and it was granted in this way: "To John Emery and his family for ever, and the owners and occupiers of the said messuage exclusively of all other persons." The plaintiff Harris occupied one room, part of the old house, which he had thrown into the new house; that is, he had converted a summer-house attached to the old house into a house, and had thrown in one room of the old house. But it was held that he had a right of action in respect of his occupation of one room, part of the old house. Lord Tenterden says: "The plaintiff was the occupier of the summer-house and of one room which was part of the old dwelling house. The faculty gave the right to the several persons who should be occupiers of the messuage to use the pew." And then Justice Littledale says: "I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff having a right by the faculty to use the pew, the churchwardens had no right to interfere as they did and were wrongdoers. It may certainly happen that, in consequence of a house being sub-divided, three or four families may become entitled to use the pew belonging to the original messuage." In that case there are the very words, "owners and occupiers." The same point in another shape came before the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Codling v. Johnson (9 Barn. & Cr. 933). The marginal note is: "Where in trespass quare clausum fregit defendant prescribed in a que estate for a right of way over the locus in quo, and it appeared that the defendant's land had within fifty years been part of a large common and afterwards inclosed under the provisions of an Act of Parliament and allotted to the defendant's ancestor, held that, notwithstanding this evidence, the right claimed by the defendant's plea might in law exist, and the jury having found that in fact it did

NEWCOMEN v. COULSON.

exist, the court refused to disturb the verdict." Now, Mr. Justice Bayley says this: "It appears by the report that the jury were satisfied of the existence of this immemorial right of way. Suppose this land to have been part of the waste before the inclosure, then the lord might have the right for himself and his tenants to use the way, and then each person having allotments under the inclosure would have the right of way." Though you parcelled out the waste into an immense number of allotments, every allottee would have a right of way. It seems to me, therefore, both on principle and authority, that we must decide against the appellant. The next point made was this: It was said that this must mean a right to use the way only as long as the allotment was used for agricultural purposes. I cannot find anything of the kind here. The right is to "the owner and owners for the time being of the lands." Now, "land," according to English law, includes everything on the soil. You are the owner of the land if you put a building on it, or, as the Lord Justice reminds me, if you sink a coal mine under it. Therefore, it is not the owner even of the thing described as an agricultural field, though it might have been such at that time. Therefore he is still the owner of the land, though he builds a house, or, as it is said here, twenty-six houses on the land, and every owner of each house, with the soil on which it stands, would be an owner of part of the lands; and it is a grant to "the owner and owners thereof for the time being of the lands" allotted, that is, to the owner of every part of the land, and consequently to the owner of the house. I think that disposes of that objection. There is not a word in the grant to restrict it in any shape or way, and it could hardly be contended, irrespective of the technical meaning of the word "land," that in making this award the people imagined that, at no time thereafter, would any man erect on any part of these large allotments (which I see include old inclosures) any labourers' cottages or any house or dwelling of any kind, or even a stable for his horses. Of course such a thing must naturally have been in the contemplation of the parties, and I have no doubt that the word "land" is used advisedly. This being so, it appears to me the right is a general right of way—a right of way to all the houses which may be built on the land in question. Then it is said there are words to say that they shall not do more damage to the soil, corn, grass, &c., than may be. That obviously is put in for this reason. You may use the way without its being set out. There is a clause enabling you to set out—"to street out," it is called in the deed—but if you do not set it out, it means you shall only go from point to point in the shortest way, and as conveniently as may be, and you shall not walk over the field and damage the corn and grass more than is necessary. It appears to me these words by no means limit the right of the grantee to use the way for all reasonable purposes. Then the next point on it was this. It was said, "Admitting you have the right of way even to each house, still you have no right to enter upon the property of the plaintiff and of the allotments over which the right of way is granted for the purpose of laying down a metalled road." Now, as to that, it was conceded that the principle of law is that the grantee of a right of way has a right to enter upon the land of the grantor over which the way extends for the purpose of making the grant effective—that is, so as to enable him to exercise the right granted to him. That includes not only the right of repairing—that is, keeping the road in repair—but the right of making a road. If you grant to me over a field a right of carriage way to my house, I may enter on to your field, and make into a carriage way such portions of that which was a field as will be sufficient to support a carriage and horses and the ordinary traffic of a carriage way; otherwise the grant would be of no use to me, because my carriage would sink up to the naves of the wheels in a week or two of wet weather in the middle of the field. It cannot be contended that the word "repair" used in such a case is limited to making good the defect in the original soil by subsidence or washing away by the weather; but it must include the right of making it into an effectual road which can be used for the purpose for which it is granted. Therefore I think the defendants have a right to make an effectual carriage way, going, as they are going, by the shortest route, and not interfering to a greater extent in width than the width of the street pointed out by the deed itself. The last point was this: It was said, "Assuming the defendant has such a right, at all events he has not that right now; he has not yet completely built his house or houses; they are only in process of building, and he is preparing to make his road before it is wanted—that is in anticipation of the house being built." As to that it appears to me that you must look at it in a reasonable way. If a man is building a house or houses, and he wants carts or carriages to go along it either to carry bricks and things for the actual building, or even with a view to the use of the inhabitants of the house when built, it is not reasonable to say, he is to wait till the last moment till his house is built and completed and somebody is going to inhabit it, and put them to the intermediate inconvenience of not having the use of the road to drive up to the house door. That does not appear to me to be reasonable. The reasonable thing is, that he may shortly, and by way of anticipation, do that which he would have, according to this agreement, the right to do the moment the house was completed. But there is an additional answer to that argument, and it is this, that it would not be a ground for an injunction. If the man is about completing the house, and it is admitted would have the right to make the road as soon as it was completed, the intermediate damage must be of the most trifling description. It must be the deprivation for that short time, not of the use of the grass because there is a carriage way over it, but of the value of the grass which would grow over the road which was continually traversed by men, horses, and carriages. To say a shilling damage would be too much—would be something, I think, very excessive indeed; and it is certainly not a case in which the court will interfere by injunction at all, nor was it really put on that ground. I must say it was argued that the plaintiff had a right of property—a valuable right of property—to protect, which was being interfered with. For these reasons it appears to me that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor ought to be upheld.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to what was read from the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, about its not being an easement, I think there must be some mistake in the report, or some slip in it. It is an easement, and our judgment is based on that fact. Those rights which the Master of the Rolls has declared to belong to the defendants (and I fully concur with him), those rights belong to the defendants as the owners of an easement—as the owners of the dominant tenement, as against the owner of the servient tenement. As to forming a substantial carriage road, I agree with the Master of the Rolls. The case is not in my opinion one-tenth part as strong or as difficult as Dando v. Kingcote, on which we are told the Vice-Chancellor proceeded.

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. MIDDLESEX JUSTICES; Re SLADE.

REG. v. MIDDLESEX JUSTICES; Re SLADE

Mandamus to hear appeal—Conviction quashed on point of form—Whether jurisdiction declined by quarter sessions—"Palimstry or otherwise"—5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4.

By 5 Geo. 3, c. 83, s. 4, "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on" any of Her Majesty's subjects, "shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond" within the true intent and meaning of that Act, and may be committed by a justice of the peace to prison for three months.

S. having been convicted under the above statute, the conviction set out that he had used certain craft, &c., which craft was that he wrote words upon a slate, which he pretended to be written by the spirit of a certain person deceased, to deceive L. and D.; but the conviction omitted the words "by palmistry or otherwise," and was quashed by quarter sessions on that account.

Held, that it was a question for the sessions to determine whether the omission of the words rendered the conviction bad, and a rule for a mandamus to enter continuances discharged.

THIS was a rule calling upon the justices for the county of Middlesex to show cause why a mandamus "should not issue directed to them commanding them to enter or cause to be entered continuances from session to session to the next general quarter sessions of the peace in and for the county of Middlesex, upon the appeal of Henry Slade against a certain conviction under the hand and seal of Frederick Flowers, Esq., a stipendiary magistrate of the Bow-street Police Court, bearing date Oct. 31st, "whereby the said Henry Slade was convicted for that he on the 15th Sept. did unlawfully use certain subtle craft, means, and device to deceive and impose on certain of her Majesty's subjects, to wit, Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin, and at such next general quarter sessions, to hear and determine the merits of the said appeal.

The following is an extract from the statute 5 Geo. c. 83, upon which the conviction was founded:

Sect. 4. "Every person committing any of the offences hereinbeforementioned [i. e. refusing to maintain himself when able, hawking without licence, begging in the public streets, &c.] after having been convicted as an idle and disorderly person; every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose upon any of his Majesty's subjects; every person wandering abroad and lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied building, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in any cart or waggon, not having any visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of himself . . . shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond within the true intent and meaning of this Act. And it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit such offender to the House of Correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding three calendar months."

The following was the conviction appealed against, and from it will sufficiently appear the nature of the offence charged:

Metropolitan Police District to wit.—Be it remembered that on the 31st of Oct. A.D. 1876, at the Bow-street Police Court, in the County of Middlesex, and within the Metropolitan Police District, Henry Slade is convicted before me, the undersigned, one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the police court aforesaid, of being a rogue and vagabond within the intent and meaning of the statute made in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, King George IV., intitled an Act for the punishment of idle and disorderly persons and rogues and vagabonds in that part of Great Britain called England (that is to say). For that the said Henry Slade, on the 15th of Sept. 1876, at No. 8, Upper Bedford-place, in the county and district aforesaid, did unlawfully use certain subtle craft, means, and device, which subtle craft, means, and device were that the said Henry Slade did then and there write on a certain slate then and there produced by the said Henry Slade, certain words purporting to be, and which he intended to represent to Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin as being words written on the said slate by the spirit of a certain person then deceased, to wit, Allie, the alleged deceased wife of the said Henry Slade, to deceive and impose on certain of Her Majesty's subjects, to wit, the said Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin, then and there being, and for which said offence the said Henry Slade is ordered to be committed to the House of Correction at Coldbath Fields, in the County of Middlesex, there to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months.

The following notice of appeal had been duly given:

Take notice that Henry Slade, of 8, Upper Bedford-place, Russell-square, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, intends to enter and prosecute an appeal to the next general sessions of the peace to be holden at Westminster, in and for the county of Middlesex, against a certain conviction dated on or about the 31st day of October, 1876, and made by Frederick Flowers, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace of the said county of Middlesex, whereby the said Henry Slade was convicted of having committed such offence as in the said conviction when drawn up shall or may appear. And further, take notice that the grounds of the said appeal are that the said Henry Slade is not guilty of the said offence, and also that the said magistrate had no jurisdiction in the said case, and also that the substance of the information or complaint was not stated to the defendant, nor was he asked if he had any cause to show why he should not be convicted, and also that the said Henry Slade was convicted without proper evidence having been heard after the said defendant was called upon to plead to the said charge.

At the hearing before the stipendiary magistrate he went fully into the facts and convicted the defendant as above set forth. But when the appeal came on to be heard the Assistant Judge ruled that the conviction was bad in law, inasmuch as the words "by palmistry or otherwise" were omitted. An offer by the court to amend the conviction by the insertion of the words was refused by the counsel for the prosecution and an application by the counsel for the prosecution for a special case was refused by the court; and, without evidence having been heard on the facts, the Assistant Judge delivered a judgment in open court, to which the other magistrates made no objection, to that effect.

Massey for the defendant (Bealey with him), now showed cause. — In the first place there is no conviction in existence, in consequence of the decision of the stipendiary magistrate having been reversed on appeal. If, therefore, this rule should be made absolute, there would be nothing upon which the mandamus could operate. The order of justices reversing the conviction ought to have been brought up on certiorari and marked, as a preliminary step to the mandamus :

Reg. v. Dayman, 7 E. & B. 672 ;

Reg. v. Brown, 7 E. & B. 757 ;

Reg. v. Worcestershire Justices, 3 E. & B. 477 ;

Reg. v. Monmouthshire Justices, 7 D. & E. 384.

[PER CURIAM.—This rule for a mandamus might have been granted in the alternative; in any case we have the power to amend it, and should be disposed to do so if necessary.] Secondly, the justices have in fact exercised their jurisdiction, and this being so, their decision, whether right or wrong, cannot be questioned by this court. [For this he further cited the cases above.] There is no precedent to be found in the books of the court granting a mandamus in circumstances similar to these. And, however great the amount of evidence which might have been taken, the decision of the justices would have been the same on the point of law. Thirdly, the decision of the justices was right. [Upon this point he was stopped by the court.]

Staveley Hill, Q.C. (with him Cooper), in support of the rule, argued that the matter upon which the justices decided was preliminary only to the exercise of their jurisdiction. If this be so, all the authorities show that this court will grant a mandamus to hear and determine :

Reg. v. Carnarvonshire Justices, 3 Q. B. 325 ;

Reg. v. Yorkshire Justices, 5 B. & Ad. 667.

[PER CURIAM.—About the rule there is no doubt, but we cannot see the application of it to the present case.] He then proceeded to urge that the decision was not the decision of the majority of the Court of Quarter Sessions, but Herschell, Q.C., who appeared for the Assistant Judge, objected that the point was not open, as it had been one of the grounds upon which the rule was applied for, but the rule had been refused so far as that ground was concerned. [MELLOR, J.—Until I looked at the statute (a) I was of opinion that the assistant-judge had a greater power than the statute gives him. By the statute,

(a) 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71. By this Act, sect. 8, the Crown has power to appoint a person being a serjeant-at-law or barrister-at-law of not less than ten years' standing, and in the commission of the peace for the county, to be the "assistant-judge" of Middlesex Sessions, "which said assistant-judge shall preside at the hearing of all appeals, and at the trial of all felonies and misdemeanours." By sect. 9 "the presence of another justice of the peace shall not be essential to the formation of the court in those cases in which it is directed by the Act that the assistant-judge shall preside; but nothing in the Act contained shall lessen the jurisdiction of the justices at the said sessions."

however, he presides, and delivers judgment as a matter of convenience, and if the other members of the court do not object to the judgment which he delivers, that judgment must be taken to be the judgment of the whole court. LUSH, J.—The same rule obtains with the judgment of this court.] That may be, because the judgments of this court cannot be reviewed on such a point, whereas it might be otherwise in the case of judgments of an inferior court.

MELLOR, J.—I have come to the conclusion that this court cannot interfere with the decision of the justices by granting a mandamus to rehear the appeal. The rule has been clearly stated in the argument to be that a mandamus will be granted to justices where, having jurisdiction, they decline to exercise it on a preliminary point, but that no mandamus will be granted unless the jurisdiction be declined. Now in this case there was no declining of jurisdiction. The objection was made that the conviction was bad, because it did not disclose an offence within the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 84. At that point, no doubt, the magistrates might have amended the conviction, and I think that they were wrong in not doing so. However, they deliberately declined to amend, and gave judgment, quashing the conviction as it stood, coming to the conclusion, erroneous as I am inclined to think, that the conviction was wrong. The prudent course would have been to grant a case for the opinion of this court, but they refused to do so, and for this refusal they are not amenable to our jurisdiction. They simply come within the rule that, having exercised a jurisdiction of their own, we cannot, looking to the authorities on the point, review their decisions, whether by certiorari, mandamus, or otherwise.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I own I arrive at this conclusion with great reluctance, as I am not sure that the judicial mind was applied to the substantial question in this case. I do not think that the omission of the words "by palmistry or otherwise" made any difference. If they had been inserted, the question would still have arisen whether an offence within the terms of the statute, as the means set out in the conviction as having been used cannot be said to be comprehended in the term palmistry, or to be of the nature of palmistry. However, the assistant judge has decided that the conviction was bad on the face of it, and this decision must be taken by us to have been concurred in by the court over which he presides, and cannot be reviewed by us. This rule, therefore, must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. LAWRENCE.

False pretences — Spiritualism — Existing fact —
24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88.

Defendant was convicted of attempting to obtain money upon the false pretences that he had power to communicate with the spirits of deceased and other persons, although such persons were not present in the place where he then was; and also

Q.B. Div.]

GRECE (app.) v. HUNT (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

that he had power to produce and cause to be present, such spirits as aforesaid in a materialized or other form; and also that divers musical instruments, by the sole means of such spirits so caused to be present, produced musical and other sounds.

Held, upon a writ of error, that the defendant was thereby charged with falsely pretending an existing fact; and that the indictment so alleging the false pretence was good and valid within the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

THIS was a writ of error upon an indictment for false pretences against Wm. Lawrence, who was convicted of an attempt to obtain the prosecutor's money under the second count, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment at the Middlesex Sessions, before Mr. Edlin, Q.C., the Assistant-Judge, and other justices.

The first count of the indictment was as follows:

Middlesex to wit. The jurors of our lady the Queen, upon their oath, present that Wm. Lawrence, on the 15th Oct. A.D. 1876, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, did falsely pretend to one, James Brooks Hulbert, that he, the said Wm. Lawrence, then had power to communicate with the spirits of deceased and other persons, although such persons were not present in the place where he, the said Wm. Lawrence, then was; and also that he, the said Wm. Lawrence, had power to summon, produce, and cause to be present in the place where he, the said Wm. Lawrence then was, such spirits as aforesaid in a materialized or other form; and also that divers musical instruments, to wit, tambourines and banjos, and divers bells, by the sole means of such spirits, summoned, produced, and caused to be present by him, the said Wm. Lawrence's power, produced musical and other sounds, by means of which said false pretences the said Wm. Lawrence did then unlawfully obtain from the said James Brooks Hulbert the sum of 1s. of the moneys of the said James Brooks Hulbert, with intent to defraud. Whereas in truth and in fact the said Wm. Lawrence had not power to communicate with the spirits of deceased and other persons, although such persons were not then in the place where he, the said Wm. Lawrence, then was; and whereas, in truth and in fact, the said Wm. Lawrence had not power to summon, produce, or cause to be present in the place where he, the said Wm. Lawrence then was, in a materialized, or other form, such spirits as aforesaid. And whereas, in truth and in fact, the said musical instruments and bells did not by the sole means of spirits of such persons summoned, produced, and caused to be present by him, the said Wm. Lawrence's power, produce musical and other sounds, as he, the said Wm. Lawrence, well knew at the time he so falsely pretended as aforesaid, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

The second count similarly alleged the same false pretence on the 20th Oct. 1876, whereby the said William Lawrence attempted to obtain the sum of one shilling from the said James Brooks Hulbert with intent to defraud.

The third and fourth counts alleged conspiracies to defraud, which were quashed by the court of quarter sessions.

Ignatius Williams argued for the defendant.—The objection to this indictment is that the pretence alleged is a mere matter of opinion, about which it is impossible to obtain proof. There must be a false pretence of a present or past fact; a promissory pretence to do some act is not within the statute. The pretended power to produce the spirits of deceased and other persons not present in a materialized or other form is a matter of general controversy, and has not yet been shown to be impossible by demonstration. Evidence was submitted that many persons doubted about the cause of the results admittedly produced by the defendant.

Cooper appeared for the prosecution.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is not necessary to hear any argument in support of the indictment, for it seems to me to be a perfectly clear case. The pretence alleged is that the defendant then had power to communicate with the spirits of the deceased and other persons, although such persons were not present in the place where the defendant then was, and also that the defendant had power to produce and cause to be present such spirits as aforesaid in a materialized or other form, and also that divers musical instruments, by the sole means of such spirits so caused to be present, produced musical and other sounds. The jury have found that the pretence of having this power was false, and with the evidence, facts, or other findings we have nothing whatever to do. The only question for us is whether the indictment can be sustained, and we have no doubt that the pretence as alleged is one within the statute. It would be very mischievous if it were supposed that money could be obtained upon such pretences as these, and that there could be a doubt about the remedy.

MELLOE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Williams' point is that the offence charged is not within the enactment in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88, the false pretence being required to be of an existing fact. The defendant states as a fact that he has power to do these various things, and the jury have found the statement to be false. We are only now on the form of the indictment, and I think it discloses a pretence of an existing fact.

GRECE (app.) v. HUNT (resp.).

Local board—Expense of sewerage private street—Works of private improvement—Private improvement expenses—Notice of apportionment—Demand of payment—Period of limitation for summary recovery—11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 69, 90; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, ss. 62, 63.

An urban sanitary authority executed sewerage and other works in a street not being a highway, after due notice, as provided by sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, and apportioned the expenses upon the respondent and other owners of the premises adjoining. The notice of apportionment was served upon the respondent on the 12th April 1875, by which the appellant, the clerk to the said authority, gave notice, amongst other things that the amount of the proportion of the expenses to be paid by the respondent, as settled by the surveyor, was 22l. 7s. This apportionment was not disputed by the respondent, and the expenses were never declared to be private improvement expenses. On the 31st July 1875, the appellant requested the respondent to pay the apportioned amount within fourteen days. On the 31st Jan. 1876, the appellant took summary proceedings to recover the amount, but the justices decided that the period of limitation for such proceedings was passed.

GRECE (app.) v. HUNT (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Held, upon a case stated, that sect. 62 of the Local Government Act 1858 requires a demand of payment not merely for expenses, which are technically private improvement expenses but also for all expenses incurred under the Act of 1848; that a notice of apportionment is not such a demand; and that these proceedings were taken in time, within 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.

This was a case stated by six of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the borough of Reigate, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

1. At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, in Reigate, in and for the borough of Reigate, in the county of Surrey, on the 15th May 1876, a complaint preferred by Clair James Grece, the clerk to the Urban Sanitary Authority (hereinafter called the "appellant"), against Henry John Hunt (hereinafter called the "respondent"), under sect. 150 of the Act 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, charging for that a certain street called the Earlswood-road, not being a highway, was not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Reigate (being by their council the local board for the said borough), and such board did, by notice in writing to the respective owners of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon the said street, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel the same within a time specified in such notice; and that such notice not having been complied with, the said local board did execute the works mentioned or referred to therein, and that the expenses incurred by them in so doing, payable by the respondent according to the frontage of his premises, in such proportion as had been settled by the surveyor, were the sum of 22*l.* 7*s.*, which sum had been lawfully demanded of the respondent as being such owner before and at the time when the said works were completed, but the respondent had neglected and refused to pay the same, was heard and determined by the said justices, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing they dismissed the said complaint.

2 and 3. And whereas the said appellant, being dissatisfied with this determination, as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied to the said justices to state and sign a case, they, in compliance with the said application, stated and signed the following case:

4. Upon the hearing of the complaint the said justices found as facts:

The appellants (who appeared by their clerk) are the council of the said borough, being the urban sanitary authority for the district of the borough of Reigate.

The respondent was, in the year 1873, and hath since continued the owner of certain premises abutting upon a private street, within the district aforesaid called Earlswood-road.

That a notice, dated 7th March 1873, was on the 8th March 1873, duly served on the respondent (as well as the other owners of property abutting upon the said street) requiring the owners to level, pave, and sewer the said private street.

That such notice not having been complied with, the said urban sanitary authority did execute the works mentioned or referred to therein.

That on the completion of such works the surveyor to the said urban sanitary authority apportioned the expenses which had been incurred by the said urban sanitary authority, and a notice of apportionment bearing date 12th April 1875, of which the following is a copy, was duly served on the respondent on the 13th April 1875.

Copy of Notice of Apportionment.

No 87 on plan. To Henry John Hunt, of Station-road, Redhill, in the county of Surrey.

Whereas, the local board for the district of the borough of Reigate, in the county of Surrey, by notices in writing pursuant to the statutes in that behalf made and provided bearing date 7th March 1873, required you and others the owners of premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon a certain street called Earlswood-road, within the said borough, to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel the same within the time and in the manner mentioned and specified in the said notices and according to the plans and sections deposited at the office of the said local board.

And whereas, the said notices not having been complied with by you within the time limited in that behalf, the said local board has executed the works mentioned or referred to therein.

And whereas the expenses incurred by the said local board in so doing amount to the sum of 638*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*

And whereas, John Henry Cole Bowen Hornbrook, the surveyor to the said local board, has settled the proportions of the said expenses to be paid by the owners in default according to the frontages of their respective premises.

Now, therefore, the said local board hereby gives you notice that the amount of the proportion of the said expenses to be paid by you according to the frontage of of your premises upon the said street as so settled by the said surveyor is 22*l.* 7*s.*

Given under my hand this 12th April 1875. By order of the said local board.

CLAUDE J. GRECE,

Town Clerk and Clerk to the said Local Board.

The said justices also found that the respondent did not give written notice to the appellant that he disputed such apportionment within three months from the date of service of the notice of apportionment, as prescribed by the statute in that behalf.

That the said urban sanitary authority did not resolve and declare the said expenses should be private improvement expenses.

That the appellant, on the 31st July 1875, caused a copy of the notice annexed, marked B., being as follows:

Sir,—The apportionment made by the borough surveyor of the costs of executing the works of improvement to the road, of which you have had notice, having now become binding and conclusive, I have to request you to pay £ , the sum assessed upon you, to the treasurer, Mr. Wm. Stenning, of Brighton-road, Redhill, within fourteen days from this day, whose receipt will be your discharge.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

CLAUDE J. GRECE,

Town Clerk.

Redhill, Surrey, 31st July, 1875.

To

to be served on the respondent, his name, and the amount due from him being filled in in accordance with the apportionment of expenses made by the surveyor.

That the respondent failed to pay the amount assessed upon him, and the appellant, on the 31st Jan. 1876, made the complaint hereinbefore referred to before Sir Valentine Fleming, Knight, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said borough.

5. It was contended, on the part of the respondent, that Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11,

Q.B. Div.]

GRECH (app.) v. HUNT (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

governed this case, and that the complaint was not made within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose.

That if a notice of demand was necessary the said notice of apportionment served on the respondent on the 13th April 1875, was a sufficient demand.

That, at the expiration of the three months within which time the respondent could dispute the apportionment, viz., on the 13th July 1875, the matter of such complaint arose, and that the six calendar months allowed began to run from that date, and that, inasmuch as the complaint was not made by the appellant until the 31st Jan. 1876, it was too late, and that it must be dismissed.

It was also contended by the respondent that assuming a demand was necessary, and that the notice of apportionment was not a sufficient demand, and that the notice dated the 31st July 1875, served on the respondent on that day, was a sufficient and only demand by the appellant, and that the matter of such complaint only arose on the service of such notice, and began to run from such date; then that such complaint was not made in due time, because the notice having been served on the 31st July, and the complaint having been made on the 31st Jan. 1876, it was not within six calendar months as prescribed by Jervis's Act.

In support of his first contention respondent relied on the case of Jacomb v. Dodgson (32 L. J. Rep. 113, M. C.).

It was also contended by the respondent that inasmuch as the local board had not declared the said expenses to be private expenses, no notice of demand for payment was necessary, and that the only intimation the respondent was entitled to was the notice of the apportionment by the surveyor and the amount payable by the respondent.

6. On the part of the appellant it was contended that a notice of demand was necessary, that the notice of apportionment served on the respondent on the 13th April 1875, was not a demand, but that the notice served by the appellant on the 31st July 1875, was the first and legal demand.

That the matter of complaint did not begin to run from and after the expiration of the three months within which the respondent could dispute the apportionment, but from and after the service of the notice of the 31st July 1875.

That although such notice was served on the 31st July 1875, and the complaint was not made until 31st Jan. 1876, it was made within the six calendar months prescribed by Jervis's Act.

The appellant also relied on the 62nd section of the Local Government Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98).

The said justices, however, being of opinion that inasmuch as the local board had not declared the said expenses to be private improvement expenses, a demand for payment of the proportion was unnecessary; and that if any demand were necessary the notice of apportionment served on the respondent on the 13th April 1875, was a sufficient notice of demand, and being also of opinion that the matter of such complaint arose at the expiration of the three months after service of the said notice of apportionment, within which the respondent could dispute such apportionment, found that the complaint had not been made within six calendar months prescribed by Jervis's Act. And they being also of opinion that if a demand were necessary, and if such notice of apportionment were not a sufficient demand, but the notice of the 31st July 1875, was the legal demand, they found that the complaint had not been made within the six calendar months prescribed by the Act aforesaid, and accordingly gave their determination against the appellant in the manner and on the grounds before stated. In coming to the above determination the said justices were guided by the case of Jacomb v. Dodgson (3 B. & S. 461), Eddleston v. Francis (7 C. B., N.S., 568), Wilson v. Mayor of Bolton (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 105).

8. The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore, are—

First. Whether, as the local board had not declared the said expenses to be improvement expenses, a demand was necessary, and if necessary whether the notice of apportionment was a sufficient notice of demand in point of law.

Secondly. Whether the matter of the complaint arose at the expiration of the three months after the service of the said notice of apportionment, or upon the service of the notice of 31st July 1875, and whether in either case the complaint was made within the time prescribed by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 s. 11.

9. And the court is humbly solicited according to the power vested in the court by the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, to remit the case to the said justices, with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court may seem fit.

Brown, Q.C. (with him Glen), argued for the appellant.—The expenses, which were duly incurred in this case under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), "may be recovered from the last mentioned owners (i.e. owners in default) in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by the order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner herein-after provided." Sect. 90 provides for the recovery of expenses "which by this Act are, or by the said local board shall be, declared to be private improvement expenses," from the occupiers by instalments over any period not exceeding thirty years. By sect. 63 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), in cases under the Act of 1848 where expenses are payable by owners, "and such expenses have been settled and apportioned by the surveyors as payable by such owner, such apportionment shall be binding and conclusive upon such owner, unless within the expiration of three months from the time of notice being given, by the local board or their surveyor, of the amount of the proportion so settled by the said surveyor to be due from such owner, he shall by written notice dispute the same." The question raised by this case is whether these expenses, although admittedly not technically private improvement expenses, must not be subject to the provision in the previous sect. 62 of this Act of 1858. "In all summary proceedings by a local board for the recovery of expenses incurred by them in works of private improvement, the time within which such proceedings may be taken shall be reckoned from the date of the service of notice of demand." If a notice of demand be necessary in this case, the appellant further contends that the notice of apportionment, which merely gives the contributors an opportunity of disputing the amounts claimed from them, cannot be such a notice of demand as this section refers to Jacob v. Dodgson (3 B. & S. 461), is an authority that the six months' limitation of summary proceedings does not begin to run until after the expiration of three months from the notice of apportionment, and in that case a demand was made after the three months had concluded. No case treats a notice of apportionment as a demand for payment.

GRACE (app.) v. HUNT (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Labalmondiers v. Addison, 1 E. & E. 41;
Eddleston v. Francis, 7 C. B., N. S., 568;
Wilson v. Mayor of Bolton, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 105.

Thesiger, Q.C. (with him Fullarton), for the respondents.—None of the cases touch this particular point, but they are all consistent with a distinction between private improvement expenses and those which are payable by the owners. There is, too, no form of demand given in any of the statutes, and it may well be that this notice of apportionment should satisfy the demand for payment required by the 62nd section of the Act of 1859. It contains all the necessary words, as much as the account in Wilson v. Mayor of Bolton, which Lush, J., considered a demand of payment.

Brown, Q.C., in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

April 18.—FIELD, J. delivered the judgment of Mellor, J. and himself.—This is a case stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Reigate, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on certain questions of law. The appellants are the council of the said borough, being the urban sanitary authority for the district. The respondent is the owner of property within the district abutting upon a private street, not being a highway, called Earlswood-road, which street was not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the appellants. The appellants, on the 7th March 1875, in pursuance of the 69th section of the Public Health Act of 1848, gave notice to the respective owners of the premises fronting such street, requiring them to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel the same within a specified time. Such notice not having been complied with by such owners, the appellants executed the works referred to therein, the expenses incurred in so doing amounting to the sum of 638*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, and on the completion of the works the appellants' surveyor, in accordance with the same section, duly apportioned the expenses which had been so incurred between the several owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises; and on the 12th April 1875, the appellants served upon the respondents a notice of such apportionment as required by the 63rd section of the Local Government Act 1858, by which they gave him notice that the amount of the proportion of the said expenses to be paid by him, according to the frontage of his premises, was 22*l.* 7*s.* The respondent did not give any notice to dispute the apportionment within the three months limited by the 63rd section, the effect of which was that the apportionment became binding and conclusive upon him. On 31st July 1875, the appellants, who have never declared that the said expenses should be private improvement expenses, served upon the respondent a notice requesting him to pay the said 22*l.* 7*s.* so assessed upon him to the treasurer within fourteen days, and the respondent not having paid the amount so assessed, the appellants, on the 31st Jan. 1876, preferred the present complaint, by way of summary proceeding, for the recovery of that sum. The complaint came on to be heard before the justices on the 15th May 1876, when they dismissed the same, but submitted to us the following questions of law: First, whether, as the local board had not declared the said expenses to be private improvement expenses, a demand was necessary, and if necessary, whether the notice of apportionment was sufficient notice of demand in point of law; secondly, whether the matter of the complaint arose at the expiration of the three months after the service of the said notice of apportionment, or upon the service of the notice of the 31st July 1875; and whether in either case the complaint was made within the time prescribed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 s. 11. Upon the argument before us it was contended by Mr. Brown, on the part of the appellant, that a demand was necessary, and that the complaint was preferred in due time, as being within six months from the time of the service of the demand of the 31st July; and in support of this contention he relied upon the latter part of the 62nd section of the Local Government Act of 1858, which enacts that "in all summary proceedings by a local board for the recovery of expenses incurred by them in works of private improvement, the time within which such proceedings may be taken shall be reckoned from the date of the service of the notice of demand," which he contended applied to the complaint preferred. On the part of the respondent Mr. Thesiger admitted that if a demand was necessary, and if the notice of the 7th April was not (as he contended it was) a demand within the meaning of the statute, the complaint was duly preferred within six months from the time of the service of the demand of the 31st July, according to the general rule with regard to the computation of the time within which an act is to be done; and as we are of that opinion, we answer that assuming that the matter of complaint arose from the service of that notice of demand, the complaint was preferred in due time. Mr. Thesiger, however, denied that the latter part of the 62nd section was applicable to the present case, which he said was governed by the general enactment of the 11th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43; and he further contended, that even if a demand was necessary, the notice of apportionment of the 12th April amounted to such a demand, and that the period of limitation ran therefore from that date. Before stating the reasons which have induced us to come to a conclusion in favour of the appellant, upon the true construction of the 62nd section of the Act of 1858, it is advisable to refer to the general policy and provisions of the statutes bearing upon the questions standing for our decision. One of the principal objects of these statutes is to promote the public health by means of securing the execution of the works upon private property, calculated to render them healthy in themselves and innocuous to the public health; and the statutes, consequently, provide for the execution of such works in the first instance by the owners or occupiers of the property upon which they are to be executed, and in their default by the local authority. But inasmuch as these works, at the same time they subserve the public health, also improve the property upon which they are executed, the Legislature provides means for recouping to the public authoity the expenses thus incurred. In a case like the present, where the works are executed under the powers conferred upon the local authority by the 69th section of the Public Health Act 1848, there are two modes provided for recovering such expenses, first, the total amount of expense is apportioned amongst the owners of the premises supposed to be improved and benefited by the works, according to their several frontages, and then the amount so apportioned is to be recovered by summary proceedings taken by the local authority against such owners; secondly, by declaring the expenses to be private improvement expenses. The result of the first mode is to throw the expenses either in one sum or by instalments (sect. 146) upon the owners; that of the second is to throw the expenses in any event over a period of years (sect. 90), and so throw a portion of the expense upon the occupier or person having a less interest than the whole fee simple (sect. 91). The course of proceeding when the first mode is adopted is as above mentioned for the surveyor to apportion the total expenses of the execution of the works amongst the different owners of the land presumed benefited by their execution, according to frontages, and such apportionment is conclusive upon each owner at the expiration of three months from the service of a notice of the apportionment upon him: (Sect. 63 of the Act of 1858). The course of proceeding when the expenses are either by enactment private improvement expenses (sect. 76), or are declared by the local authority to be such, is for the authority to make a rate for the amount of expenses upon the occupiers of the premises in respect of which they have been incurred, called a private improvement rate, sufficient to discharge such expenses (sect. 90, Act of 1848), and to enforce the payment of the sum assessed in default of payment, "when due, and for fourteen days after demand in writing," by proceedings before a justice: (sect. 103). These being the general provisions of the statutes in question, the question upon which our judgment is asked arises, viz., Whether the latter part of the 62nd section of the Act of 1858 applies to the summary proceedings against the owners referred to in the 69th section of the Act of 1848, so as by implication to make a demand necessary, from notice of which the period of limitation is to be reckoned, or whether it is limited to the second mode of recovering the expenses incurred, viz., when they are declared to be private improvement expenses, and a rate is made upon the occupier. Now the present complaint is undoubtedly a summary proceeding, and in the language of the 62nd section the expenses are sought to be recoverable in a summary manner, and the only question can be whether the next following words in the 62nd section, viz., "incurred in works of private improvement" are used in the general sense of works executed upon private property, and tending to improve them, or are to be limited to expenses declared to be private improvement expenses, and for which a private improvement rate has been made. Now it must be observed that if the narrower sense is put upon these words, this branch of the 62nd section would be rendered superfluous: for as already pointed out by the express language of the 103rd section of the Act of 1848, proceedings cannot be taken to recover the sum assessed in a rate made for private improvement expenses, until fourteen days after it has been lawfully demanded in writing, and as such a demand is therefore necessary to make the "matter of complaint" complete, the six months limitation provided by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, applies to that, and the enactment of the 62nd section, if so limited, was therefore unnecessary. We think, therefore, we are well warranted in holding that when the Legislature says that the time is to be reckoned as in the 62nd section in "all" summary proceedings, their object was to extend the demand to proceedings like the present, in order that the owner liable might have a distinct written demand before he could be compelled to pay. It is no doubt true that in the 69th sect. a provision is made for giving the owner a notice of the apportioned sum which he is alleged to be liable to pay; but no such provision is found in sects. 49, 51, 54, 58, and 60, in which similar summary proceedings are provided for recovery of similar expenses, and without a demand the party liable would be exposed to proceedings the moment the works were completed, without having any means of knowing the amount of his liability, or that it had in fact accrued. We think, therefore, that the Legislature has designedly made use of the larger words, "works of public improvement," instead of the narrower ones, "expenses declared to be private improvement expenses." No doubt some little difficulty arises in this construction from the concluding language of the 62nd section, which, in speaking generally of the service of "notice of demand" as of a known and existing requisite, instead of specifically enacting that a demand shall be made, seems to imply the existence of some prior specific legislative enactment requiring a demand; but it is to be observed that in the 103rd section the demand is introduced in somewhat the same language of condition, and we do not think that this difficulty (if it be one) is sufficient to outweigh the course of reasoning which induces us to answer the first question put to us by saying that a demand is necessary, from which the six months in the 11th & 12th Vict. c. 43, s. 11, is to be reckoned. In the course of the argument various cases were referred to by one side or the other in support of their contention. The case of Jacomb v. Dodgson (3 B. & S. 461), which was first cited, is clearly an authority for holding that, at all events, the period of three months from the notice of apportionment, which is the period given to the owner within which he may dispute the apportionment, is to be excluded from the computation of the six months within which the complaint is to be made; but as in that case there was a demand made at the expiration of these three months, the decision does not appear to be in opposition to the conclusion at which we have arrived upon principle. The principle upon which the case of Addison v. Labalmondiere (1 E. & E. 41) is decided is in accordance with our decision; and the case of Eddleston v. Francis (7 C. B., N. S., 568), although at first sight apparently an authority to the contrary, is not so really, for although the case was decided after the passing of the Local Government Act of 1858, the proceedings in question in that case had taken place before its passing, and the court, upon that ground, declined to apply the 62nd section of the Act to proceedings commenced before its passing. This being so, the question then arises, whether the notice of apportionment of the 12th April was a sufficient demand, within the 62nd section, and we answer that question in the negative. Our reasons for this are that notice of apportionment is designed to fulfil a very different office from the notice of demand. It is a step in the machinery provided for the purpose of ascertaining the liability of the owner; there is not at the time it is served any liability to pay the apportioned sum, nor can there be until the lapse of three months afterwards, and in the event of the owner successfully disputing the apportionment, that sum so apportioned will never become due. What we think the 62nd section requires is such a document as shall bring clearly and pointedly to the mind of the person in default that he is then required to pay the sum which has been in some way found to be due from him. With these answers, therefore, we remit this case to the justices for further adjudication.

SOPER v. MAYOR OF BASINGSTOKE AND OTHERS.

Municipal election—Objection to nomination paper—Situation of qualifying property of seconder—Immaterial misdescription—Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40).

Sub-sect. 2 of sect. 1 of the Municipal Elections Act 1875 requires that at any municipal election every candidate shall be nominated in writing subscribed by two enrolled burgesses of the borough or ward for which the election is held as proposer and seconder, and by eight other burgesses assenting to the nomination. The first schedule to the Act provides a form of nomination paper, to which is appended a foot-note to the effect that "the number on the burgess roll of the burgess subscribing, with the situation of the property in respect of which he is enrolled on the burgess roll," must be added.

The situation of the property in respect of which a seconder of a candidate subscribed a nomination paper was entered as "High-street." The name had recently been changed to "Winchester-street." There was no dispute as to the identity of the seconder. The nomination paper was objected to as irregular, and the mayor allowed the objection, when the other candidates were returned without a contest. Upon appeal it was Held that the misdescription was immaterial, and that the election was therefore void.

JOHN BURGESS SOPER presented a petition under the Municipal Elections Acts 1872 and 1875, to the court to the following effect. He stated that he was a candidate for the office of councillor of the borough of Basingstoke, at the election held on 1st Nov. 1876; that he was duly nominated by a nomination paper, subscribed by two enrolled burgesses of the said borough as proposer and seconder, and by eight other burgesses; that an objection was taken to his nomination paper before the mayor of the said borough, upon the ground that the situation of the property in respect of which his seconder was enrolled on the burgess list was improperly described upon his nomination paper as being "High-street," whereas the property is described on the burgess roll as being "Winton-street;" that High-street is the name by which the street in question was and is generally known, its name having been very recently changed to Winchester or Winton-street; that no one could be misled by its being called High-street, and that the Mayor gave his decision allowing the objection, whereby the petitioner lost his election. The petitioner prayed that the election might be determined to be void. A special case was subsequently ordered to be stated for the opinion of the court, pursuant to 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60, s. 15, sub-sect. 6, and rule 37 of Michaelmas Term 1872.

The special case stated the facts above-mentioned, and set out the subscription of the seconder of the nomination paper as follows: "649, John Owen, of High-street." It added that the name painted upon the street in question is "Winchester-street." The question, therefore, left for the opinion of the court was, Whether the objection was good in substance? Should the court be of that opinion, judgment was to be given for the respondents; if otherwise, for the petitioner. Costs were to be in the discretion of the court.

Charles, Q.C. and Lord, for the petitioner.—The seconder was sufficiently described. In Knowles v. Brooking (2 C. B. 226), an objector's place of abode being wrongly described on the list of voters, he, in the signature to his notice of objection, gave his true place of abode, and not the abode mentioned in the register, and it was held that the notice was correctly signed. They cited Bear v. Jones (a).

Crump, for the respondents.—The question is whether any address other than that on the burgess roll can be subscribed by a person nominating another for a municipal office. The burgess roll is the only document by which the mayor can be guided. In a large town it is impossible for the mayor to know every one, and in a small town he is not called upon to make use of what private knowledge he has. Under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, nominations were oral and not written, and the persons nominated could be identified. Sect. 142 of that Act provided for inaccuracies in voting papers. The Act which afterwards introduced nomination papers made no provision for inaccuracies in them, although it continued the saving clause of the earlier Act: (Mather v. Brown, L. Rep. 1 C.P. 659; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 869). So long as there is any inaccuracy it is immaterial in what part of the paper it is. The description must strictly comply with the requirements of the Act.

Reg v. Plenty, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 346;

Calver v. Roberts, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 751.

(a) In Bear v. Jones, Docwra, and Papillon, a case heard in the Common Pleas Division on Jan. 20, 1877, the petitioner was nominated as a candidate for election to the office of councillor of the borough of Colechester; and it was objected to his nomination paper that his "place of abode" was entered as of "St. Botolph's House," whereas against his name on the burgess roll was entered "St. Botolph's House, Magdalen-street." The defendant Papillon, who was then mayor, allowed the objection.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and GROVE, J. held that, taking a common sense view of the case, the place of abode was sufficiently described, there being no assertion that it did not sufficiently designate the residence of the candidate; and overruled the objection, with costs against all the respondents except the mayor.

CALDOW v. PIXELL.

[O.P. Div.]

DENMAN, J. — Judgment must be for the petitioner, who says that High-street is the name whereby the street was and still is generally known, in which the property of his secondor is situate, that the name of the street has only very recently been changed from High-street to Winchester or Winton street, and that no one in fact was or could be misled by the description thereof as High-street, instead of Winchester or Winton-street; which facts are admitted by the respondents. The actual question is whether a person who signs a nomination paper as a secondor of a candidate for election to a municipal office, and uses his own name and number on the burgess roll, adding as his residence the house in which he really resides, but naming the street in which it is situated by a name which it recently bore, complies with the provisions of the Municipal Elections Act 1875. Our decision turns upon the construction of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 1 of that Act, which requires that every candidate for a municipal office shall be nominated in writing, and his nomination paper subscribed by two burgesses as proposer and secondor, and by eight other burgesses as assenting to the nomination. It is not objected that the names and places are not mentioned, but that the descriptions vary from the form No. 2 by the first schedule to the Act required to be followed, at least in substance, by the sub-section above. But there is a foot-note to the exemplar signatures, "G. H., of . . ." &c., in the form requiring the addition of "the number on the burgess roll of the burgess subscribing, with the situation of the property in respect of which he is enrolled on the burgess roll." This provision, relating to the situation of the qualifying property, is the one upon which the dispute has arisen. It cannot be necessary that the description of a burgess upon a nomination paper should be exactly the same as that upon the burgess roll. There are many cases in which there may be a fairer description. For instance, a sub-division of a street may have taken place. A High street may have been divided into several streets, terraces, places, or crescents. No. 6, High-street, may have become No. 10, Gladstone-terrace. In that case the latter address would be more accurate than the former. All that is required by the Act is that the person should be identified, which is to be done by his name, his number upon the burgess roll, and the situation of the property in respect of which he is enrolled, being set out. Is there any authority to the contrary? The case of Mather v. Brown, which was cited by the respondents' counsel, is rather an authority against them, because the principle upon which the court there proceeded was that the case fell within the letter of the Act which it was bound to construe strictly. The mis-description there was about a matter as to which there could not be two things true, that is, as to the name of the candidate. His name was entered as "Robert V." for "Robert Vicars," and the ground of decision was that although "Will." or "Willm." are recognised at law as "William," the letter "W." alone is not; and therefore that "V." could not be recognised as "Vicars," that is, as the Christian name required by law to be set out. The subject matter also of that case is different from that of the present one. The other cases cited also differ. In them the person had changed his residence. I think the description "High-street" true in every material sense, because no one could be misled; and that therefore the Mayor ought not to have held the nomination an improper one.

LOPES, J. — I do not adopt the view that the description at the foot of the nomination paper should be actually identical, or in precisely the same words, as the description upon the burgess roll. The secondor should be so described that he may be identified. That he can be so here is not disputed.

Judgment for the petitioner, with costs against all parties except the Mayor.

CALDOW v. PIXELL (a)

The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. cap. 43), sect. 29—Surveyor's report—Provision as to time directory or imperative.

Sect. 29 of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 requires the bishop of a diocese, within three months after the avoidance of a benefice, to direct the ecclesiastical surveyor to inspect and report upon dilapidations:

Held, that this requirement is, as to time, directory and not imperative, and that the right of action for them is not lost to an incoming incumbent by the bishop's delay.

AN action was brought by the plaintiff to recover 117l. 16s. 6d. for dilapidations in respect of the benefice of Skirwith, in the diocese of Carlisle, claimed as due on an order alleged to have been made under the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871. After a demurrer by the plaintiff to the defendant's statement of defence had been set down for argument, by an order of court, a special case was ordered to be stated for the opinion of this Division.

The case set forth the following facts: The defendant resigned the said benefice on 3rd July 1874, and was succeeded by the plaintiff, who was admitted on 6th Jan. 1875.

On the 10th Nov. 1874, the Bishop of Carlisle directed the diocesan surveyor to inspect the buildings of the benefice of Skirwith, and to report to him, in accordance with the provisions of the above Act, what sum (if any) was required to make good the dilapidations for which the late incumbent was liable; and to send copies of the report to both incumbents; and to certify the dispatch of such copies. On 11th Jan. 1875, the surveyor inspected the said buildings, and reported that the sum of 118l. was required to make good such dilapidations. The buildings are situated in a position much exposed to high winds and bad weather. They remained unoccupied and unrepaired from 3rd July 1874 until 11th Jan. 1875, and the surveyor did not see them until the latter date. The defendant objected to the report on the ground that the inspection was not made within three months from the avoidance of the benefice, as required by sect. 29 of the above Act, but was delayed till after six months. The surveyor, being called upon to report the amount of repairs which might have become necessary during the six months after avoidance, certified the sum of 3s. 6d., which reduced the sum of 118l. to 117l. 16s. 6d., the amount sued for. On 31st March 1875, the bishop made an order stating at the above sum the amount for which the defendant as such late incumbent was liable.

The question for the consideration of the court was whether the plaintiff could recover from the defendant the said sum of 117l. 16s. 6d. This turned upon whether the words of sect. 29, namely, "within three calendar months after the avoidance of any benefice," are directory or imperative.

Sect. 33 requires that the incumbent shall send in to the Bishop his objection to the surveyor's report within a month, but the Bishop may receive an objection transmitted at a later period. There are no such qualifying words as to time in sect. 29.

DENMAN, J.—In this case judgment will be for the plaintiff. The question is one which is thrown out as doubtful, and not decided, by Bramwell and Amphlett, BB., in the case of Gleaves v. Marriner. Our attention has been called to a short statement by them in that case, in which they expressed a kind of doubt whether the section upon which this case turns is only directory. Is sect. 29 then directory, or imperative, so far as regards the first four words, "within three calendar months?" It has been held in Gleaves v. Marriner, that, so far at any rate as the surveyor is concerned, there is no fixed time within which he is bound to inspect and report; but it is now contended that the clause as to time must be strictly construed as against the bishop, and that if he gives his direction to his surveyor to report a day too late the whole transaction will become null and void; and the order of the bishop one upon which no action can be brought. Now sect. 53 enacts that without such an order no sum shall henceforth be recoverable in respect of dilapidations, and it is contended by the defendant that this section prevents any action from being brought which is not supported by an order made strictly under the provisions of this Act. But I think that is putting too narrow a construction upon the words used in that section, "unless the claim for such sum be founded on an order made under the provision of this Act." They are capable of a milder construction, and there are many analogous cases upon the construction of Acts of Parliament in which strong words directing particular acts to be done under their provisions have been held to mean acts done substantially in pursuance of an intention to follow the provisions of such Acts.

Such cases would not, certainly, be authorities for giving the words of this Act a loose construction; but in my opinion they are sufficient to enable us to hold that an order may be made by the bishop, which would not be vitiated by delaying giving directions to the surveyor, and that we should construe sect. 29 to be directory only. Upon this question, whether the words of sect. 29 are imperative or directory, so far as I can find, it would not be easy to lay down a stricter rule than that laid down by Lord Campbell in the case of Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (2 D. F. & J. 502; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 474), mentioned by Sir Peter Maxwell in his work upon the construction of statutes, who says (p. 331), "When a statute commands that something shall be done, or done in a particular manner, the important question arises, when the statute is silent respecting it, whether the command is to be considered as a mere direction or instruction of no obligatory force, and involving no invalidating consequences for its disregard; or as imperative, with an implied nullification for disobedience. No rule can be laid down for determining this question beyond the general one, that it depends on the scope and object of the enactment. Though a command to do a thing in a particular way does not necessarily imply a prohibition to do it in any other way, it would, nevertheless, clearly imply it, if, without it, the command would be nugatory, and the aim and object of the Legislature defeated." In the same work a number of authorities are cited, and two or three other observations are worthy of mention, because they fairly sum up the doctrines of law upon the subject. At page 333 the author says, "A strong line of distinction may, in general, be drawn between cases when the provisions affect a public duty, and those which relate to a privilege or power. When powers and privileges are granted, subject to compliance with certain regulations or conditions, it seems, in general, not contrary to justice or policy to exact a rigorous observance of them, and it is therefore probable that such an observance was deemed essential by the Legislature. But when a public duty is imposed, and the statute requires that it shall be performed in a certain manner, or within a certain time, it is difficult to believe that the Legislature intended the injustice and inconvenience to others which would result if the act to be done were of no legal validity, unless the directions of the statute were strictly observed. In general, then, it seems there where a statute confers a privilege or a power, the regulative provisions which it imposes on its acquisition or exercise are essential and imperative." A broad line of distinction is drawn further on, at page 337, "On the other hand, where the prescriptions of a statute relate to the performance of a public duty, they seem to be generally understood to be merely instructions for the guidance and government of those on whom the duty is imposed, or directory only. The neglect of them may be punishable, indeed, but it does not affect the validity of the act done in disregard of them. To give them that effect would often lead to serious inconvenience and absurdity." The author proceeds to give illustrations, and then adds, at page 340, "In all cases, however, the question as to the Legislature intending a provision to be imperative or directory, in the sense above-mentioned, whether it arises in respect of a power or duty, or otherwise, is to be determined by weighing the consequences of either view. Where the Legislature has expressed no intention on the point, that intention should be imputed to it which is most probable; and it must be that which is most consistent with reason, and a due regard to convenience and justice." Applying these principles, which we are warranted in doing upon the cases which are cited in the work, on every ground the words of the enactment before us must be held to be directory, and not imperative. In the first place, the statute is not one which for the first time confers a power or a privilege. It deals with the existing right of recovering for dilapidations, but says that they shall be recovered in a different way. It gives an action to the actual incumbent, both for his own benefit and for the benefit of the living, and imposes upon the bishop the duty of setting the proceedings in motion; and there is an appeal against the order of the bishop when it is made upon the surveyor's report. Then, this is a statute imposing a public duty upon the bishop for public purposes, that is, for enabling proper steps to be taken to compel payment of money, due from an outgoing incumbent, or his estate, for repairs required to be done to the buildings of his benefice, into Queen Anne's Bounty Fund; and it only makes the plaintiff the instrument of carrying out the previously existing rights. The bishop, having thus a public duty to perform, the mere fact that he neglects to perform it at the proper time, does not render the provisions of the Act void; and on this ground it is reasonable to assume that the section was intended to be directory and not imperative. Upon both grounds, therefore, that this is not a statute conferring a power or a privilege, but one which imposes a public duty, the section must be held to be directory. But there is also a higher ground, namely, that of convenience and justice. There are no words making the clause imperative. If we were so to hold it, we should in effect take away the right of action for dilapidations in the event of the bishop delaying for one day only to direct the surveyor to inspect. The whole right of an incoming incumbent to recover against an outgoing incumbent would be gone, and the latter would be free from all liability at law. This would give rise to grave inconvenience, and defeat the intention of the Act. If, on the contrary, we hold the section to be directory only, we should not prevent the bishop for acting, even if he were to be so far wrong as not to comply with the requirements of the Act as to time; and if he acted unfairly there would be an appeal, bringing with it a review of the report of the surveyor and of the order of the bishop. Here the defendant has had all the benefit of an appeal, although he neglected to take advantage of his right to require a re-survey because he thought the words of the section imperative. Mr. Gibbs has cited many cases before us. They all relate to the non-appointment to office—mostly of persons who are to act in public capacities in relation to the poor—and are open to the observation that where a large number of the public are concerned things would come to a stand-still if provisions relating to time were imperative; and the Court of Queen's Bench has so decided, and has given a remedy for a delay by way of mandamus. This case is not of such general importance, but I cannot measure a public duty by degrees. The case cited by Mr. Stavelly Hill, on the other side, to support his contention, is the recent one before Lord Penzance. That case is not like the present. It was under the Church Discipline Act, and the whole jurisdiction was of a criminal nature, and depended upon the movers in the matter giving their opponent notice. It is not, in fact, so strong as the case of the non-observance of time to appeal. It is founded upon the previous decision in Vaux v. Volland a (proceeding also of a penal nature under 57 Geo. 3, c. 99, s. 40, in which notice is required to be given before action in certain cases), and decided that there was no locus standi to sue for a penalty unless certain preliminary proceedings were taken. After carefully considering the cases, I can recognise the distinction between a power or a privilege, or a procedure given by an Act subject to condition or to time, and the case of a pre-existing duty for public purposes in the performance of which a public officer is not limited as to time.

LOPES, J.—This is an important case, and I have had doubts upon it during the course of the argument; but upon the whole I think the plaintiff ought to succeed. I shall not repeat what my learned brother has so fully gone into, but I agree with him that sect. 29 is directory and not imperative. The scope, object, and intention of the Act of Parliament was to strike a balance of inconvenience between the action of the old incumbent becoming null and void, and the injury and delay caused to the new incumbent.

REG. v. J. S. SCOTT.

Indictment—Perjury—Averment of materiality.

An indictment for perjury stated that an action was brought in the Chancery Division, in which the prisoner was the plaintiff and W. the defendant, that it came on for hearing before the Vice-Chancellor, that the prisoner did appear as a witness, and did falsely swear that he never did employ O. and H. as his solicitors, and that he never executed any mortgage or deed relating to the property claimed in the action, and that the allegation in the statement of defence in the action that he executed the deeds in the statement of defence mentioned was untrue, "and the said false statements so upon oath made by the prisoner were material to the matters then in issue before the Court."

Held, upon motion in arrest of judgment, that the indictment was good, and that the averment of the materiality of the perjury assigned was sufficient.

To prove that the action was pending, the copy of the writ of summons filed under the rules of the Judicature Act, and a copy of the pleadings in the action, and the order dismissing the action, were produced.

REG. v. J. S. SCOTT.

[C. CAS. R.]

Held sufficient without the original writ of summons. Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of the City of London.

At a session of the Central Criminal Court on Monday, the 9th April 1877, James Stanford Scott was tried before me on an indictment of perjury, of which the following is a copy :

Central Criminal Court to wit: The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oath present that heretofore an action was brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, in which James Stanford Scott was the plaintiff, and William Wood, John Wood, and others, were defendants, and the said action came on for hearing upon the 16th Feb. 1877, before the Hon. Sir James Bacon Knight, one of the Vice-Chancellors of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, at his court at Lincoln's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, and that the said James Stanford Scott did upon the said 16th Feb. aforesaid appear as a witness upon the hearing of such action, and was duly sworn to give true evidence therein, and the said James Stanford Scott did then upon his oath so taken as aforesaid falsely, corruptly, knowingly, maliciously, and willingly depose and swear, amongst other things, in substance and to the effect following, that is to say, that he, the said James Stanford Scott, never did in any way employ or consult as his solicitors Messrs. Overton and Hughes, who carried on business as solicitors at 25, Old Jewry; that he never executed any mortgage or deed relating to the property claimed by him in the said action, and that the allegation in the statement of defence in such action that he executed the deeds in such statement of defence mentioned was an untrue statement, and that he did not execute any of such deeds. Whereas in truth and in fact the said James Stanford Scott did employ and consult the said Messrs. Overton and Hughes as his solicitors, and did execute divers mortgage and other deeds relating to the property claimed by him in such action, and the said allegation in the said statement of defence was a true statement, and the said James Stanford Scott did execute some or all of such deeds, and the said false statements so upon oath made by the said James Stanford Scott were material in the matter then in issue before the court, and the said James Stanford Scott did thereby commit wilful and corrupt perjury against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

There were three other counts in the indictment also objected to, but as the court expressed no opinion upon them, it is unnecessary to set them out.

To prove that the action mentioned in the indictment was pending, and was tried as alleged, the documents annexed to the case were tendered in evidence. No. 1, which is the copy (filed under the Rules) of the original writ of summons. No. 2 is a copy of the pleadings in the action, No. 3 is the original order to dismiss the action. Nos. 1 and 2 were produced from the Record and Writ Clerks' office, and No. 3 was produced by the solicitor for the defendants in the action.

It was objected by counsel for the prisoner that the original writ of summons in the action was the necessary, and in fact the only evidence receivable to prove that any action was pending, and that as there was no evidence that it was lost, and no notice to produce the original writ had been given to the prisoner, who was the plaintiff in the action, the document produced was no evidence, even if it had been signed according to rule 7; and it was also objected that it was not so signed.

It was also objected that the other documents produced, viz., Nos. 2 and 3, were in the absence of the writ not receivable in evidence as proof of the pending or trial of any action.

I received the evidence tendered, and the jury found the prisoner guilty.

Thereupon the prisoner's counsel moved in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the indictment was bad, because upon the authority of the case of Reg. v. Goodfellow (Carr. & Mar. 569) the allegation of the materiality of that which the prisoner swore was bad. Secondly, because even if held sufficient to allege the materiality in such a manner the indictment was defective and bad, for the allegation in the first count alleged that the false statements of the prisoner were "material to the matter then in issue before the court," and the count did not allege what issue or matter was then before the court.

For the purposes of the day I held the indictment to be sufficient, but I respited judgment, and ordered the prisoner to remain in gaol unless he entered into recognizance in 500*l.*, with two sureties in 250*l.* each for his appearance to receive judgment, and reserved for the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved the questions:

First, whether the evidence of the pending and trial of the action was lawfully and properly received by me.

Secondly, whether the indictment was good upon motion for the reasons aforesaid in arrest of judgment.

If the evidence was properly received by me, and the indictment is sufficient, the conviction is to be affirmed. If the evidence was not properly received the conviction is to be reversed, or if the indictment is insufficient, judgment is to be arrested.

Willis, Q.C. (Gill with him) for the prisoner.—The indictment is defective. The averment in the count, "the said false statements so upon oath made by the said J. S. Scott were material in the matters then in issue before the court" is insufficient, for it cannot be collected from that what the issue was. The ordinary and usual form of pleading is to allege first, that there was an action pending, and then that it became and was a material question in such action, setting out the material question. The effect of the authorities is this, that the indictment must contain an allegation that a question (stating what it was) became material, that the statements deposed to by the defendant were false; and that they were material to the question in issue. The averments must be such that the court may be able to judge from them whether the answers were material to the issue. The question of materiality is one for the court, not for the jury to determine. Suppose a defendant had falsely sworn that he had not been convicted of felony, the indictment must state that it became a material question whether the defendant had been convicted of a felony. In 3 Russ. on Crimes, 62 (edit. 1865), it is thus stated: "It is necessary that it should appear on the face of the indictment that the oath taken was material to the question depending. But it is not necessary to set forth in the indictment so much of the proceedings of the former trial as will show the materiality of the question on which the perjury is assigned, and it will be sufficient to allege generally that the particular question became a material question." [MELLOR, J.—In Roscoe on Criminal Evidence, 826 (edit. 1874) it is stated: "It must either appear on the face of the facts set forth in the indictment that the matter sworn to and upon which the perjury is assigned was material, or there must be an express averment to that effect." In Reg. v. Bennett (2 Den. C. C. 240, and 20 L. J. 217, M. C.) the indictment averred "that upon the trial of the said indictment, the following questions became and were material," and then it stated the questions. All that this indictment avers is at the conclusion, that the false statements of the prisoner were material to the matters then in issue. In Reg. v. Goodfellow (Car. & Marsham 569), it was held that in an indictment for perjury an averment "that it became and was material to ascertain the truth of the matter hereinafter alleged to have been sworn to and stated by the said J. G. upon his oath" was not a good averment of materiality. In that case, Patteson, J., after consulting with Cresswell, J., said: "As to the allegation of materiality, I am of opinion that that allegation is clearly bad; it seems to me to be quite absurd to say that it became material to ascertain the truth of what the witness stated. The witness's statement itself must be given to ascertain the truth of something which has become material to the inquiry before that statement has been made. Therefore, if the materiality of the evidence did not appear from the other allegations of the count, I should hold the allegation to be quite insufficient. I am inclined to think the materiality does so appear, but it is unnecessary to decide that question, since the first objection is of itself fatal to the count." In Rees v. Nicholl (1 B. & Ad. 24), Bayley, J. said: "In the case of perjury the indictment must shew either by a statement of the proceedings, or by other averments that the question to which the offence related was material." That was a writ of error, and Bayley, J. said: "We know nothing of the merits of the case except from the indictment." In Reg. v. Dowlin (5 T. R. 311), it was held that the averment "that at and upon the said trial it then and there became and was made a material question whether," &c. was a sufficient averment of materiality, but in the present indictment there is nothing equivalent to such an averment. In Lane's case (Oro. Eliz. 148) the prisoner was "indicted for perjury for that upon an issue in such a matter between parties he did falsely depose, &c., but showed not how the issue was, nor how the deposition trenching to the point of the issue, and he was discharged." For all that appears the prisoner in this case may have executed a deed which may have been altogether immaterial to the issue. Reg. v. Aylett (1 T. R. 63), shows the proper way in which the averment of materiality should be framed, "that it then and there became and was a material question on the hearing of the said complaint before, &c. whether the said A. was taken and arrested." Reg. v. Cutts (4 Cox C. C. 435), was also cited upon this point. The second question is whether the evidence of the pending and trial of the action was sufficient. It was insufficient, as the original writ was not produced.

Gorst, Q.C. for the prosecution.—The statement of claim in the action, which was in evidence, states the writ to have been issued on such a day.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We must assume everything up to the trial to have been regular unless the contrary was proved. But here we have all the proceedings and cannot fail to see that an action was pending.

Gorst, Q.C. (E. Clarke with him) for the prosecution was not called upon to argue.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the first count is sufficient, and that the conviction must be affirmed. In all the counts it is alleged that the false statements so upon oath made by the prisoner were material in the matter then in issue before the court. It has been contended before us that that averment is not sufficient, and that it must appear on the record that the false statements were material to the matter in issue by showing what the matter in issue was, so that the court, in case of a demurrer, should have the means of judging whether such false statements were material or not. There is a distinction between the first count and the three other counts. In the first count I think that the proposition of law for which Mr. Willis has contended is satisfied, and that there is enough on the face of that count to show what the issue was before the Vice-Chancellor, and how far the evidence of the prisoner was material to that issue. My judgment is not founded on the last three counts, which it is unnecessary to consider, as I think that the first count is good. The first count is free from difficulty, as we can gather from it what the issue before the Vice-Chancellor was, and form our opinion as to the materiality of the prisoner's false evidence upon it. Now I gather from the first count that the prisoner was plaintiff in an action before the Vice-Chancellor, and that he sued therein to recover certain property, and that he had executed a mortgage relating to that property; and I further infer from the count that the answer to the action was that he had executed some deed by which he had divested himself of the present right to that property; and that on being asked, when giving his evidence in the action, whether he had ever executed such a deed, and employed Messrs. Overton and Hughes as his solicitors, to prepare such deed, he swore that he had not, and that that evidence was false and untrue, and that it was material to the issue. That appears to be the substance of the defence to the action, and the prisoner by his evidence negatived the fact of his having executed the deed. That evidence was material to the issue, and, therefore, I think that sufficient appears in the first count of the indictment, though it is stated in an inartificial way. As to the second question reserved for our opinion, that was disposed of in the course of the argument.

MILLER, J.—I am of the same opinion. It must not be forgotten that this objection was taken in arrest of judgment and after the verdict. Upon the whole, I think that sufficient appears in the first count to show that there was an action in the Vice-Chancellor's Court in which the prisoner was the plaintiff, and claimed certain property, and was a witness, and that he deposed to the following effect, that he never employed Messrs. Overton and Hughes as his solicitors, and that he never executed any mortgage deed relating to the property claimed by him, and that the allegation in the statement of defence in such action that he did employ Messrs. Overton and Hughes as his solicitors, and did execute the deeds therein mentioned, was an untrue statement, and that he did not execute any of such deeds. The count then negatives the truth of the prisoner's evidence, and contains an averment that the said false statements were material to the matters then in issue. The count seems to me to contain all the necessary elements, though it is to be regretted they are alleged in an inartificial form.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. TUCKER.

[C. CAS. R.]

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of opinion that the first count of the indictment is sufficient. The objection is that the count does not show with sufficient certainty for the court to judge whether the untrue statements of the prisoner were material to the issue in the action before the Vice-Chancellor. The count, as I think, says first that the prisoner was plaintiff in an action; secondly, that in the action he claimed certain property; thirdly, that it was intended to set up by way of defence to the claim that certain deeds were executed by him; fourthly, that the prisoner denied on his oath that he executed any such deeds; fifthly, that such denial was untrue; and, sixthly, that such denial was material to the issue. The statement that he executed certain deeds, which the prisoner denied, was the very thing relied on in support of the defence.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. TUCKER.

Skating rink—Music licence—25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2. A skating rink, in London, was open to the public on payment of 1s. each person and 6d. for the use of skates. A band of six musicians performed in the evening from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m.

Held, that a music licence was required by the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, and that the person who kept the rink without such licence was subject to an indictment for keeping a place for public music and for public entertainment of a like kind to dancing.

At the general Quarter Session of the Peace holden at St. Mary, Newington, in and for the county of Surrey on Tuesday the 2nd Jan. 1877, John Mann and Robert Tucker were tried on an indictment of which the following is a copy:

Surrey to wit: The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oath present that John Mann and Robert Tucker, on the 1st Oct. 1876, and on divers other days between that day and the day of taking this inquisition in the Blackfriars-road, in the parish of Saint George the Martyr, Southwark, in the said county of Surrey, and within twenty miles of the cities of London and Westminster, unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain place for public dancing and music, situate in the said road and parish aforesaid, and within twenty miles of the cities of London and Westminster, without a licence had for that purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county aforesaid signified under the hands and seals of four or more of the justices there assembled at such sessions according to the directions of the statute in such case made and provided; the said dancing and music not being lawfully exercised and carried on under or by virtue of any letters patent, or licence of the Crown, or licence of the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said lady the Queen contrary to the form of statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown, and dignity.

Second count. That the said John Mann and Robert Tucker, on, &c., and on divers other days between that day and the day of taking this inquisition in the Blackfriars-road, &c., unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain place for public music without a licence had for that purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the Peace holden for the said county in which the said place is situate as aforesaid.

Third count. And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said John Mann and Robert Tucker on the 1st Oct. 1876, and on divers other days between that day and the day of taking this inquisition in the Blackfriars-road in the parish of Saint George the Martyr, Southwark, in the said county of Surrey, and within twenty miles of the cities of London and Westminster, unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain place for public entertainment of a like kind to an entertainment for public music and dancing, without a licence had for that purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the peace holden for the said county, in which the said place is situate as aforesaid, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our lady the Queen, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown, and dignity.

Fourth count.—That the said John Mann and Robert Tucker on, &c., and on divers other days between that day and the day of taking this inquisition in the Blackfriars-road, &c., unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain room for public dancing, music, and other entertainment of a like kind, without a licence had for that purpose, from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the peace holden for the said county in which the said room is situate as aforesaid.

Fifth count.—That the said John Mann and Robert Tucker on, &c., and on divers other days between that day and the day of taking this inquisition in the Blackfriars-road, &c., unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain house for public music and dancing and other entertainment of the like kind, without a licence had for that purpose, from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the peace holden for the said county in which the said place is situate.

Sixth count.—That the said John Mann and Robert Tucker on, &c., and on divers other days and between that day and the day of taking this inquisition in the Blackfriars-road, &c., unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain ill governed and disorderly house and place for public music and other entertainment, and in the said house and place for his own lucre and gain did cause and procure divers persons as well men and women of evil fame and name and of dishonest conversation to frequent and come together to the great damage and common nuisance, &c.

From the evidence it appeared that the defendant Tucker kept a skating rink in the Blackfriars-road, in the parish of Saint George the Martyr, Southwark, in the county of Surrey, and therefore within twenty miles of the cities of London and Westminster as defined by the 2nd section of the 25 George 2, c. 36, intituled "An Act for the better preventing thefts and robberies, and for regulating places of public entertainment, and punishing persons keeping disorderly houses" without a licence from the last preceding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the peace for the said county for "public dancing, music, and other public entertainment of the like kind," or by virtue of letters patent or licence of the Crown, or the licence of the Lord Chamberlain.

The rink was inclosed by a high wall, and was partly covered by a canvas roof and was partly open to the air.

An orchestra was built, and there was a band of six persons who performed upon two violins, a harp, a double bass, a cornet, and a flute. Selections of operatic and dance music were played while the people skated on Plimpton's roller skates.

The rink was open to the public for some hours during the day, and also at night for 7 p.m. to 10 p.m. No music was played during the day; but at night the band played between 7 and 10 p.m.

About fifty persons were present, some of whom were skating, and some were sitting around the rink.

will be in attendance each evening, and discourse some of the choicest selections of operatic and dance music, including the celebrated Shadow Dance, so suitable for the skating rink.

There was no case against the defendant Mann, and I therefore directed the jury to acquit him.

It was contended by counsel that the music was not a main part of the entertainment, but only subsidiary to the skating (Guaglieni v. Matthews, 34 L. J. 116, M. C.); that skating was not dancing within the statute, nor did the entire performance in any sense come within the words of the above statute, as being a "public entertainment of the like kind," i.e., to public dancing or music.

On the part of the prosecution, the case of Hall v. Green (9 Ex. 247; s. c. 23 L. J. 15, M. C.) was relied on as showing that the music need not be a principal or essential part of the entertainment.

In explaining the indictment to the jury, I left it to them to say whether music was the main part of the entertainment, or only subsidiary thereto, whether skating with music in the manner described by the witnesses, and in the published handbill, was or was not dancing and music within the meaning of the statute, or if not, whether it was or was not a public entertainment of the like kind to public dancing or music.

The jury found the defendant guilty on the first and third counts of the indictment.

Counsel on behalf of defendant objected that skating was not dancing, and that the evidence did not disclose any entertainment within the meaning of the statute.

Judgment was respite for the purpose of taking the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved on these objections.

If the court shall be of opinion that the objections of counsel for the defendant are valid, the conviction will be quashed, if not the conviction will be affirmed.

The defendant was admitted to bail on his own recognizances in the sum of 100l.

(Signed) WM. HARDMAN,

Chairman of the Court of Quarter Sessions.

Line for the defendant.—The indictment is framed upon the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2; which enacts "that any house, room, garden or place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind in the cities of London and Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof, without a licence had for that purpose from the quarter sessions, &c., shall be deemed a disorderly house or place . . . and every person keeping such house, room, garden, or other place, without such licence, shall forfeit the sum of 100l. to such person as will sue for the same, and be otherwise punishable as the law directs in case of disorderly houses." It is conceded that the statute must be construed distributively, and that a person keeping a house, &c., either for public dancing or public music, is within the statute. In this case the defendant was acquitted upon the third count, which charged him with keeping a place for public music without a licence. To bring a person within the statute for keeping a place for public music, the music must be a principal and independent part of the entertainment. In Guaglieni v. Matthews, the appellant kept a circus constructed of wood for equestrian and gymnastic performances, including tight rope dancing. There was a brass band of six performers, which played the usual circus music, and waltzes, polkas, quadrilles and galops. The local act upon which the appellant was proceeded against was in the same terms as the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, and Cockburn, C.J., said, "There are ample facts upon which the magistrates can arrive at a conclusion one way or the other; but from the way they have stated and left the case to the court, I doubt whether they have not proceeded to convict on an erroneous view of the statute. There can be no doubt that this was a public entertainment, but the magistrates have not found whether the music was merely subsidiary or formed a substantial part of it. Although there was some music or dancing, if it was merely subsidiary they ought not to have convicted; but if it was a principal or essential part of the entertainment, the conviction would be right." [COCKBURN, C.J.—If this place is not kept for public music, it will make no difference that the music played happened to be dance music.] The principal and main purpose of this rink was that people might come and skate. [MELLOB, J.—The expense is greatly increased by having a band, which was no doubt intended as a means of attracting persons to come to the rink.] But the music is not the main thing, it is subservient to the skating, and was intended to facilitate and aid persons in using the skates. In a circus it may be said that the music is an additional attraction equally as much as in a skating rink. The case of Hall v. Green was not a decision upon the point, and the observation of Parke, B. amounts to no more than a dictum. As to the words in the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2: "other entertainment of a like kind," they are very general words, and if this case is not within the words "music or dancing," it would be difficult to bring it within those general words.

Besley (Tickell with him) for the prosecution.—The offence is for keeping a house or place for public dancing, music, or other entertainment of a like kind. The cases suggested of music at a public dinner or in a barrack yard, and similar cases are not within the Act, as the place is not kept for public music. It is now settled that the words of the Act for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of a like kind are distributive, and that the justices may, if they think fit, grant a licence for music only. If the place is kept for the performance of public music, the number of performers is not material. In Bellis v. Beal (2 Esp. 592) the defendant kept a tavern, and had a large tea room in which was an organ, and the evidence was, that one Lowides, an organist, usually played upon it, but that other persons were permitted to play if they chose. It was contended that there was no offence against the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, and that the music was but a secondary consideration. Lord Kenyon, C.J., who tried the case, said: "The construction ought to correspond with the intention of the Legislature; it is not like the case of an inn or place of that description. Here there was a regular opening of the room from Easter to Michaelmas; there was an organist who attended regularly, whether he was paid or not makes no difference. The true construction of the Act of Parliament is, that this is a room for musical entertainments, and the defendant is therefore subject to the penalty." In Gregory v. Tuffs (6 Car. & P. 271) a man was seated on an elevated seat in the tap room of the defendant's house, and persons danced, but no money was taken for admission. This occurred on more than twelve different nights between the 1st July and the 21st Sept. In summing up the case to the jury, Lyndhurst, C. B. said: "I agree that the mere occasional or accidental use of a room for the purpose of music or dancing is not within this Act of Parliament, but the case cited does not apply, as the room there was hired by a gentleman of the Jewish persuasion for the use of his friends during the Passover, and it was therefore, for the time, his private room. I am of opinion, that to bring a case within this Act of Parliament it is not essential that the room should be used exclusively for this purpose, nor is it necessary that money should be taken for admission. One can easily understand that a person keeping a public-house would find it to his interest to have an attraction to draw persons in great numbers to his house, as it would remunerate him without his receiving money specially for admission into the room. . . . The case comes to this, are you satisfied that this room was kept by the defendant for the purpose of public dancing?" In Gregory v. Tavernor (3 Car. & P. 280) there was a room in the defendant's public-house, from 40ft. to 50ft. long, with a bar at one end, and about fifty persons were dancing on eleven different nights, the music consisting of two violins and a bass, the musicians being seated on elevated seats. Gurney, B., in summing up, said: "It is not by any means necessary that the room should have been kept for the purpose of music or dancing only. If it was continually used for those purposes it will be for you to consider whether it was not kept for them. A room may be kept for drinking, music, and dancing, but if music was one of the purposes for which it was kept it is a case within the Act of Parliament." In Hall v. Green (9 Ex. 247) an action against the proprietor of Evans's Hotel, Covent Garden, to recover a penalty for keeping a room for public music and other entertainments without a licence, Parke, B. said, "My present impression is, if the jury had been merely instructed that if they should be of opinion that the principal object for which the place was kept open was to supply refreshments, the musical entertainment being only accessory thereto, then the case would not fall within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. If there be musical entertainment regularly carried on in a house to which the public have admittance, my present opinion is that such a place is within the Act of Parliament, although the place be used principally for supplying meat, drink, and so forth, and the musical entertainment is merely collateral to that purpose." Frayling v. Messenger (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 332), and Garrett v. Messenger (ibid. 414) were then cited. In Brown v. Nugent (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 693) it was held that under the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, ss. 2, 3, justices may grant a licence for music only, and that such licence will not extend to dancing. Upon the authorities it is submitted that a licence was required, as the place was kept for the purpose of music as well as skating. Secondly, rinking is clearly an entertainment of a like kind to dancing.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Whatever may be our opinion as to the merits of this piece of legislation, we must interpret and apply it as we find it. According to the Act every house, room, garden, or other place should be licensed if kept for public dancing, music, or other entertainment of a like kind in the cities of London or Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof. Now, the jury have found the defendants guilty of keeping a place for public dancing and music as charged in the first count, and of keeping a place for public entertainment of a like kind to an entertainment for public music and dancing without a licence within the prescribed limits. Rinking may or may not assume the form and character of dancing, but there is nothing stated in the case to show what was the course pursued in this particular rink. Rinking in itself, I think, is not dancing, unless it is converted into dancing by the persons engaged in it. I think, therefore, that the conviction cannot be sustained on the first count, on the ground that there is nothing to show that dancing was carried on at this rink, the first count charging that the defendant kept a place for public dancing and music. The jury, however, may have thought that rinking was dancing, and therefore returned their verdict against the defendant on the first count. But then there is this difficulty, the jury have acquitted the defendant on the second count, which charges the defendant with having kept a place for public music without a licence, and the first count, as I have said, is for keeping a place for public dancing and music. I am of opinion that they ought to have found the defendant guilty upon the second count for keeping a place for public music without a licence, and acquitted him upon that count which charges him with keeping a place for public dancing and music without a licence. If the music was an independent part of the entertainment it is within the statute which prohibits the keeping of a place for public music within the limits of the Act without a licence. We do not, by our decision, overrule the decision in Guaglieni v. Matthews, for it is not necessary for the present case either to affirm or question that decision which proceeded on the ground that if music was not a thing for which the place was kept open, but was altogether a subordinate thing that was not within the contemplation of the Legislature in this statute. But that does not apply when music is an integral part of the entertainment, and if it is so, it is then within the statute. Looking at the facts stated in the case I do not find that the music was subordinate to skating, or necessary to assist it. Music was resorted to as a means of attracting people to the rink, and as an inducement to them to pay for admission, and that being so the case is within the statute. The jury having found the defendant not guilty of keeping a place for public music I should not like to uphold the conviction upon the first count, which is inconsistent with the acquittal upon the other, inasmuch as rinking is not necessarily dancing, and there is nothing to show that rinking as carried on in the present case was of that character. But, as to the third count, which charges the defendant with keeping a place for public entertainment of a like kind to an entertainment for public music and dancing, the entertainment must be of a like kind to dancing or music. If rinking is analogous to either it is within the statute. It certainly is not analogous to music, but it is said to be analogous to dancing. If the skates are used for dancing, and the music is subsidiary to it, then rinking is analogous to dancing. If you want music to facilitate persons while rinking to imitate dancing, then it assumes the character of dancing, and if the place is kept open for such entertainment from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m., or any other hours, it is within the mischief of the Act. In this case music was resorted to as something in addition to rinking.

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE v. HEMATITE STEEL COMPANY (LIMITED).

MELLOR, J.—I agree in almost all that has been said by the Lord Chief Justice; but at the same time, having regard to the rule applied to the construction of indictments, I do not see why the conviction may not be sustained on the first count, if the defendant has been guilty of keeping a place for either public dancing or music without a licence. I agree that, in order to sustain the conviction on the third count, the entertainment must be of a like kind to public music or dancing. Here the rinking was accompanied by music, which affects the action we are told, and it was, therefore, analogous to dancing. I also think that the music had independent attractions in this case. I, therefore, think the conviction may be sustained both on the first and third counts of the indictment.

GROVE, J.—I also am of opinion that the conviction may be sustained upon the first count as well as upon the third count. Rinking, per se, may be more analogous to dancing than skating. At first rinking was merely skating on roller skates, but by degrees it has come to bear a close proximity to dancing. It can be performed on boards, and quadrilles, waltzes, &c., are now performed on skates with rollers to assist the motion. We must look to the nature and character of the entertainment. Rinking to music on an asphalt surface or boards seems to me more analogous to dancing than to skating on ice. If the first count had stood alone I should have thought the conviction good, as the words of the statute are in the disjunctive, though in the indictment they are put in the copulative. If the defendant was guilty of keeping a place either for public music or dancing he was guilty of the offence created by the statute. It is said there is a difficulty in sustaining the conviction on the first count, as that would be inconsistent with the verdict of acquittal on the count which charges the defendant with keeping a place for public music only. That seems to me to have arisen from some misapprehension by the jury of the direction to them. Technically, however, I think the conviction was right on the first count.

LINDLEY, J.—I agree that the conviction was right on the third count if not also on the first count. The statute prohibits the keeping without licence, within certain limits, three classes of places (1) for public dancing, (2) for public music, (3) for entertainments of a like kind with public dancing or music. As to the first count, if the jury thought that rinking was dancing in skates on wheels, the conviction might be upheld. But the finding of the jury on the first count may be taken distribu-tively, and the conviction upheld if the defendant was guilty of keeping a place either for public dancing or music.

HAWKINS, J.—I agree with the Lord Chief Justice.
Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS and W. AFFLETON, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, April 11, 1877.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and BRAMWELL and BRETT, JJ.A.)

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE v. HEMATITE STEEL COMPANY (LIMITED).

Rating of iron mines—Deduction from royalties—Reservation in lease—Liability of lessor—The Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), s. 8.

By sect. 8 of the Rating Act 1874, where the lessee of a mine was before the Act exempt from being rated to any poor or other local rate, he may (unless he has specifically contracted to pay such rate in the event of the abolition of the said exemption), deduct from any rent, royalty, or dues payable by him, one half of any such rate paid by him.

The plaintiff and defendants contracted in a lease of iron mines that the rent and royalties payable by the defendants, the lessees, should be free and clear of and from all rates, taxes, tithes, rent-charges, expenses and deductions whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or of any other nature. The defendants deducted from their royalties half of the rates paid by them under this Act, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover the deduction.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that this section of the statute overruled the reservation in the lease, and that the defendants were not liable for the half of the rates which they had deducted.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Cockburn, C.J., and Lush J.), reported 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 474, where the special case and the material sections of the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), are set out.

C. Bowen (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the plaintiff.—The construction put upon 37 & 38 Vict. c. 54, s. 8, by the court below would produce injustice and inequality, for it would affect lessors and lessees of mines differently, according to whether the mines were let on longer or shorter leases. If the Legislature had intended to make existing contracts of no avail, they would have used clear language for that purpose, as in the Property Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 73. He referred to Brewster v. Kitchell, 1 Lord Raymond 317.

A. Wills, Q.C. and Edwin Jones, for the defendants, were not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This seems a very clear case. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was a perfectly proper judgment. I wish to adopt the reasons given by Cockburn, C.J., and to decide in favour of the defendants on the same grounds.

PURCELL v. SOWLER.

Libel—Report of proceedings of board of guardians—Privilege—Public interest.

A newspaper report, containing libellous matter, of proceedings at a meeting of a board of guardians is not privileged.

At the meeting of a board of guardians of a poor law union, the conduct of the medical officer of the union was discussed, and accusations of neglect of duty were made against him. A reporter for a local paper belonging to the defendants was present, and the defendants published in their paper a full account of the proceedings at the meeting. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action for libel against the defendants.

Held (affirming, but on different grounds, the judgment of the court below), that the defendants were liable, as the report, although it might be of a matter of public and general interest, contained libellous statements made "ex parte" against the plaintiff, and no rule of privilege applied to protect the publishers of it.

APPEAL from a decision of the Common Pleas Division.

The action was for libel.

Statement of claim.

1. The plaintiff was at the time of committing the grievance hereinafter mentioned, and still is, a physician and surgeon practising at Knutsford, in the county of Chester, and was and is also the duly appointed medical officer of the Knutsford Workhouse at Knutsford, which said workhouse is within the Altrincham Union for the administration of the laws for the relief of the poor.

2. The defendants were at the time of the committing of the grievance hereinafter mentioned, and still are, the printers and publishers of a daily newspaper called the Manchester Courier and Lancashire General Advertiser, printed and published at Manchester, and having a wide circulation, in particular in Lancashire and Cheshire.

3. The defendants, being such printers and publishers as aforesaid, on the 30th Dec. 1875, falsely and maliciously printed and published of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning him in his said profession of physician and surgeon, and of and concerning him in his said office of medical officer as aforesaid, in the said newspaper, the words following, that is to say: "More alleged neglect at Knutsford workhouse. At the fortnightly meeting of the Altrincham board of guardians yesterday, Mr. Fullalove, the chairman of the house committee, reported that a few days ago an inmate of the house, John Oldham, of Bollington, was taken seriously ill, and the master sent a messenger for the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff), at about seven o'clock in the morning. He (meaning thereby the plaintiff), did not arrive in forty minutes; the porter went to his (meaning thereby the plaintiff's) house, and told him (meaning thereby the plaintiff) that the man was dying, and that he should walk about the front of his (meaning thereby the plaintiff's) house until he (meaning thereby the plaintiff) came. On the visit of the porter, the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) went to the bedroom window. When the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) did arrive the man was dead. The chairman (Mr. J. Ambler) observed that, if the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) had come when first desired, he would probably have seen the man alive. Mr. Fullalove said that when the porter went to fetch him (meaning thereby the plaintiff) he was in bed. Mr. Taberer, the master of the house, said that that was the third time the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) had served him like that. On a recent occasion, a man was brought in a cab from Wilmslow at 12 o'clock at night. The doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) was sent for, but he (meaning thereby the plaintiff) did not come until a quarter-past two; he (meaning thereby the plaintiff) kept five of them waiting up two hours for him. Mr. Green, Wilmslow, said that that was perhaps the most serious charge which had been brought against the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff). A man was found to be dying, where upon a boy was despatched for the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff), and told him (meaning thereby the plaintiff) that a man was very poorly. Subsequently the porter went; and the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) paid little attention to him, although he stated that the man was dying. The fullest inquiry should be made. The case assumed a very serious aspect; and, if the case were good, the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) ought to be called upon to resign." The board decided to hold an inquiry into the charges preferred against the doctor; meaning thereby and imputing to the plaintiff thereby that the plaintiff had been and was guilty of gross misconduct in his profession of physician and surgeon as aforesaid, and in his office of medical officer as aforesaid, and had acted in his said profession and in his said office negligently, improperly, and with great cruelty; whereby the plaintiff had been and was greatly prejudiced and injured in his credit and reputation, and his profession of physician and surgeon as aforesaid, &c. The defendants admitted the allegations contained in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the plaintiff's statement, that the words set forth in paragraph 3 of the plaintiff's statement were printed and published by them, but they denied the other allegations in that paragraph contained. The defendants alleged that they were public journalists, and that the said words were printed and published by them as such public journalists, in a public journal, bona fide, without malice, and for the public benefit, and not otherwise, and were and are a correct, fair, impartial, and honest report and account of proceedings of public interest and concern. Issue joined.

At the trial before Brett, J., at the Spring Assizes of 1876 at Manchester, a verdict was by consent entered for the plaintiff, damages 40s. (with certificate), leave being reserved to move to enter a verdict for the defendants if the court should be opinion that the publication was privileged, it being admitted to be bona fide, and a correct account of what passed at the meeting described.

May 16, 1876.—Edwards, Q.C. moved accordingly to enter judgment for the defendants.

[Ct. of App.]

PURCELL v. SOWLER.

[Ct. of App.]

C. Russell, Q.C. and Bigham showed cause.

The Court (Brett, Archibald, and Lindley, JJ.) reserved judgment.

Brett, J. delivered the judgment of the court on the 28th June 1876, giving judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the proceedings of the board of guardians at Knutsford were not of general public interest, and that the publication of the report was, therefore, not privileged.

The defendants appealed from this decision.

Edwards, Q.C. for the defendants.—This is a bond fide report of what took place at a meeting of a board of guardians. It is privileged as being a report of proceedings of general public interest. In Davis v. Duncan (30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 464; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 396), which was an action for libel contained in a newspaper report of some proceedings at a parliamentary election meeting, the occasion was held privileged. A meeting of the persons charged with the administration of the poor law of a district is of still more importance to the public. In Kelly v. Turling (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 699) a dispute between an incumbent and his churchwarden as to the use of the church was held matter of public interest. He also cited

Henwood v. Harrison, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 638; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 606;

Wason v. Walter, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 409; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 78; 33 L. J. 40, Q. B.

O. Russell, Q.C. and Bigham for the plaintiff.—The report is not privileged. This is not criticism but comment. The meeting was not a public meeting, although reporters were admitted, and it is not because the meeting was convened to discuss a matter of public interest, that a publication of slanderous matter would be privileged. A statement like that about the medical officer in this case may be a perfectly proper one to be made in the board room of the guardians at Knutsford, but a newspaper has no right to publish it ex parte to the world. The privilege of reports is confined to (1) all judicial proceedings, because the public have a right to be in all the courts of justice; (2) to parliamentary proceedings because the public are present by their representatives. It is now sought to extend the privilege to reports of the proceedings of public bodies. Up to the decision in Wason v. Walter (ubi sup.) judicial proceedings only were within the privilege. The principle in Wason v. Walter should not be extended, although that case is perfectly distinct from this. All the authorities show that no such general principle of privilege on the ground of public interest, as is contended for for the defendants exists; a newspaper has no exceptional privilege. Davison v. Duncan (26 L. J. 104, Q. B.; 7 E. & B. 229) is directly in point in favour of the plaintiff. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The meeting in that case was an open one.] Yes, and that makes the case stronger than the present one. The cases cited for the defendants do not apply here. The real question is, are the proceedings of boards of guardians protected by the same privilege as applies to proceedings in courts of justice and in parliament? That question cannot be answered by enquiring whether the matter complained of was of public interest.

Edwards, Q.C. in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed, and I am very anxious to have it distinctly understood that that opinion is not based upon the grounds upon which the court below went. That judgment proceeded upon the ground that the subject matter of the present action, which is for libel contained in a report of the proceedings of a board of guardians relating to the conduct of the medical officer of the poor law union, was not a matter of public general interest. In that view I am unable to concur, and for these reasons: It appears to me that the administration of the poor law is matter of great national concern. The court below seem to have drawn a distinction between the administration of the poor law in general as a matter of public concern, and the administration of the poor law in a particular district. It seems to me that whatever is matter of national concern in the administration of any department of the government, is also matter of national concern in the local district in which that government is administered. It is one of the characteristic features of the government of this country that, instead of being centralised, very important matters of administration are submitted to the consideration of local authorities for conduct and management; there is the business of counties, and of municipal bodies in cities and boroughs, and these are, to a great extent, managed by local governments. It is not because the matter immediately under consideration is one affecting, in its immediate consequences, a particular locality only, that therefore it is not a matter of public general interest. It may be of national concern. The administration of the poor law with respect to the medical attendance of the poor is a matter of infinite moment, and, therefore, the conduct of the medical officer of a union may be of vast importance, as he has the care of the poor. I therefore do not agree with the Common Pleas Division in thinking that this matter is not one of public general interest. It is now settled law that a report of judicial proceedings is privileged. It is also settled that reports of the proceedings of the great national council, the Houses of Parliament, may be privileged, although those reports affect the credit of private persons; but the question here is whether in this case, although the proceedings generally were of public interest, the particular accusation was privileged. There are many intermediate cases which might be put. The proceedings by the corporation or the common council of the city of London, or of county magistrates at quarter sessions sitting to transact county business, and in many other cases, might reflect upon the character of a private individual, but I should be very sorry to lay down a hard and fast line that proceedings of that description might not be fully reported, although reflecting upon the conduct of some particular person. It is not necessary to lay down any such rule in this case. We are dealing here with a body of limited jurisdiction, and one to whose proceedings it is certainly not essentially necessary either by law or usage that publicity should be given. It is quite clear that the proceedings of a board of guardians are not necessarily public. They might, if they pleased, refuse to admit the reporters, and close their doors while they transacted their business, and I think that it would be the proper course to take when matters affecting the conduct of a particular person are being discussed. Here one of the newspapers was represented, and the proceedings were published. Was that publication privileged? I think there is no doubt that it was not privileged; and I think there can be no doubt whatever that if the matter had been brought before the central authority in London—the Poor Law Board—and the private character of a particular individual had been assailed, and a report published in the newspapers, that report would have been privileged. Clearly not. I think the board ought to exercise a proper discretion in conducting a discussion like this, and that their doors should have been closed. They did not exercise that discretion. The newspaper should not have published that which might be untrue, and was likely to prejudice the medical officer. Therefore, without encroaching in any degree upon the discussion of what I conceive to be a great public principle, I am content to say that that principle does not apply in this case, and I therefore think that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed, though not upon the same grounds as were there given.

[CT. OF APP.]

RABBITS v. COX.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are asked here to further extend the law of privilege. In Lord Campbell's time it seems clearly to have been supposed to have been law that the privilege of reporting extended only to the publication of proceedings in courts of law. It was supposed that proceedings in courts of law might be published because all Her Majesty's subjects might, if they chose, be present, and it was said that there was nothing wrong in putting those who were not in the position of those who were present. That rule has in my opinion been properly extended to proceedings in Parliament. The proceedings there may no doubt be distinguished from those in a court of law, because the public are only admitted to the House of Parliament when they are allowed to be present by the House. It is then said that the principle of privilege being already established which applies to protect reports in the courts of law, and the Houses of Parliament, should be extended to a variety of other kinds of bodies. I do not wish to give my opinion whether it ought to be extended to some other bodies or not, but at the same time I feel that we ought to be very careful when we are asked to extend it. I am, however, clearly of opinion that we should not extend it to the present case. The guardians had the power of excluding the public or not; I do not think they ought to be bound by the result of exercising their discretion to admit or exclude the public, but when ex parte charges are to be made affecting the character of a public officer I do not see any public convenience in holding that these charges may be made public. Such charges so made are made public I think at the risk of the person publishing them. At law this was clearly libellous. If one of the guardians himself had gone out from the meeting and talked of the charge made against the doctor so as to do him injury, I think the guardian would have been liable to an action of slander. I do not dispute the right of the newspaper to comment upon the doctor's conduct when the facts have been ascertained. Here they had not been ascertained, and it seems to me to be a very different thing from fair comment to publish charges brought against him as these were. I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

BAGGALLAY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am unable to draw any distinction between the circumstance of the present case, and those in the case of Topham v. Pick (7 H. & N. 891). Where a report containing a libel was made by a medical officer to a vestry board, and published by the defendant in his newspaper. There it was decided that the publication of the report was not privileged. The same reasoning will apply to the present case, and I do not think that the principles upon which that decision was given are interfered with by the judgment in Wason v. Walter (ubi sup.), nor do I think those principles are inconsistent with our decision in the present case.

BRAMWELL, J.A.—I am of the same opinion, and I desire to say why. The question of the right of publication in newspapers is one of great importance, because public opinion is to a great extent guided by the press, and especially by the periodical press. I do not quite agree with the reasons given in the Common Pleas Division that proceedings of this kind are not matters of public interest. I think if there had been a discussion on the conduct of the plaintiff, the facts not being in dispute, and the defendant had fairly commented upon it, that comment would be privileged. But that is not the case here. The defendants reported not what was a statement of facts, but what upon the face of it was a report of what had been reported to the guardians, and what was stated against the plaintiff in his absence, with no opportunity given him to contradict it. I think there was no duty of any kind upon the reporter to report this accusation. The guardians could well have excluded, and ought to have excluded, strangers from the room. As they did not do so, the reporter himself should have passed the matter by, but as he has not done so, but has published it to the plaintiff's injury, he must in my opinion bear the consequences.

RABBITS v. COX.

Land tax — Exemption — Site of hospital — 4 W. & M. c. 1, s. 5—38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 29.

Plaintiff was lessee of land which was the site of a hospital, existing before the Land Tax Acts 1692 and 1798, but removed by decree of the Court of Chancery in 1849, by which the land was discharged from the charitable trust.

The Act of 1692 exempted all sites of hospitals, and by the Act of 1798, s. 29, all lands belonging to any hospital which were assessed in 1692 were to be liable to be charged to land tax, and no other lands then belonging to any hospital or almshouse should be charged to land tax by that Act.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that plaintiff was exempt from the land tax.

APPEAL from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on a special case stated in an action of trespass brought against the defendant, a collector of land tax, for seizing the plaintiff's goods.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the land in possession of the plaintiff is liable to be charged and assessed by the Land Tax Commissioners to the land tax.

If the court should answer this question in the affirmative, judgment to be entered for the defendant with costs.

If in the negative, judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for 227l. 5s. 10d. with costs.

The Divisional Court (Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J.) gave judgment in favour of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

The material sections of the statutes are set out in the judgment of the court below, and the special case is set out in the report (ante, p. 447; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 834).

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), Lumley Smith with him, for the plaintiff.—The true effect of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 29, is that all lands which belonged to hospitals, almshouses, &c., at the time of the passing of 4 W. & M. c. 1, shall be for ever exempt from land tax. This is shown by the use of the word "then." The exemption is applied to the land itself: (Lord Colchester v. Kewney, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 888; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 308; 35 L. J. 204, Ex.; affirmed 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 463; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 253; 36 L. J. 172, Ex.) In that case Willes, J. anticipates the present question: (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 257.) Both reason and the exact language of the statute are favourable to the exemption. The judgment of the court below assumes that the policy of the statute was only to relieve the land while it was held for eleemosynary purposes, and omits the consideration that the charity still gets the advantage when the land is disposed of, in consequence of the higher price to be obtained for land exempt from the tax.

E. Clarke and Lyon for the defendant.—The reason for the exemption ceased when the hospital was removed, and consequently the exemption itself ought to be held to have ceased. It is clear that a private owner could not claim exemption under 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 25, which provides that nothing in the Act shall extend to charge "any hospital, or in respect of the site of the said hospital," &c., and sect. 29 must be treated as a corollary to sect. 25, as is observed in the judgment of the court below. The intention must have been the same in framing the two sections. The decision in Novello v. Toogood (1 B. & C. 554) is an instance of limitation of an exemption, apparently given by the general words of a statute, in a case where the reason of the exemption did not apply. Sect. 26 of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, by which tenants holding under hospitals are to be assessed, shows that the intention of the Act was to limit the exemption to the hospitals themselves.

The Solicitor-General was not called on to reply.

JAMES, L.J.—It appears to me that we must reverse the judgment of the court below. I cannot get over the plain words of sect. 29 of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, which provides, "That all such lands . . . belonging to any hospital or almshouse . . . as were assessed in the fourth year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary shall be and are hereby adjudged liable to be charged," &c. If the section had stopped there I think there would have been a good deal to be said for the case of the appellant, on the ground that the section meant that those lands only should be charged which were charged in the fourth year of the reign of William and Mary, and no others. But the section goes on to provide "that no other lands . . . whatsoever then belonging to any hospital or almshouse . . . shall be charged, taxed, or assessed by virtue of this Act . . . anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." This seems to me to be as plain a provision that these lands shall not be charged as could possibly be framed; it charges land that was charged in the reign of William and Mary, and expressly exempts other land, and this is other land than land that was in that reign charged. But it is said on behalf of the respondent that we must read sect. 29 together with sect. 25 of the same Act. I cannot follow that argument, for sect. 29 applies to a new subject and uses additional words. I see no reason why we should depart from the plain words of the Act. The exemption is for the benefit of the charity if the land passes into the hands of a purchaser, and does not apply (as has been decided in Lord Colchester v. Kewney, ubi sup.) if a new site for a hospital or almshouse is purchased. I am of opinion, therefore, that the land is exempt.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I was impressed by the able argument of Mr. Lyon on 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 25, but I cannot follow the argument that sect. 29 is only a proviso intended to qualify the terms of sect. 25. There are intermediate provisions in the Act, and the phraseology of the two sections is distinct. The words of sect. 29 are perfectly general.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

BRETT, L.J.—I cannot see that these lands are outside the words of sect. 29. I decline to construe an Act of Parliament according to my views of what is right or wrong where the words are plain. The words of the Act clearly comprehend this case. If we look at 4 Will. & M. c. 1, s. 25 and 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, ss. 25 and 29, we may observe an alteration in the frame of the enactments. The last section treats in terms of lands, &c., which had been assessed in the reign of William and Mary, and provides that they shall be charged, and then it goes on to provide by a negative enactment that no other lands shall be charged, and there is no reference to the persons or corporations in whose hands the lands might be. The word "then" is important. Mr. Lyon could not deal with it in his argument, but we must give a meaning to it, and apply it to the time when the statute of William and Mary was passed.

Judgment reversed.

SCOTT v. LEGG.

Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), s. 9; s. 27, r. 4; s. 28, r. 2—Addition to old building.

By the Metropolitan Building Act, s. 9, any alteration, addition, or other work made upon an old building is to the extent of such alteration, &c., subject to the provisions of the Act, which does not

[Ct. of App.]

SCOTT v. LEE.

[Ct. of App.]

otherwise apply to old buildings. By sect. 27, r. 4, every warehouse containing more than 216,000 cubic feet must be divided by party walls in such manner that the contents of each division shall not exceed such number of feet. By sect. 28, r. 2, "no buildings shall be united, if when so united they will, considered as one building only, be in contravention of any of the provisions of the Act."

The appellant, by taking down one of the external walls of an old building containing more than 216,000 cubic feet, made an addition containing less than 216,000 cubic feet.

Held (reversing the decision of the court below), that the addition was not within sect. 28, r. 2, and need not be separated from the old building by a party wall.

APPEAL from the decision of the Court of Appeal from Inferior Courts on a special case stated pursuant to the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 106, 107.

The appellant had built an addition to a brewery, which was an old building erected before the passing of the Act, and contained more than 216,000 cubic feet. The addition contained less than 216,000 feet. A magistrate made an order on the appellant under sect. 46 commanding him to erect a party wall on the ground that two buildings had been united within sect. 28, rule 2, and the whole contained more than 216,000 cubic feet, contrary to sect. 27, rule 4. The Court of Appeal from Inferior Courts (Cleasby, B. and Grove, J.) held that the order was rightly made.

The special case is set out in the report in the court below (ante p. 386; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 487).

Benjamin, Q.C. (Glyn with him) for the appellant.—The court below have placed a wrong construction on the Act. The intention was to apply the Act only to new buildings (sect. 7), but in order to prevent evasion the definition of new buildings was extended by sects. 10 and 11; but in sect. 28, r. 2, it appears from the context (as required by sect. 7) that new buildings are not there referred to, for the provision as to uniting buildings presupposes the previous existence of two separate buildings. This is only an addition to an old building, not the union of two previously existing buildings. [BRAMWELL, L.J. referred to Sillem v Thornton (3 E. & B. 868; 23 L. J. 362, Q. B.)] That was a case of insurance, and the risk was altered.

F. M. White, Q.C. (Biron with him) for the respondent.—The case is brought within sect. 27, r. 4, by sect. 28, r. 2, and sect. 9, which makes an addition to an old building subject to the regulations of the Act. According to the construction contended for on behalf of the appellant, the Act could easily be evaded in the manner referred to in the judgment of the court below.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to judgment. We cannot depart from the plain meaning of the words of the statute, because it may appear that there is a casus omissus, and we must remember that the provisions for the public safety contained in the statute were made subject to existing interests. By sect. 9 any alteration, addition, or other work, unless done for the purpose of necessary repair, and not affecting the construction of any external or party wall, is subject to the regulations of the Act; by sect. 27, r. 4, every warehouse or other building used for trade or manufacture containing more than 216,000 cubic feet shall be divided by party walls; and by sect. 28, r. 2, no buildings shall be united so that considered as one building only they shall be in contravention of the Act. Now this appears to be as clearly an alteration by way of addition to an existing building as anything could be. If it were held to be a union of two buildings, it would follow that a man might take down a wall on his own premises so as to bring in a few feet of vacant ground and add that much space to his warehouse by rebuilding the wall a little further forward, and be held to have united two buildings. It would be straining the words of the Act in an unwarrantable manner to hold such an alteration as that to be a union of two buildings. If it had been intended to bring the present case within the rule as to party walls the Legislature could have made provision for the purpose. It could have been said in plain words that if the aggregate of the old building and the new part added to it shall be more than 216,000 cubic feet, the building shall be divided by party walls. In my opinion the appellant is entitled to succeed, and the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was the intention of the Legislature to draw a distinction between addition and union, and therefore sect. 9 was framed, which in this case would apply to the addition and to the addition alone. Therefore it is suggested on behalf of the respondent that the building comes within sect. 28; r. 2 of that section is the only one which it is contended can be treated as applicable. It is true that if we can regard this as two buildings which have been united the contents are more than 216,000 feet, but I am of opinion that this is not so, and the rule means two buildings which were existing before.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion; but I cannot quite agree with Mr. Benjamin when he says that there might be a new building added to one already existing so that the Act would not apply. I think that here there is not a new building; but if there were, there would be an obligation to have a party wall. It would follow from Mr. White's argument that, if an old wall were taken down and a few feet added to an already existing building, that would be within the Act. But it was intended that additions and alterations might be made without being subject to the provision with regard to party walls, and this is clearly an addition and alteration.

BRETT, L.J.—This case does not come within sect. 28, r. 2, for there were no two buildings which could be united, and it is not within sect. 27, r. 4, because the operation of that rule is confined by sect. 9 to the addition only, and here the addition taken by itself is not large enough to come within the rule.

Judgment reversed.

LUCKRAFT v. PRIDHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Reported by J. E. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before Vice-Chancellor HALL.)

Tuesday, April 24, 1877.

LUCKRAFT v. PRIDHAM.

Charity—Will—Devise of proceeds of real estate to charity—Mortmain Act—Previous special Act authorising devise of real estate—Retrospective operation of Mortmain Act.

A testator bequeathed the proceeds of the residus of real and personal estate to the "different charities of Plymouth." The only charity which claimed was the guardians of the poor who were incorporated by an Act of the 6th year of Queen Anne, which empowered them to receive testamentary gifts of real estate.

Held, that this power was taken away by the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), and that the principle that the powers and privileges given by a special Act were not taken away by the provisions of a general Act was inapplicable to the present case.

WILLIAM ROBERT PHILLIPS made his will, dated 28th May 1874, whereby, after directing payment of his debts and certain legacies, he devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to Glinn Pridham and William Henry Luke, upon trusts, subject to a discretion vested in them, to convert and to stand possessed of the moneys to arise from such conversion, and then "upon trust, on the realisation of my said estate, I give and bequeath one half of the proceeds thereof to the different charities of Plymouth, the amount and charities to be at the discretion of my said trustees." The other moiety, after the payment of certain pecuniary legacies, he directed to be divided among several persons, of whom the plaintiff, Frederick Luckraft, was one.

The testator died on the 2nd Jan. 1876, and his will was duly proved by his executors, the defendants. The testator was entitled at his death to considerable real and personal estate, which was being administered by the court.

The case now came to be heard on a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate. The summons was taken out by Mrs. Luckraft, the testator's sole next of kin, and John Phillips, his heir-at-law; and the only question was with reference to the bequest of the moiety of the proceeds of the estate bequeathed to the Plymouth charities. Of all those charities the guardians of the poor alone claimed to be entitled to take lands in mortmain. They were incorporated by an Act of the 6th Queen Anne, by which it was enacted (inter alia) that the "guardians of the poor of the town of Plymouth, in the county of Devon . . . shall and may, without licence in mortmain, purchase, take, or perceive any lands, tenements, or hereditaments of the gift, alienation, or devise of any person or persons whatsoever having a right, and not being otherwise disabled, to grant alien or devise the same, who are hereby without further licence enabled to give, transfer, grant, or devise any such lands or hereditaments unto or for the use or benefit of the said corporation." The question was whether this special Act was repealed by the Mortmain Act subsequently passed—9 Geo. 2. c. 36.

Hastings, Q.C. and Chubb for the plaintiff in the action.

Eddis, Q.C. and F. Webb for the defendants, the executors.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Whiteford for the next of kin and heir-at-law.—This is not a charity in the proper sense of the term. The object of the Act was to provide for that being done which the guardians of the poor, independently of it, were obliged to do. It provides for "receiving donations and for the maintenance of the poor, and for receiving charities for the general purposes of the Act." This case does not come within the description of a charity which is laid down in Attorney-General v. Corporation of Exeter (2 Russ. 45 and 3 Russ. 395). It is there laid down that where there are poor in a place who do not claim parish relief, they do not trench upon the incomes of the rich. It is otherwise with those who do claim such relief. And it was held that where the poor of Exeter were provided for by particular donations, those poor only were included who got nothing from the rates. Where a person gives to charities he means only such charities as are independent of the provision which the law makes for the poor, or of any substitute for the same. Next, supposing this so-called charity to be within the description of the legatees intended to take, the question arises whether it can take land, or anything savouring of the realty. The Mortmain Act clearly affects this charity, as is shown by the case of Queen Anne's Bounty. It was recognised that the Mortmain Act took away the power of receiving lands from Queen Anne's Bounty, as it was thought necessary to pass a special Act exempting it from the provisions of the Mortmain Act. See Widmore v. Woodroffe (Amb. 636). Queen Anne's Bounty was reconstituted by 43 Geo. 3, c. 7. A similar provision applies to the British Museum, which has power to receive land to the extent of 500l. See the case of the Trustees of the British Museum v. White (2 S. & S. 594), where a devise to the British Museum was held within the Mortmain Act, as was every devise for a public purpose, whether local or general. What is there to distinguish this from the cases referred to? In the absence of any subsequent Act re-establishing the Act by which this charity was empowered to take lands, that Act must be taken to have been repealed by the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. See also Mogg v. Hodges, 2 Ves. sen. 52.

Hemming, Q.C. and Dryden, for the charity.—The general rule, in construing local and private Acts is, that where by a particular statute special and circumscribed powers are given applicable only to the circumstances of that statute, such powers are not taken away by the general provisions of a general public Act. That principle is established by a large number of cases. See London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Limehouse Board of Works (3 K. & J. 123). There Sir Foulke Greville's case is referred to, where it is said: "These last general statutes did not repeal the said statute. . . for it is a special statute," and "generalia specialibus non derogant." To the same effect, on p. 129, Lord Cottenham's judgment is referred to in A. G. v. Eastern Counties Railway Co. (2 Rail. Co. 823). So, too, in Thorpe v. Adams (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 125, 135), Bovill,

[CHAN. DIV.]

LUCKRAFT v. PRIDHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

C.J. says: "But the general principle to be applied to the construction of Acts of Parliament is, that a general Act is not to be construed to repeal a previous particular Act, unless there is some express reference to the previous legislation on the subject, or unless there is some necessary inconsistency in the two Acts standing together." The principle is even more broadly stated in the recent case of Taylor v. Corporation of Oldham (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696; L. Rep. 4 Ch. D. 395), where the Master of the Rolls says that the rule applies not only when the general and the special provisions are in different Acts, but even when they are in the same Act; the special provisions must be taken as exceptions. In our Act there are not only negative words, excluding other Acts, but positive powers to receive. If the Mortmain Act had recited that whereas certain charities (naming them) are now enabled to take lands, and whereas it is desirable they should no longer be so—the Act reconstituting Queen Anne's Bounty was not passed because difficulties arose about its receiving lands, but for other causes which are mentioned in the Act—if that had been the difficulty it would have been specially mentioned. The Act practically says, "The powers now existing and conferred by Queen Anne, are continued." According to the other side, it ought to be, "the powers conferred by Queen Anne, and since taken away by 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, are re-created." The purpose of the Act was to clear up any doubts, ex abundanti cautela, just as private Acts have been procured to give powers of sale to persons already possessing them. [HALL, V.C.—But Middleton v. Olitheron (3 Ves. 734), decided that bequests to Queen Anne's Bounty were void, because the money was to be laid out in land.] That was in consequence of the rules made after the Mortmain Act by the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; by those rules, which of course were subject to the Mortmain Act, though the Act itself was not, the society could only lay out its money in lands. That does not prove that the Mortmain Act repealed the Queen Anne's Bounty Act. Besides, the Act of Geo. 3 may have been passed because testators might be deterred from devising lands to the Bounty from the mistaken opinion that it was subject to 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. See also Lyn v. Wyn (Bridg. C. P. 122, 127), referred to in Thorpe v. Adams (sup.).

HALL, V.C.—I am of opinion that the two charities are unable to take the benefit of this gift. The question is one which, as it appears to me, depends upon whether the Statute of Mortmain (9 Geo. 2), ought or ought not to be restricted in its construction to cases in which there has not been provision made in some previous Act of Parliament for testators bequeathing or devising property for the benefit of some specific charities. It appears to me that the statute of 9 Geo. 2 is a general law which was meant to apply to all his Majesty's subjects in reference to making dispositions in favour of charities such as are there described. The law was applicable to everybody, whether they selected one charity or another. It is a law for all, and not a law only for those testators who intended or desired, when the charities were languishing and so forth, to give their property to this or that particular charity or others in the same position; they were meant to be protected generally against those dispositions, whether fettered by any specific charter or by any particular Act of Parliament passed long before when a different view was taken by the Legislature, and a different policy was guiding the Legislature with reference to the law generally. That being my view, the case seems to me to be entirely without the scope of the general reasoning and argument which has been addressed to me upon the construction of statutes, that where there is a statute giving particular privileges to a particular body, and so forth, you shall construe a subsequent statute as not embracing under general provisions that which would detract and take away from the special privileges given before. So, in like manner, when you have a particular statute applicable to merchants or a particular class, and then a general law which would embrace those persons taken as part of the public generally, there being a specific law as to those particular persons answering a certain description, you will not apply subsequent legislation to them, unless, from the nature of the subsequent legislation, they fairly come within the scope of the object and purpose of the Act of Parliament. As I said before, all his Majesty's subjects came under the provisions of the statute of Geo. 2. in reference to the protection given to them against their improvident and improper disposition of property. That being so, it seems to me the case is clearly within the Act of Parliament. But it is said that the case is varied by reason of the provisions of the subsequent Acts relating to this corporation. Now, I do not take that view at all of the effect of these subsequent Acts. The first of the subsequent Acts—that of the 32 Geo. 2—is an Act to explain and amend the former Act, which, after reciting the former Act, and not reciting this particular clause enabling testators to give, states certain inconveniences about the mode of raising the moneys which were necessary, and which had been found to exist in practice. Then it provides the mode of management by its officers, and then it recites that there was an Act of Parliament lately passed, making provision for amending certain laws relating to rogues and so forth, and then it proceeds thus: "Therefore, for providing proper relief and redress in the premises, he it enacted" first of all, that the guardians of the poor are to be empowered to raise 2000*l.*, and then it gives directions as to the application of that money. Then it contains provisions to meet the other particular difficulties which I have pointed out, and having dealt with those and the directions as to rating, it proceeds to provide this: "And be it further enacted, that the said former Act of Parliament of the said sixth year of her late Majesty Queen Anne, and all and every the clauses, powers, articles, matters, and things therein contained, and not hereby varied, altered, or otherwise explained, shall be, and the same are hereby continued, and shall be and remain in force as fully and effectually as if this Act had not been made, and shall be executed with respect to the matters herein contained as fully and amply as if such clauses, powers, articles, matters, and things were with such alterations or variations herein re-enacted with respect to this Act." That is to say, those former powers and articles and things are to be "executed with respect to the matters herein contained" there being no "matter herein contained," which in any way enables testators to give anything which they could not by the law, as I construe it, then give. There is nothing of the kind, and therefore this is merely applying the working machinery and provisions of the former Act to the new provisions and the new machinery created by this Act. It does not re-enact the clause so as to bring it down to that date. Then the next Act of Parliament to which I will refer is the Act of the 53 Geo. 3. The titles of all these Acts do not point to doing any such thing as is here contended for. But passing away from the mere title of the Act, we get a recital of the rates, and so forth: that the number of poor have increased, that provisions are dearer, and that "it is found that the sum of 1500*l.*, or so much thereof as hath been or could be levied and raised under the provisions of the said recited Acts, together with the annual income of the real and personal estate entrusted to and vested in the said guardians of the said poor, is greatly insufficient to answer the purposes for which the same were intended, so that large additional rates and assessments are annually wanted to carry the purposes of the said Acts into execution," and so forth. Then there is a recital that they have been obliged to borrow money, and that it is expedient that the powers and provisions of the former Act should be altered and amended. Then it recites that "it would tend to the equalisation and better collection of the said rates, if additional powers were given to the said corporation for assessing and collecting such rates; and it is also expedient that the said corporation should be enabled to discharge their present debt, and that additional powers should be given to them for employing, maintaining, regulating, and managing the poor under their care agreeably to the purport and intent of the said recited Acts, and that they should be empowered to levy and raise such further yearly sum or sums of money as are hereinafter mentioned," for the purpose of carrying the Act into execution. Then it recites that "such beneficial purposes cannot be effected without the aid and authority of Parliament." Then comes the enactment authorising them to assess, levy, and so forth, and then you have got the clause as in the former Act (I have passed on to the last Act instead of to the next), which Mr. Dryden has attempted to make out to be more favourable to him; but it is substantially the same. I think I must read the clause in reference to the other provisions of the Act, and all that the Act says is, that the old Act and its provisions "shall be of full force and effect, and shall be as good, valid, and effectual to all intents and purposes whatever, for carrying this Act into execution, as if the same had been repeated." So that it is merely keeping that on foot for the purpose of carrying into effect the new Act of Parliament. Now with regard to the intervening Act, which I have not read, it is not necessary to go through it, because it is substantially the same as the first; that is to say, the new Act and the provisions in the old Act are to be executed with respect to the matters therein contained, as if the clauses were with the alterations therein contained inserted with respect to this Act. It appears to me that these provisions do not at all assist the decision in this case, and it was never intended by a side wind to alter what was the general law, so as to enable all testators to give whatever they thought proper to these charities contrary to the general law. Then, in addition to that, it appears to me that Wigmore v. Woodroffe (Ambler's Reps. 636), and the case of Middleton v. Olitherow (3 Vesey), and the cases there referred to, are authorities specially applicable to this case—for this reason, that it seems to have been taken for granted, and decided over and over again, with regard to Queen Anne's Bounty, that the power of their taking land under the first Act of Parliament had become inoperative by reason of the statute of Geo 2, and therefore they got a new Act of Parliament to enable them to take and hold property in the manner specified in the new Act. The consequence is, that this fund must be distributed on the footing of the invalidity of these charitable gifts.

REG. v. TRIMBLE.

Nuisance—Order to abate—Premises of another person—38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, ss. 94 and 96.

By an order of justices under the Public Health Act 1875, it was found that on land the property of a certain person named a nuisance existed, viz., a foul ditch, caused by refuse water and offensive liquid from an adjoining brewery, and that this nuisance was caused by the act or default of the defendant as owner and occupier of the brewery, and it was ordered that the defendant, within three months, should abate the nuisance, and for that purpose should execute such works and do all such things as might be necessary so that the same should no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health.

Upon a rule for certiorari, on the ground that the defendant was not the occupier of the premises on which the nuisance was proved to exist, and that he had no power or authority from the owner to enter on the premises for any purpose whatever.

Held, that the order must be quashed.

A RULE nisi had been obtained on behalf of the defendant, Mr. Edward Trimble, to bring up by certiorari the order of two justices of the County of Cumberland.

The following was the order:

To Mr. Edward Trimble, the owner and occupier of a certain brewery and brewery premises situate at Dalston, in the District under the Public Health Act 1875, of the Carlisle Union Rural Sanitary Authority.

Cumberland to wit.—Cumberland Ward.—Whereas, on the 11th Nov. 1876, complaint was made before Thomas William Prevost, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the county of Cumberland, by George Monney, of Carlisle, in the said county of Cumberland, clerk to the Carlisle Union Rural Sanitary Authority, on behalf of the said Rural Sanitary Authority, that in and upon certain land the property of John Richardson, situate at Dalston in the District under the Public Health Act 1875, of the Carlisle Union Rural Sanitary Authority.

The following nuisance then existed, viz., a foul ditch caused by an accumulation of washings from beer barrels and other refuse water and offensive liquid, which was then a nuisance or injurious to health, and that the said nuisance was caused by the act or default of Edward

Q.B. Div.] SOUTHAMPTON GASLIGHT AND COKE COMPANY v. SOUTHAMPTON GUARDIANS. [Q.B. Div.]

Trimble of Dalston, aforesaid, as owner and occupier of certain brewery premises there situate and adjoining thereto. And whereas Edward Trimble, the owner and occupier of the said brewery premises with the meaning of the said Public Health Act 1874, hath this day appeared before us, two of Her Majesty's justices of peace acting in and for the Petty Sessional Division of Cumberland Ward in the said county of Cumberland, to answer the matter of the said complaint. Now, on proof here had before us that the nuisance so complained of doth exist on the said premises, and is injurious to health; and that the same is caused by the act or default of the said Edward Trimble, the owner and occupier of the said brewery premises. We, in pursuance of the said Act, do order the said Edward Trimble, the owner and occupier of the said brewery premises, and being the person by whose act the said nuisance is caused, within three months from the service upon him of this our order, or a true copy thereof, according to the said Act, to abate the said nuisance, and for that purpose to execute such works, and to do all such things as may be necessary, so that the same shall no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health as aforesaid."

The following was the affidavit of Edward Trimble upon whose application the rule for certiorari was granted upon the justice who made the before mentioned order:

I am not the occupier of the premises on which the said nuisance mentioned and referred to in the order of justices made in this matter, dated the 2nd Dec. 1876 (a copy whereof is exhibited to my affidavit sworn by me in this matter on the 4th inst.), was proved to exist, and I have no power or authority to enter on the said premises for any purpose whatsoever; and the said order cannot be carried out except by my entering upon and executing certain works on the said premises which I am not authorised to do by John Richardson, the owner thereof, or his tenant.

By the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 91, amongst other things: (2) Any pool, ditch, gutter, watercourse, privy, urinal, cesspool, drain, or ash-pit so foul or in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health"; (4), "Any accumulation or deposit which is a nuisance or injurious to health, shall be deemed to be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily in manner provided by this Act."

By sect. 94:

On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance, the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance, the nuisance arises or continues, or if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose: Provided (first) that where the nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, or where there is no occupation of the premises, notice under this section shall be served on the owner; (secondly), That where the person causing the nuisance cannot be found, and it is clear that the nuisance does not arise or continue by the act, default, or sufferance of the owner or occupier of the premises, the local authority may themselves abate the same without further order.

By sect. 95:

If the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof within the time specified, or if the nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice is, in the opinion of the local authority, likely to recur on the same premises, the local authority shall cause a complaint relating to such nuisance to be made before a justice, and such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person on whom the notice was served to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction.

By sect. 96:

If the court is satisfied that the alleged nuisance exist or that, although abated, it is likely to recur on the same premises, the court shall make an order on such person requiring him to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice, or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order, and to do any works necessary for that purpose; or an order prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance, and directing the execution of any works necessary to prevent the recurrence; or an order both requiring abatement and prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance. The court may, by their order, impose a penalty not exceeding five pounds on the person on whom the order is made, and shall also give directions as to the payment of all costs incurred up to the time of hearing or making the order for abatement or prohibition of the nuisance.

Crompton showed cause.—The justices recite, as a fact, in their order, that the nuisance complained of "is caused by the act or default of the said Edward Trimble," and then order him to abate the nuisance; the order may well be read to direct him only to do so much towards abating the nuisance as, by remedying his own act or default, he can accomplish. An order under these sections was set aside in Mayor of Scarborough v. Rural Sanitary Authority of Scarborough (L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 344, on the ground that the defendants were not occupiers of the field where the nuisance collected, and could not be required to do what might be illegal; but it was clear, on the face of the order in that case, that the occupiers of the field were the only persons who could obey it; the words were "within one calendar month from the date of their order, or a true copy thereof, to abate the nuisance by covering over or disinfecting the deposit, or so much thereof as then remained in the field, so that the same should no longer remain a nuisance or injurious to health." [MELLOR, J.—That order also prohibited the recurrence of the nuisance, and the court held that so far it was good and valid. Why was not this order so framed under the 96th section?] COCKBURN, C.J.—Or why was it not made upon the owner of the premises?

SOUTHAMPTON GASLIGHT AND COKE COMPANY (apps.) v. SOUTHAMPTON GUARDIANS OF THE POOR (resps.).

Costs of reference on appeal to sessions—Award made judgment of court—Taxation of costs out of sessions—12 & 13 Vict. c. 45 (Baines' Act), s. 13.

Where the parties consent to a reference at quarter sessions under Baines' Act, and it is one of the terms of the reference that the arbitrator shall have power over costs, it is an implied term of the reference that the costs may be taxed out of sessions, if such be the usual practice.

By s. 13 of Baines' Act, a court of quarter sessions may order, with consent of parties, the matter of an appeal to be referred to an arbitrator, whose award may be "entered as the judgment of the court, and shall be as binding and effectual as if given by the said court."

An appeal against a poor-rate was ordered to be referred to an arbitrator, whose award should be entered as the judgment of the court, and in whose discretion the costs of the appeal and reference and award should be. The arbitrator awarded that the rate be affirmed, and the costs paid by the appellants. At the next sessions judgment was entered accordingly, but nothing was said as to the taxation of costs. The costs were taxed out of sessions, that being the usual practice:

Held, that the taxation was regular, and a rule to quash the order of sessions, that the award be entered as a judgment, and the costs paid by the appellants, discharged.

This was a rule to quash an order of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the Borough of Southampton and county of the town of Southampton, whereby it was ordered that the award of an arbitrator appointed under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 13, in the matter of an appeal against a poor-rate, should be entered as the judgment of the court, and that certain costs should be paid by the appellants to the respondents.

The following was the order of reference, which was made at the Epiphany Sessions 1876:—

At this court the several appeals entered at the last general quarter sessions of the peace holden in and for the borough and county of the town of Southampton, on the 5th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1875, coming now before this court consolidated as one appeal, and the matter of the said appeal having been in part argued and debated by Mr. Barrow, Mr. Castle, Mr. McCalmont, of counsel for the appellants, and Mr. Matthews, Q.C., Mr. Bullen, and Mr. Temple Cook, of counsel for the respondents, it is ordered, by consent of the counsel for the respective parties, that this appeal be further respited, and that the same be referred to arbitration to George Fownall, Esq., with power to the arbitrator to state a special case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, on any point on which he may be required by either party so to do. And that the award of the arbitrator be entered as the judgment of the court at the first practicable sessions after the meeting thereof, or after the decision on such case (if any). The costs of the appeal and reference and award to be in the discretion of the arbitrator, and the costs of the case (if any) to be in the discretion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. The appellants undertaking to give inspection of all accounts and books, with power to take copies.

By the Court, ED. COXWELL.

The arbitrator by his award dated 10th July 1876, awarded that the rate be affirmed, and that the costs of the appeal and the reference be paid by the appellants. At the Michaelmas Sessions, 1876, the court was moved on behalf of the appellants to further respite the appeal to the Epiphany Sessions in order to obtain the decision of the High Court on a point of law raised before the arbitrator, but the court refused this motion. An order in the following terms (after reciting the reference and subsequent proceedings) was then drawn up:

It is ordered on the motion of Mr. Bullen that the award of the said arbitrator be entered as the judgment of this court, and that the said rate and assessment be affirmed, and that the costs of the said appeal and reference, and of the said award, and all costs incurred by the respondents consequent on the motion now made by Mr. MacCalmont on behalf of the appellants, and the opposition thereto by Mr. Bullen on behalf of the respondents (*the said costs amounting together to the sum of 563*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.) be paid by the appellants to the respondents.

The words in italics were added in the amended order afterwards drawn up and served.

From the affidavit of one of the managing clerks of Messrs. Bircham, the solicitors for the appellants, it appeared that this order was sealed and served by the respondent's solicitors on the appellant's solicitors after the court of quarter sessions had ceased to be sitting, or to hold legal sessions, or to be in any way acting. The costs were taxed on the 22nd Feb. 1876, when the sessions were not being held, and there was a protest, on the part of the appellants, against such taxation. An amended order, obtained on the 15th March 1877 (which differed from the former order in mentioning the amount of costs), was drawn up by the Clerk of the Peace without any further proceedings having been previously had before the court itself. No objection had been made in court on the part of the appellants, to a taxation out of sessions, and there was some evidence that such a taxation was the usual practice of the sessions.

The following sections of Baines' Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45) are material:—

5. Upon any appeal to any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace, the court, before whom the same shall be brought, may, if it think fit, order and direct the party or parties against whom the same shall be decided to pay to the other party or parties such costs and charges as may, to such court, appear just and reasonable, such costs to be recoverable in the manner provided for the recovery of costs upon an appeal against an order or conviction by an Act passed in the twelfth year of Her Majesty's reign, intitled "an Act to facilitate the Performance of the Duties of Justices of the Peace out of Sessions within England and Wales with respect to Summary Convictions and Orders."

13. It shall be lawful for any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace, before which any appeal (except against a summary conviction, or an order in bastardy, or any proceeding under or by virtue of any of the statutes relating to Her Majesty's revenue of excise or customs, stamps, taxes, or post office) shall be brought, to order with consent of the parties or their attorneys, that the matter or matters of such appeal be referred to arbitration to such person or persons, and in such manner and on such terms as the said court shall think reasonable and proper; and such order may be made a rule of the Court of Queen's Bench on the application of either party; and the award of the arbitrator or arbitrators, or umpirage of the umpire, may, on motion by either party at the sessions next or next but one after such award or umpirage shall have been finally made and published, or after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on any motion for setting aside the same, be entered as the judgment of the court of general or quarter sessions in the appeal, and shall be as binding and effectual to all intents as if given by the said court: Provided always that the Court of Queen's Bench may, if it think fit, on application within the term next after the making and publication of such award or umpirage, either refer the case back again to the same arbitrator, arbitrators, or umpire, or wholly set aside the award or umpirage already made, and may, in the latter event, order the court of general or quarter sessions to enter continuance and hear the appeal.

18. In all cases where any order shall be made by any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace, it shall be lawful for the Court of Queen's Bench or for any judge of that court at chambers, either in term or vacation, upon the application of any person entitled to enforce such order, and upon production of a copy of such order under the hand of the clerk of the peace or his deputy, and upon proof of refusal or neglect to obey such order, to order and direct such order of the court of general or quarter sessions to be removed into the said court of Queen's Bench, and thereupon such order shall be of the same force and effect, and may be enforced in the same manner as a rule made by the said Court of Queen's Bench; and all the reasonable costs and charges attendant upon such application and removal shall be recoverable in like manner as if the same were part of such order.

consenting parties to the taxation being had out of sessions according to the ordinary practice. In Freeman (app.) v. Read (resp.) (30 L. J. 123, M. C.; 9 C. B., N. S., 301), the judgment in which was based on R. v. Shrewsbury and Hereford Railway Company (25 L. T. Rep., O. S., 65), an application was made to justices to enforce payment of a rate pursuant to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 5, and the rate was confirmed on appeal, subject to a case. Costs were agreed to be taxed out of court, and it was held that, although there was no express order of sessions for the payment of costs, such order was tacitly supplied by a rule of practice known to both parties; and, further, that it was not competent to the appellant to object that the taxation had taken place out of sessions, as that had been brought about by his own consent. They also referred to M'Intyre, Q.C. and W. Lawson, for the appellants, supported the rule, and relied chiefly on R. v. Long (ubi sup.) in which case it was held that where the recorder of a borough confirmed an order of removal with costs under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 82, but without specifying the amount, a taxation of such costs after the end of sessions was irregular, although the amount was submitted to the recorder (after the termination of sessions) and approved by him. They also cited

R. v. Middlesex Judges, 40 L. J. 109, M. C.;

Gay v. Matthews, 33 L. J. 14, M. C.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. It is clear to my mind that the object of the Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, ss. 13 and 18, was to obtain the opinion of a skilled person in matters involving considerations of account and other difficult questions. The present was just the kind of case for the reference prescribed by the statute, and it was referred to Mr. Pownall, a gentleman thoroughly qualified to decide it. To him the appeal was referred, and he also had power, which he would not have had unless it had been given expressly by the reference, to award costs. This power he exercised in favour of the respondents. But it is now said that although the reference was had by consent of the parties, and by order of sessions, that the respondents are not to have their costs because they were taxed when the sessions were not sitting. I think it was never in contemplation of the parties that the costs should be taxed in sessions, but only that they should be taxed in proper form, which was done. The statute seems to show that although the judgment must be entered as the judgment of the court, it is not necessary that the court should give any particular direction as to the taxation of costs. The appellants, therefore, are precluded from taking the objection. It is in evidence, moreover, that it is the practice to tax costs out of sessions; and although it is suggested on the other side that there is not enough business at these particular sessions on which to found a practice, I think that is not sufficient.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. If these costs had been given under sect. 5, and nothing had been done by the parties to avoid the effect of that section, no doubt the taxation would have been invalid. [The learned judge read sect. 5 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, and proceeded.] It has been decided (Freeman v. Read, ubi sup.) that these words have the effect of making the taxation of costs the judicial act of the court, so that the taxation must, prima facie, be during sessions. The present case, however, arises under sect. 13 [section read]. Now it was one of the terms of the reference in this case that the costs were to be in the discretion of the arbitrator. In saying this the parties did not express all that they intended, but left something to be inferred by implication. The order of reference must be read as if it had expressly provided that the costs were to be taxed in the ordinary way by the clerk of the peace, and all objections, if any, to this implied term of the reference ought to have been made at the sitting of the court. Rule discharged with costs.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF ESSEX.

Distress warrant for rate—Rule to justices—Unauthorised purposes—Failure to appeal—Excess of amount.

By a local Act of 1827 the owners of certain Abbey lands in Essex were empowered to make rates in respect of their lands, and to apply them to the repair of certain roads, causeways, and bridges which they had to maintain. They might enforce rates charged or imposed by virtue of the Act by distress warrant upon a defaulter provided he was first summoned to appear before a justice to show cause for his neglect or refusal to pay such rates. They might make a composition with the neighbouring trustees of roads for the payment of a certain sum of money annually or otherwise for repairing so much of the said roads as were in their district. Any person aggrieved by the rates might appeal to Quarter Sessions, and justices might amend without quashing the rate.

By a local Act of 1876 these owners were empowered to pay a large sum of money to a local board for the future repair of the roads in its district; and upon such payment and that of all other liabilities the owners were to be discharged from their duties to repair these roads, and the previous Act was to be repealed.

A month before the passing of the last Act, the said owners made a rate for an amount to cover certain liabilities under the Act of 1827, and also the money to be paid to the local board; but there was nothing in the rate itself to show it included this latter sum of money. The demand for payment referred to both the said local Acts, but did not give the date of the latter. The rate was not appealed against, but justices refused to issue a distress warrant against a defaulter on the ground that the rate was invalid.

Held, upon a rule to the justices, that the objection to the rate was not one which the justices could entertain, and that mere excess in amount was, under the circumstances, no ground for refusing a warrant.

THIS was a rule nisi obtained at the instance of the treasurer for the Stratford Langthorne Abbey landowners, calling upon two justices of Essex and the defendant Shea to show cause why the said justices should not issue their warrant to levy by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said defendant Shea the sum of 11. 5s., being the amount due from him in respect of a rate or assessment made on the 6th July 1876, pursuant to an Act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of his late Majesty King George IV., intituled "An Act to enable the persons interested in the lands and hereditaments heretofore parcels of the possessions of the Monastery or Abbey of Stratford Langthorne, in the county of Essex, to raise money for repairing and maintaining the bridges and other works liable to be repaired and maintained by such persons."

It appeared from the affidavit of the solicitor to the said treasurer that the owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers of divers lands, tenements, and hereditaments formerly parcel of the possessions belonging to the Monastery or Abbey of Stratford Langthorne, in the county of Essex, thereafter called the Abbey Land Owners, were by reason of their respective tenures or otherwise bound to support, maintain, and keep in repair two bridges situate and being at Stratford, in the county of Essex, and also to support and maintain and keep in repair certain parts of the road and foot causeway lying and being between the said bridges and the road to the extent of 100 yards beyond such bridges respectively.

By 4 Geo. 4, c. cvi., trustees were appointed to manage and repair the Middlesex and Essex turnpike roads, including portions of the said roads, bridges, and causeway.

By 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. cviii., provision was made for the management of the said abbey lands and raising money for that purpose.

By sect. 13 it is enacted:

That it shall and may be lawful for the owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments aforesaid, from time to time, at any general or special general meeting to be held under this Act, to make any rate or assessment for the purposes of this Act in respect of such lands, tenements, or hereditaments by a pound rate upon all such owners, proprietors, lessees, or occupiers according to the rents or values of the respective lands, tenements, or hereditaments, and according to the several interests of the owners, proprietors, lessees, or occupiers thereof respectively, and to apportion such rates according to such several interests and to moderate or regulate such rates with respect to any houses, new buildings, or improvements in such manner as shall be agreed on by the major part of the persons present at any such quarterly or special general meeting; and a table of such rates and assessments being from time to time made and signed by the persons or the major part of them present at any such meeting shall be good and binding upon all such owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers respectively, and upon all other persons concerned.

By sect. 14:

That all money which shall be collected and received from any such rate or assessments shall and may be applied in maintaining and keeping in repair the roads, causeways, and bridges aforesaid, and also in the payment of all arrears and sums of money due from the owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments aforesaid in respect of any such roads, causeways, and bridges, and incurred at any time before the passing of this Act and remaining due and unpaid, and also in the reimbursing and repayment of any sum or sums of money to any person or persons who shall have paid and advanced, or shall pay and advance, any sum or sums of money for or on account or on behalf of such owners, proprietors, lessees, or occupiers respectively in respect of such roads, causeways, or bridges, or on whom any distress or distresses may have been made or may be made for any rates of composition for rates for any of the purposes aforesaid, and also in payment of the charges and expenses of making and collecting any such rates, and the paying, remunerating, and reimbursing any persons for work, labour, and materials done, performed, and provided, and attendances given or to be done, performed, provided and given in respect of or relating to the maintaining or repairing of such roads, causeways, or bridges.

By sect. 15:

That if any owner, proprietor, lessee, or occupier of any messuage, land, tenements, hereditaments, upon or in respect of which any rate or assessment, or any arrears of rates or assessments heretofore made, or which shall be charged or imposed by virtue of this Act, shall neglect or refuse to pay the rates and sums of money which shall have been or shall hereafter be so rated or assessed as aforesaid, for the space of fourteen days after the same shall be due, and demand thereof made by notice in writing or in print, under the hand of the collector of the said rates, to be delivered to such tenant or occupier, or left at his or her dwelling house or usual place of abode, in case such occupier reside within the limits of this Act, or otherwise left upon the premises in respect of which such rate or assessment shall be made, then, upon proof thereof upon oath before any justice of the peace for the said county of Essex (which oath such justice is hereby empowered and required to administer), the same shall and may be levied and recovered by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of every person so making default by warrant under the hand and seal of such justice, such defaulter being first duly summoned by such justice to appear before him at a time and place to be mentioned in such summons, and to show cause for such neglect or refusal; and the overplus (if any) to be raised by such distress and sale shall be returned, upon demand, to the owner of such goods and chattels, after deducting all reasonable costs and charges previous to and attending such distress and sale, such costs and charges to be ascertained and directed by the said justice; and in default of such distress, it shall be lawful for such justice to commit such person to any house of correction for the county or place within which such offence shall be committed, there to remain without bail or mainprize for any time not exceeding three calendar months, unless payment shall be sooner made of such sum or sums of money as shall have been found to be due and in arrear upon all or any such assessment or assessments as aforesaid, together with all costs, charges, and expenses attending the recovery thereof, such costs, charges, and expenses to be ascertained and directed by the said justice.

By sect. 16:

That every warrant of distress for the non-payment of any rates or assessments to be made under this Act shall be in the words or to the effect therein set out. The warrant is to be addressed "To the collector or collectors," and "To all constables and other peace officers of the same county" of Essex.

By sect. 18:

And whereas it would be advantageous to the owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments as aforesaid to be enabled to make a composition in money with the trustees for carrying into execution an Act passed in the fourth year of His Present Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act for more effectually repairing and improving the roads leading from Whitechapel Church, in the county of Middlesex, unto, through, and to the several parishes or places of Shenfield, Passingford Bridge, and Woodford, in the county of Essex, and for other purposes relating thereto; and upon the line of which turnpike road, the said bridges, roads, causeways, wharfing, and other works hereby authorised and directed to be repaired, maintained, and supported, are situate, for the repairs and amendments made by the said trustees since the 25th March 1823, of the portion of the said road which is to be repaired and repairable by such owners, proprietors, lessees, and other persons, and also for the repairing, maintaining, and keeping in repair all the road and foot causeway and the wharfing between such two bridges, and the said two bridges, to the repair of which such owners, proprietors, lessees, or occupiers are liable. Be it therefore further enacted, that from and after the passing of this Act it shall and may be lawful to and for the said owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers, at their first or at any quarterly or special general meeting or any adjournment thereof, under the provisions of this Act, to contract and agree and to come to a composition with the said trustees for the execution of the said recited Act, for the paying and discharging of such sum and sums of money as the said trustees may necessarily have incurred, expended, and been put to, in, about, touching, and concerning the requisite repairs and amendments of the said roads, since the 25th March 1823; and also to contract and agree and to come to a composition with the trustees for the execution of the said recited Act, for the paying to such trustees a certain sum of money annually, or otherwise, for and towards the repairing, maintaining, and keeping in repair all such bridges, road, foot causeway, and other works or either of them.

By sect. 34:

That it shall be lawful for the owners or proprietors, lessees, and occupiers of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments aforesaid, if they shall so resolve and order at any quarterly or special general meeting, to sue for the recovery of any rates or arrears of rates, if amounting in the whole to the sum of 5*l.* or upwards, and to be sued in any matter relating to this Act where the sum sought to be recovered shall amount to 5*l.* or upwards, in the name or names of any treasurer or clerk for the time being to be appointed under this Act; and also to prefer and prosecute or to order and direct the preferring and prosecuting of any information or indictment against any person or persons who shall wilfully dig up, spoil, destroy, injure, or damage any part of the road or causeway, or any wharfing, posts, rails, fences, or other things thereto belonging, or who shall wilfully pull down, destroy, injure, or damage any bridge, parapet, building, or erection belonging to, or which ought to be repaired, maintained, and kept in repair by such owners, proprietors, lessees, or occupiers, on behalf of such owners, proprietors, lessees, or occupiers; in all which proceedings it shall be sufficient to state generally that such matters, works, and things respectively were the property of such treasurer or clerk aforesaid; and no action, suit, information, indictment, or other process to be brought or commenced by or on behalf of such owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers by virtue of this Act in the name or names of any such treasurer or clerk shall abate or be discontinued by the death or removal of such treasurer or clerk or any of them, or by the Act of such treasurer or clerk or either of them, without the directions and consent of such owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers assembled at some quarterly or special general meeting this Act, or three or more of the committee of management under this Act; but such treasurer or clerk for the time being shall always be deemed to be the plaintiff in every such action, suit, information, indictment, and other process. Provided always that every such treasurer and clerk shall be reimbursed and paid out of the monies belonging to or to be raised by such owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers, all such costs, charges, and expenses as any such treasurer or clerk shall be put unto or become chargeable with or liable to by reason of his or their being so made plaintiff, prosecutor, or defendant as aforesaid.

By sect. 41:

Provided always and be it enacted that if any body, politic, corporate, or collegiate, or any person or persons shall think himself, herself, or themselves aggrieved by any rate or rates to be made, or by any thing which shall be done by virtue of this Act, or by any order or determination of any justice or justices of the peace in pursuance of this Act, it shall be lawful for such bodies or persons respectively to appeal to the justices of the peace at any general or quarter sessions of the peace to be held for the county where the matter complained of was done, within four calendar months next after the cause of complaint shall have arisen, every such appellant or appellants giving fourteen days' notice in writing of such appeal, and of the nature and matter thereof, to the person or persons appealed against or to the clerk or collector of the owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers aforesaid (as the case may be), and within seven days after the delivery of such notice entering into recognisance before some justice of the peace of the same county with two sufficient sureties to try such appeal and to abide the order of the said general or quarter sessions thereon; and the said justices upon due proof of such notice having been given, and of such recognisance having been so entered into, shall, and they are hereby authorised, empowered, and required in a summary way to hear and finally determine such appeal at such general or quarter sessions, or if they think proper may adjourn the hearing thereof to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace to be holden for the same county; and such justices shall and may, if they see cause so to do, by order of such sessions, mitigate at their discretion all or any penalty or forfeitures incurred under this Act, and may also award such satisfaction to be made to the party injured or such costs to either of the parties as they shall judge reasonable and proper; and the determination of such justices shall be binding and conclusive to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

By sect. 42:

Provided always, and be it further enacted: That on an appeal from any rate or assessment to be made for the purposes of this Act, the justices of the sessions where such appeal shall be heard shall and may amend the same in such manner as may be necessary for giving relief, without quashing or altering such rates or assessments with respect to the other persons mentioned in the same.

By 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. lxxxix., it was enacted that the Abbey land owners and their successors for ever should pay to the said trustees the annual sum of 300*l.*, in full satisfaction and discharge of all and every liabilities of the said Abbey land owners in respect of the roads, bridges, and causeway.

Under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 26, the Local Board of West Ham execute the office of and are surveyors of the highways within their district, which include a portion of the said roads, bridges, and causeway.

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. lvi., the Abbey land owners were empowered to contract and come to a composition with the West Ham Local Board for the repairs of these roads, bridges, and causeway in their district.

The Board of Works for the district of Poplar execute the office of and are surveyors of the highways within their district, which includes a portion of the said roads, bridges, and causeway.

The Local Board of West Ham executed certain repairs upon the said roads, bridges, and causeway, for the cost of which an action was brought by them against the West Abbey land owners, which resulted, after some litigation and a long correspondence, in an agreement by the owners to pay the board 1000*l.*, and in the passing of an Act, which received the Royal assent on the 11th Aug., 1876.

On the 6th July 1876, after the said Act had passed through the Houses of Parliament, but before it received the Royal assent, the Abbey land owners, in quarterly general meeting, duly made a rate, pursuant to the provisions of their Act of 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. cviii.), of 1*s.* 3*d.* in the pound.

The following is an extract from the Abbey land owners' rate-book of the assessment and rate so made:

6th July 1876.

At a quarterly general meeting, duly held this 6th July 1876, the following assessment and rate of 1*s.* 3*d.* in the pound was made by us, the under-signed owners, proprietors, lessees, and occupiers, being a majority of the persons present at this quarterly general meeting, in pursuance of, and conformity with, the provisions of the Act of Parliament made and passed in the seventh and eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King Geo. 4, c. 108.

By the said Act referred to as having received the Royal assent on the 11th Aug. 1876, called the West Ham Local Board of Health Act 1876, and being 39 & 40 Vict. c. ccxx., after reciting the statutes previously referred to, and certain agreements with parties interested, it is enacted that (sect. 3):

It shall be lawful for the Abbey land owners, at their first or any quarterly or special general meeting, or any adjournment thereof, under the provisions of the said Act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of King Geo. 4, c. cviii., to contract and agree and come to a composition with the West Ham Local Board for the paying of 1000*l.*, and also to contract and agree to come to a composition with the Poplar District Board for the paying of 100*l.* for and towards the further repairing, maintaining, and keeping in repair by the said board respectively of so much of the roads, bridges, and causeways as is situate within their respective districts.

By sect. 4:

The payment of the said sums of 1000*l.* and 100*l.* respectively, as aforesaid, shall be taken and accepted by the local board and the district board respectively in full satisfaction and discharge of all and every the liability whatsoever of the Abbey land owners with respect to the maintenance and repair of the roads, bridges, and causeway, and the Abbey land owners shall thereupon be relieved and discharged from any obligation to support, maintain, and keep in repair the roads, bridges, and causeways; and the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the Abbey land owners shall not, from and after the passing of this Act and the payment of the said several sums of 1000*l.* and 100*l.*, be liable to repair or contribute towards the repair of the roads, bridges, and causeway, or any other works described or referred to in the hereinbefore recited Act of the seventh and eighth years of the reign of King Geo. 4, c. cviii., and from and after the passing of this Act and the payment of the said several sums of 1000*l.* and 100*l.*, all such liability shall absolutely cease and determine. And the local board and the district board respectively shall thereafter support, maintain, and keep in repair the roads, bridges, and causeway so far as the same are situate within their respective districts; and they shall also, to the extent aforesaid, indemnify and keep indemnified the Abbey land owners from any liability with respect to the support, maintenance, and keeping in repair of the roads, bridges, and causeway.

By sect. 5:

The Abbey landowners shall have the same powers to make, recover, and levy rates or assessments for the payment of the said several sums of 1000*l.* and 100*l.*, and of all reasonable costs and expenses incurred by them with reference to this Act, and the carrying the same into execution, and winding up all matters outstanding with respect to the repairs of the roads, bridges, and causeway, and also for the payment of reasonable compensation to any person or persons who may be injuriously affected by the abolition of the rate known as the Abbey land rate, as they now have for making and recovering rates or assessments for the support, maintenance, and keeping in repair of the said roads, bridges, and causeway; and for such purposes as aforesaid, the rate books kept by the collector of the said Abbey land rate shall be prima facie evidence that the lands, tenements, and hereditaments therein described are Abbey lands, and are the lands, tenements, and hereditaments liable to payment of such rate; and upon payment of the sums hereby authorized to be raised, and of all outstanding liabilities under the said Act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of His Majesty King Geo. 4, c. cviii., the said Act shall be, and the same is hereby repealed.

By sect. 6:

The said sum of 1000*l.*, when paid to the local board, shall be applied by them in paying the costs, charges, and expenses of this Act as hereinafter provided, and in diminution of any debt owing by the local board for moneys borrowed under the powers of the Local Board of Health for West Ham, in Essex, Extension of Powers Act, 1867; and the said sum of 100*l.*, when paid to the district Board, shall be applied by them in diminution of the debt of 8000*l.*, borrowed by them of the Provident Clerk's Association, for the special purpose of paving the parish of Bow.

During Aug. 1876 the following notice was sent to some of the Abbey land owners, but it did not appear whether the defendant Shea had received such notice:

Stratford Langthorne Abbey Land Rate.

Pursuant to Act of Parliament of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. cviii., and West Ham Local Board of Health Act 1876.

Notice.

The Abbey land owners have agreed with the West Ham Local Board for paying 1000*l.*, and with the Poplar District Board for paying 100*l.*, upon payment whereof the liability of the Abbey landowners to repair the roads, &c., between Stratford and Bow will absolutely cease and determine. By the 5th section of the last above mentioned Act, the powers of the Abbey land owners to make, recover, and levy rates for payment of the said sums, outstanding liabilities, &c., are retained, and the rate-books kept by the collector are made prima facie evidence that the lands, tenements, and hereditaments therein described are Abbey lands, and liable to payment of the rate. The Abbey land owners, at their last meeting, estimated that the moneys to be raised by the present rate of 1*s.* 3*d.* in the pound would be sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, and to avoid the possibility of a further rate it is respectfully requested that the amount of your rate, as under, be paid on the first application, or forwarded to Mr. J. D. Sansom, the collector.

On the 12th Sept. 1876, the defendant Shea and other Abbey land owners were served with demands for the payment of the said rate of the 6th July. The amount demanded of the defendant Shea was 1*l.* 5*s.*, and the following was the form of demand:

Stratford Langthorne Abbey Lands.

Pursuant to Act of Parliament, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. cviii., and the West Ham Local Board of Health Act 1876.

6, Holly-terrace, Leytonstone-road, Stratford, E., 12th Sept., 1876.

To Mr. Shea.

Sir,—I hereby demand payment of your Abbey land rate, made the 6th July last, amounting to 1*l.* 5*s.*, and unless the amount be paid to me within fourteen days from this demand, I am directed to take the requisite proceedings against you for recovery thereof.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

J. DOWDING SANSON,
Collector of Abbey Land Rates.

On the back of this demand were set out extracts concerning the recovery of rates from the said Act of 1827, and also sect. 5 of the West Ham Local Board of Health Act 1876. The date of the passing of the latter Act did not appear upon the face or back of the said demand.

On the 4th Oct. 1876, in pursuance of directions by the Committee of the Abbey Land Owners, the solicitor of Thomas Wiseman Shipston, the said treasurer of the Abbey land owners, applied to the justices of Essex on behalf of the said treasurer for summonses against the defendant Shea and others for nonpayment of the said rates. The following was the information upon which this application was made:

The within named defendants.

Metropolitan Police District in Essex, to wit.—Information of John Dowding Sanson, of 6, Holly-terrace, Leytonstone road, Stratford, in the county of Essex, taken on oath before me the undersigned, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the said district, this 4th day of Oct. 1876, who saith that the sums set opposite to the names of the following persons in the schedule hereto have been assessed against them respectively for Abbey land rate, and have not been paid, although lawfully demanded.

Sworn this 4th Oct. 1876,

J. DOWDING SANSON.

Nath. Powell.

In the schedule was included the name of the defendant Shea, the amount against him being 1*l.* 5*s.*

The summonses were granted in pursuance of this application. No reference was made on the summons to any statute except that of 1827, viz., 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. cviii.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF ESSEX.

[Q.B. Div.]

On the 24th Jan. 1877, these summonses all came on to be heard before the two justices of Essex, against whom this rule was obtained. Many of them were defended, but that against the defendant Shea was heard in his absence.

On the 28th Feb. the said justices delivered the following decision upon all the summonses which had been heard on the 24th Jan. :

"After the most careful consideration of these important cases we have come to the conclusion that our decision must be for the defendants. As, however, it is possible that ulterior proceedings may be taken upon it, it is desirable that we should mention the grounds upon which we have decided. There were several of the cases in which I believe that we should have been bound to hold that the notice of demand is bad; but as, underlying this, there is in our opinion general and fatal difficulty in the complainant's way, it is unnecessary to allude to this further. We consider that the information itself is bad, as not being laid in the name of the person or persons who are specially named in the Act as proper for this purpose, and it is not even stated in terms to be laid on behalf of the proper persons; and were this difficulty, which we do not see our way to get over, removed, we have not been able to avoid arriving at an opinion that the rate is bad upon the face of it. The minute book being put in and forming part of the evidence, we cannot but see that this rate is made and is intended to be devoted to purposes not provided for in the Act under which it purports to be made. Now it is contended by the complainants that this is not for us to consider, that it is matter of appeal, as in the case of a poor-rate. But this is not a poor-rate, and having regard to the opinion of Erle, C.J. in the case of Pedley v. Davis (10 C. B., N. S., 492), we think that we should not be doing right were we to grant orders for the recovery of a rate which we believe to be invalid. No doubt our decision places complainant in some little difficulty, and so far as we can we would assist him by stating a case for him to take elsewhere, if he should be so advised, but we must refuse, and for the above reasons, to make the order prayed. Neither do we make any order as to costs."

Graham and Castle, on behalf of the justices, showed cause against the rule.—This is not of the nature of a poor-rate; there is no publication and therefore the justices have more than a mere ministerial duty in issuing distress warrants. In the case of Pedley v. Davis and Shipston (10 C.B. N.S. 492), referred to by the justices, a justice was held to be liable for issuing a warrant under this very Act against a person who was found by a jury not to be an owner of Abbey Lands. Erle, C.J. in delivering the judgment of the court, cited Newbould v. Coltman (6 Ex. 195), as bearing a strong analogy, and said, "the question considered was whether the jurisdiction of the justices extended to inquire into the validity of the order of the board of guardians and of the appointment of the overseers, or was confined to enforcing payment of sums assumed to be legally due, and the decision is that the existence of a legal obligation to pay the sum claimed is a necessary preliminary condition to the magistrates having any jurisdiction at all; and therefore they have no jurisdiction to decide on the validity of the order, but if the order is legally made, and the party is in arrear, they may issue a warrant or not, as the circumstances shall in their discretion seem to require. This reasoning is directly applicable to the 15th section above recited relating to rates on Abbey lands, under which the justice is directed to begin by inquiring whether the rated owner has refused to pay, not whether the rate is valid. This case answers many of the arguments relied on for the defendant here. If the question is not within the jurisdiction of the magistrate, his adjudication thereon is not conclusive for him in an action. If he has a discretion to grant or refuse a distress warrant, he may consider whether there is reasonable ground to doubt the validity of the rate; and if he does so doubt, he may exercise his discretion in refusing a distress warrant, and then the parties may proceed by rule or by indemnity to the justice, if they wish to try the validity of the rate, at the usual risk of costs; but if the justice refuses to issue a distress warrant because he doubts the validity of the rate, he does not therefore adjudicate thereon as on a matter within his jurisdiction for adjudication." [FIELD, J.—This was a rate duly made under an existing Act against which the right to appeal had not been exercised. How could the justices consider its validity upon an application for a distress warrant?] Here the rate was made for a purpose not then authorised, and the case is within the decision of Richter v. Hughes (2 B. & C. 499), where trustees had raised 32,000*l.* to build a chapel, which was 2000*l.* beyond the sum authorised by a local Act, and the plaintiff replevied upon a distress made for the payment of a rate to raise the interest. It was held upon demurrer that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament only authorised the trustees to borrow a specific sum, and the rate having been made to pay the interest due upon the whole sum borrowed, was bad in toto, although the defect did not appear upon the face of it. This was a rate for purposes beyond the authority given by the Act under which the rate was professed to be made, and therefore there was no necessity to appeal against it as in the case of Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw (10 Q. B. 868.) [FIELD, J.—All that could have been wrong in this rate was that in anticipation of a certain future liability it was larger than was immediately requisite. That is not an objection which justices can consider upon the issue of a warrant.] The rate on the face of it ought to have shown that its purpose was within its authority; in Re Eastern Counties Railway Company and Overseers of Moulton (25 L. J., M. C. 49), rates were held void for this reason. Coleridge, J. said at p. 51, "The objection to the first two rates does not rest on the statute, but on the well known common law principle, that when any parties are acting under a limited statutory authority, they are bound to show on the face of their proceedings that they are acting within that authority. Here this is not shown on the face of the two rates, which are therefore void."

Benjamin, Q.C., Philbrick, Q.C., and Petheram, appeared for the applicant.

MELLOP, J.—I think we need not call upon the counsel on behalf of the applicant for this rule. From the evidence it appears that the rate was perfectly good on the face of it. It must have been made under an Act of Parliament which was succeeded by another a few days afterwards; and the reference to the subsequent Act in the demand for payment must have been mere surplusage. It may be that part of the assessment was technically made before there was legal authority for it, but we can only say on that point that, if appealed against under the provisions of the Act, the rate might possibly have been set aside or amended. I think it cannot be said to have been vitiated by its heading, or by the reference to the two statutes at the back of the demand for payment. Nothing has been suggested to show that the magistrates ought not to have issued their warrant, and therefore the rule must be made absolute.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant being an owner or occupier of these Abbey lands was rated to an assessment made for certain purposes. The Act of 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 108), gives power to the owners and occupiers of these lands to raise money for purposes therein mentioned. A large amount of this assessment was to be devoted to the purposes authorised by that Act, but part of it no doubt was intended for the carrying out of arrangements by which all future liability of the Abbey land owners was to be abolished. It was necessary to have Parliamentary authority for these arrangements, and a bill for that purpose was awaiting the Royal assent. The rate was made before the bill was formally passed, but no reference to its purposes was made in the rate; and there was nothing in the rate itself to show that the money was to be raised for any other purpose than those authorised by the Act then in force. To the extent of the amount required for the lump sum payable under the 5th section of the subsequent Act, this rate could not on appeal have been supported; but it is new to me that a rate becomes a nullity because it raises a larger sum than is wanted. Unless it were a nullity on the face of it, the justices had no right to refuse these distress warrants.

Rule absolute.

HUGHES (app.) v. TREW (resp.)

Slaughter houses—Consent of corporation—Abandoned buildings—10 Vict. c. 14, ss. 17 & 19—25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxvi., s. 65.

By a local Act of 1862 a company was empowered to erect a cattle market at Brecon, and by sect. 65 the company from time to time, if and when they should think fit, and with, but not without, the consent of the corporation testified by writing under the hand of the mayor or town clerk, might provide and maintain slaughter houses proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood, upon such sites as they should think expedient.

In 1863 the corporation consented to the provision and maintenance by the company of slaughter houses proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood, in pursuance of, and in accordance with, the above-mentioned sect. 65; the company built slaughter houses accordingly, but absolutely abandoned the use of them in the year 1864. The company subsequently built other slaughter houses a quarter of mile off, and the appellant was their lessee; but the corporation had always refused to give any further consent.

Justices refused to convict the respondent under sect. 19 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, for slaughtering cattle on premises in the borough other than those leased by the appellant.

Held, upon a case stated, that the slaughter houses occupied by the appellant had not received the consent of the corporation under sect. 65 of the local Act of 1862, and that the justices were right.

This was a case stated by three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the borough of Brecon, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the said appeal.

1. Upon the hearing of a certain information or complaint preferred by the appellant against the respondents under sect. 19 of the Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, "for that they, the said respondents, on the 22nd Sept. 1876, at the Chapelry of St. Mary, in the borough of Brecon, after a certain notice and a hand bill in that behalf had been duly published and posted by the Brecon Markets Company (being the undertakers within the meaning of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847), who had, therefore, under the powers of the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 186, intituled the Brecon Markets Act 1862, incorporated with the said first mentioned Act, erected and provided certain buildings within the limits of the said last mentioned Act for the slaughtering of cattle which were then ready for public use, that the said slaughter houses were so ready for public use, unlawfully did slaughter certain cattle for sale as human food, to wit, one beast and one sheep within the said limits there, in a certain place, to wit, the bowling alley at the back of the Swan premises, Ship-street, and adjoining St. Michael-street, other than the slaughter houses so made in pursuance of the said last mentioned Act." The said justices dismissed the said information or complaint, and ordered the appellant to pay to the respondents the sum of 4l. 18s. 6d. for their costs incurred by them in their defence in that behalf.

2. The following facts were either proved or admitted by both parties except the statements in paragraph 6, which the justices deemed necessary to set forth as information for the court in considering this case.

3. That the appellant was the lessee under the Brecon Markets Company of certain slaughter houses erected under the powers of the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxvi., within the limits of the said Act.

4. That a notice was duly published in the Brecon County Times newspaper of the 17th June, 1876, which newspaper circulates within the borough of Brecon; and such notice, in the shape of printed handbills, was also posted in the market place and other conspicuous places within the said borough, such notice being as follows:

Brecon Markets Company.

Notice is hereby given, that the slaughter houses of the company in their Cattle Markets-place, in Hedrydd, in the borough of Brecon, are ready for use; and notice is hereby also given that, after the expiration of ten days from the publication and posting of this notice, anyone slaughtering cattle contrary to the 19th section of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, will be liable to a penalty of not exceeding 5l. for each offence.

Brecon, June 13, 1876.

5. A certificate under the hand of two justices

HUGHES (app.) v. TREV (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

of the borough of Brecon, to the following effect, was given in evidence, namely :

We, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Brecon, do hereby certify that the slaughter houses of the Brecon Markets Company, situate in their Cattle Market-place, in Heolrhydd, in the said borough, are completed and fit for the use of persons resorting thereto, and for public use.

Dated this 12th day of June, 1876.

DAVID THOMAS, Mayor.
J. TALFORD JONES.

6. There was no evidence given that the two justices who had signed the certificate mentioned in the last paragraph had any proof adduced to them that the slaughter houses were completed and fit for public use; and there is no memorandum or minute in the minute book of the justices that any meeting of the justices was held for the purpose of receiving proof that the slaughter houses were completed and fit for public use, as required by the 32nd section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14; and there was no evidence given that the slaughter houses, wherein it was sought to compel the respondents to slaughter, were proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle therein for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood, as required by the 65th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxxvi.; and from the wording of the 32nd section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, the respondents were considered by the justices to be precluded from giving evidence that the two justices had not had adduced any proof that the slaughter houses were completed for public use, as required by that section.

7. The following letter, in the handwriting of the late town clerk of the borough of Brecon, was put in and proved :

J. R. Cobb, Esq.
(Solicitor to the Brecon Market Company),
Nythfa, Brecon.

Dear Sir,—Brecon Markets Act 1862. On the other half sheet I beg to hand you a copy of the resolution relating to the cattle market, slaughter houses, and tolls passed at the council meeting last night as arranged.

—Yours truly,
15th May 1863. STEPHEN B. EVANS, Town Clerk.

[COPY.]

Resolved on the motion of Mr. Alderman Thomas and seconded by Mr. Councillor James Williams, that the Corporation of Brecon consent to the removal of the Fridays Cattle Markets from the streets to a new market, to be established on the authorised site in Clawddygaer, to the provision and maintenance by the company of slaughter houses proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood, in pursuance of and in accordance with the 65th section of the Brecon Markets Act 1862; and also to the following reduction of tolls, viz.: On corn and seeds, one half-penny per imperial bushel; sheep and pigs (including stallage), and so in proportion for any less number, one shilling per score; cattle threepence per head; calves, twopence per head; sucking pigs, one farthing per head.

8. The minute book of the corporation of the borough of Brecon, containing the minutes of the meeting of the corporation at which the resolution set out in the last paragraph was passed, was produced, and the resolution as set out in the last paragraph appeared upon the said minutes; but it appeared that the minutes of the meeting had never been signed by the mayor, or chairman of the meeting, or the town clerk.

9. The Markets Company in pursuance of the above resolution of the corporation subsequently erected slaughter houses at a place called Market-street, in the Borough of Brecon, in 1863; but, in consequence of their proximity to dwelling houses or other reasons, the Markets Company absolutely abandoned the use of these slaughter houses in or about 1864.

10. After the abandonment of the slaughter houses in Market-street by the Markets Company they without any further consent from the corporation erected other slaughter houses in a place called Clawddygaer (which is at least a quarter of a mile from the slaughter houses erected at Market-street), and which are the subject matter of these proceedings.

11. Between the years 1870 and 1874 the solicitor to the Markets Company repeatedly applied to the corporation to license their then intended slaughter houses in Clawddygaer, which are the subject matter of the present proceedings; which licence the corporation from time to time refused on the ground of the insufficiency of the slaughter houses for the wants of the borough and its neighbourhood, as required by the 65th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 186.

12. The slaughter house in which it was proved the respondents had slaughtered as set forth in the summons was licensed by the corporation on the 13th Jan. 1874.

13. On the part of the appellant it was contended that the resolution of consent of the corporation in 1863, extended to and was a consent for the Markets Company at any time thereafter to erect other slaughter houses within the borough, without the further consent of the corporation, and consequently that the consent obtained to erect the slaughter houses in 1863 was an unlimited consent, and authorised the Markets Company to build slaughter houses when and where they thought proper until the licence of the corporation was revoked, and consequently extended to and authorised the said Markets Company to erect the slaughter houses in Clawddygaer in 1871, and that the certificate of the two justices was conclusive evidence that the same had been completed, and was fit for public use.

14. On the part of the respondents it was contended that the resolution of the Corporation of Brecon was not a valid consent on the part of that body, inasmuch as the minute in the minute book had not been signed by the mayor or town clerk, as required by the 65th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 186, and further that if the resolution was a valid consent, the same was not an unlimited consent as to time and place, and that the said licence had been exhausted by the erection by the Markets Company of the slaughter houses in Market-street in 1863, and that as the certificate of the two justices had been given without proof being adduced to them that the slaughter houses erected in Clawddygaer in 1871, had been completed and fit for public use, was bad in law, and did not satisfy the requirements of sect. 32 of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, or the 65th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 186; and that until the requirement of these several sections of the statutes had been complied with the justices ought not to convict the respondents.

On considering the several facts of this case the justices were of opinion that the copy minute annexed to the town clerk's letter of the 16th May 1863, was a valid consent of the Corporation of Brecon, for the erection of slaughter houses in Market-street, in 1863, because the corporation allowed those slaughter houses to be erected by the Markets Company on the faith of the said

[Q.B. Div.]

HUGHES (app.) v. TREW (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

consent, although that consent was not given in compliance with the requirements of the 65th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 186, but they were of opinion that such consent was not an unlimited consent as contended for by the appellant's solicitors; but that it was exhausted and had become extinct upon the completion of the slaughter houses in Market-street in 1863, and therefore did not and could not extend to and authorise the Markets Company to erect the slaughter houses in Clawddygaer in 1871, and therefore they dismissed the summons.

The questions of law upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court therefore are: First, whether the copy of the minutes annexed to the town clerk's letter was such a legal consent on the part of the corporation as is requisite and necessary by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 186, for the erection of the slaughter houses in Market-street, in 1863; secondly, if the consent was sufficient for that purpose under the circumstances mentioned in paragraph 8, would that consent be considered an unlimited one, and extend to any slaughterhouse which the Market Company may thereafter erect in any part of the borough of Brecon, and consequently applicable to the one erected in Clawddygaer, in 1871?

H. Matthews, Q.C. (with him Edward Pollock), argued for the appellant, the lessee of the Brecon Markets Company. By sect. 65 of the Brecon Markets Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 186), "The company from time to time, if and when they think fit, and with, but not without, the consent of the corporation, testified by writing under the hand of the mayor or town clerk, may provide and maintain slaughter houses, proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood, upon such sites as they think expedient; but if any slaughter houses be provided, they shall be provided as near as conveniently may be to the Cattle Market-place provided under this Act, and the slaughter houses so provided shall be deemed part of that Market-place." The information was laid under sect. 17 & 19 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 14), by which (sect. 17) "Where by the special Act the undertakers shall be empowered to provide slaughter houses they may from time to time erect, on any land purchased by them under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, any buildings, or set apart and improve any buildings belonging to them for the slaughtering of cattle, and so soon as the same shall be ready for public use the undertakers shall give notice to that effect by the publication thereof in some newspaper circulating within the limits of the special Act, and by printed handbills posted on some conspicuous place within the said limits." (Sect. 19) "After the expiration of ten days from the publication and posting of such notice, no person shall slaughter any cattle or dress any carcase for sale as human food or food of man in any place within the limits of the special Act other than a slaughter house which was in use as such before and at the time of the passing of the special Act, and has so continued ever since, or the slaughter houses made in pursuance of this and the special Act; and every person who shall, after such notice as aforesaid, slaughter any such cattle, or dress for sale any such carcase within the limits of the special Act in any place other than one of such slaughterhouses, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5l. for every such offence." There is nothing in the local Act requiring a further consent of the corporation for a change of the site of slaughter houses, and it was assumed in a case concerning this very place that the consent for the previous building was sufficient under the 65th section; that case is Anthony v. The Brecon Markets Company (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 167; in error L. Rep. 7 Ex. 399), where the question was raised as to whether the Markets Company obtained this licence from the corporation or from the local board. The Exchequer Chamber held that it was granted in both capacities, but its sufficiency was not doubted. [FIELD, J.—That was an action by the lessee of the slaughterhouse erected in 1863, against his lessors, the Brecon Market Company, for their want of title; the decision of the Exchequer Chamber was merely that a proper licence had been given by the corporation for the erection of that slaughterhouse, which according to the present case, has been abandoned since 1864.] It appears from the case on appeal, as cited in Willes, J.'s judgment, at p. 402, that "the consent did not specify any particular slaughter houses, and at the time when the consent was given, the site had not been determined upon." He says with regard to the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), at p. 406, "The true reading is that the licence to erect must primâ facie be a licence to erect a slaughterhouse which shall be used as a slaughterhouse, and that there are not to be two separate licences, one for erection and another for use." Blackburn, J., in concurring with Willes, J., added at p. 408, "I quite agree that when the licence of the local board is required to erect a slaughter house, it is a licence to erect, and when erected to use; and that it is the same under the special Act." It was also held by the Master of the Rolls in Bentley v. Rotherham and Kimberworth Local Board of Health (L. Rep. 4 Ch. Div. 588), that where a consent of ratepayers was required and obtained, it was not necessary that new powers should have a further consent. [FIELD, J.—There the Act of Parliament prolonged and extended the time limited for taking lands, and it was held that the previous powers to take with consent of ratepayers were also extended. That does not touch this point.] The first slaughterhouses may be said to have never been within the section 65 of the local Act at all; they were not "proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood;" the consent therefore did not apply to them, and had never been exhausted.

B. T. Williams, Q.C. and W. Evans, appeared for the respondents.

MELLOS, J.—We need not trouble Mr. Williams. I cannot see any force in the argument that consent is not exhausted unless it has had some operation. It is abundantly clear that no licence was ever obtained for the erection of this particular slaughter house of the appellant. The building, for which the licence of the 14th May, 1863, was intended originally, and to which it was actually applied, was abandoned in 1864. I think the observations of Willes and Blackburn, JJ., are of great force as to the meaning of the consent required, but I cannot apply them to the erection of a second slaughter house after the abandonment of that for which the consent was intended.

C.P. Div.]

JONES v. WILLIAMS.

[C.P. Div.]

I cannot see how under this 65th section any such second slaughter house can possibly be erected without any consent of the corporation. I think it was the intention of the Legislature to impose some restraint upon the building of slaughter houses, and for that purpose the corporation had powers to interfere and to refuse consent to any place or building there might be ground for objecting to.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think the decision of the magistrates should be affirmed. The case is somewhat peculiar, but I do not see how there can be a doubt about the question raised for our consideration. The scheme of the private Act was to make the company the holders of tolls for the satisfaction of their claims, but the old corporation was still to continue with certain powers as before. By the 64th section the company were authorised to build a market without any permission from the corporation; but by the 65th section, although the company were to have the profit of slaughter houses which they might build, the control of them was reserved to the corporation; the provision was not fulfilled, as has been suggested by the merely courteous application for the consent of the corporation, which might be dispensed with if refused. In Anthony v. Brecon Markets Company, the object of the 65th section is shown to be more than that; some force must be given to the affirmative words, and there must be a continuing consent when it is once given. But the consent in this case applied only to particular buildings which were afterwards abandoned, and the new buildings never obtained the requisite consent. The licence according to the terms of the resolution was limited to the authorised site in accordance with sect. 65 of the local Act; if the resolution had been general so as to give authority to build a slaughter house in any part of the borough, it would, I think, have been beyond the powers of the corporation. Such a consent as this required by statute ought to be a judicial Act, and exercised with careful discretion.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

JONES v. WILLIAMS.

Game—Verbal permission of landlord to take—Trespass in pursuit of—Licence to kill—Conviction not drawn up—Change of opinion of bench—Game Act 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32), ss. 8, 23, 30, and 35.

Upon a parol demise of land there may be a parol reservation of the game upon it; and the landlord may give verbal permission to another person to take the game so reserved to him.

Such parol permission will justify what would otherwise be a trespass not only upon the land so demised, but also upon adjoining land, in pursuit of game.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. X.

Two justices convicted A. of trespass in pursuit of game. B. was afterwards charged with the same offence, and acquitted, by two of the magistrates who decided the former case and a third. The former conviction was then reversed by two of the three justices. No conviction having been drawn up, it was Held, that there was a locus penitentie in the justices, which they took advantage of when they changed their opinion.

CASE stated by three Justices of the Peace of the county of Carnarvon (L. J. Parry, B. T. Ellis, and T. Jones, Esqs.), under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court.

On 1st Jan. 1877 John Williams and Morris Roberts were on two separate fields, part of a farm called Bodwrog, in the parish of Llanbedrog in the said county. John Williams was on a ploughed field, walking backwards and forwards with two dogs, a greyhound and a sheep dog; and Morris Roberts was in another field with a dog and another man unknown. Each of the two were separately charged by the appellant with committing a trespass in pursuit of game under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, without the licence or consent of the owner of the land.

At a petty sessions, holden at Pwllheli, on 13th Jan., the two informations came on for hearing, the one against John Williams being taken first before L. J. Parry and B. T. Ellis, Esqs., when Williams was convicted, and ordered to pay a penalty of 5s. and costs.

The case against Morris Roberts was then taken; but before it commenced T. Jones, Esq. (the other justice) had taken his seat on the bench, he not having taken any part in the previous case. Morris Roberts produced an unstamped paper in the Welsh language, which, being translated, was—

December 26, 1876.—I do hereby give leave to Morris Roberts, Rhander Llangian, to course and shoot the whole of the rabbits, hares, or game, that is upon all my land everywhere. (Signed) Isaac Williams, Ship Inn, Llanbedrog.

The said Isaac Williams also gave evidence that he had signed the paper writing, and that he had given a verbal authority to Morris Roberts to course over all his land. It was proved that the respondents had started a hare on a farm belonging to Isaac Williams, which ran into the ploughed field at Bodwrog, and that the respondents ran after her with the dogs.

The bench were divided in opinion, two of them being for dismissing the case, and the other (B. T. Ellis, Esq.) for a conviction, and, in consequence, the case was dismissed; whilst, as the previous case was mixed up with it, the judgment in that also was reversed, and it was dismissed by the same majority. Neither of the respondents had taken out a game certificate.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

1. Whether the authority granted to Morris Roberts in writing, and verbally, or either, was sufficient? and, if so, whether that was a justification for John Williams as well as Morris Roberts to enter upon the land of Bodwrog?

2. Whether Isaac Williams, who stated on oath that he had let the tenement verbally to his tenant, and reserved the game to himself, had any right to grant authority to another party to kill game?

3. Whether the two justices, L. J. Parry, and GROVE, J.—This is a case of some difficulty, because the evidence upon the points submitted to us is vague. The first question inquires whether, under sect. 30 of the Game Law of 1831, which relates to trespass in pursuit of game, the parol permission of a landlord—who has himself merely a verbal reservation of the game upon an estate which he has demised to somebody else—will save a person from a charge of such trespass. Next, whether a person having such a licence can be properly punished if found in fresh pursuit of game in another field. As to Morris Roberts, I think there was—to answer the first question categorically—a justification. As to John Williams, the case does not find whether he was acting in concert with Roberts, or whether he was there for his own pleasure; so we can arrive at no conclusion as to him. Upon the second question, I am of opinion that Isaac Williams had a right to grant authority to Roberts, supposing he himself had a reservation of the game; and, if so, Roberts could not be prosecuted as a trespasser under sect. 30. Another question arises as to him—whether he was in fresh pursuit of game. I am of opinion that he was. The third question asked of us relates to the proceedings. There was, in the first instance, a verbal conviction against Williams, which was not formally drawn up; and, in consequence, there remained, in my opinion, a locus penitentie. That being so, the convicting magistrates changed their minds. It may, therefore, be said that there was no conviction; but, if there had been, the subsequent proceedings would have been irregular. Whether the magistrates have now power to direct a new trial or not is a question upon which I have some doubt. At any rate, the conviction cannot stand.

LINDLEY, J.—The Game Act contains various provisions having different objects in view. Some of its sections relate to trespass, and others to licences. These people were not charged, under sect. 23, with not having licences, but with trespass under sect. 30. First, as to the case of Morris Roberts. It appears that one Isaac Williams demised a farm to a tenant, reserving the game upon it to himself. Sect. 8, and the decisions upon it, show that there may be such a thing as a parol reservation of game upon a parol demise. The property in the game thus remained in the landlord. He gave a licence to Roberts, who therefore was not a trespasser whilst on his land. But he was also charged with being in fresh pursuit of a hare upon the next field to Williams' land. This is a case specially provided for by sect. 35; and the magistrates properly dismissed the charge against him. As to John Williams' case, another point arises—namely, that the licence did not mention his name. But we have not before us sufficient evidence as to him. The important point is as to the proceedings. Of the two magistrates who were in favour of dismissing the case against Williams, only one had heard the evidence; whilst one magistrate who had heard it was in favour of upholding the conviction. No conviction, however, was drawn up, and therefore the proceedings may be said to have come to nothing. The bench changed their opinion of the case, and they could not now be compelled by mandamus to record a conviction. Their action was not perhaps an acquittal, but it certainly did not amount to a conviction; it may be considered as only a part hearing.

MURPHY (app.) v. MANNING AND ANOTHER (resps.)

Cruelty to animals—Cutting cocks' combs—
12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 2.

To perform an operation upon an animal which causes pain is to "cruelly illtreat, abuse, or torture" the animal, within the meaning of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 2, unless that act be justified by showing that it was done for some lawful purpose, for some purpose legalised by custom, for the benefit of the animal itself, or for making it more serviceable for the lawful use of man.

Cutting off the combs of cocks, which does in fact cause great pain, cannot be justified either on the ground that it is done for the purpose of cock fighting or of winning prizes at an exhibition.

Case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions held at Sittingbourne, in the county of Kent, on the 17th Jan. 1876, two informations were preferred by Murphy, inspector to the Rochester and Chatham Branch of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the appellant (1), against Manning, of Rochester, veterinary surgeon, for that he, on the 20th Nov. 1875, at Rainham, in Kent, did unlawfully and cruelly illtreat certain animals, to wit, three cocks, and (2) against Sayers, the owner of the said cocks, for unlawfully causing them to be so illtreated, contrary to the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 2.

The appellants stated that on the 27th Nov. he went to the house of the respondent Sayers and told him he had received information as to the dubbing or cutting of the combs of some cocks, and asked to see the birds. He was taken to the back premises and shown three bantam cocks. Each of their combs had been cut off as closely as it could be done, and there were unhealed scabs, the effects of a wound, on each of their heads. Sayers told him he had been to the Crystal Palace, and was told there that unless the combs were off he could obtain no prize, which was the only reason for having it done. On the next day the appellant saw the respondent Manning, and asked him as to the cutting of the combs, and he said he did it at Sayer's request for the purpose of exhibition. The appellant asked if he (Manning) did not consider it caused pain, Manning replied that there was a measure of pain, but he did not think it very great, it was soon over, the birds winced their heads during the cutting and bobbed them two or three times. He mentioned that he had been in the habit of doing it more or less for forty years past. On cross-examination appellant said he could not say whether the birds were cocks or cockerels, he took them to be full grown birds.

The police constable stated that they looked as though they had been just recently out; they were full grown birds, duckwing.

James Broad, a member of the council of the

[Ex. Div.]

MURPHY (app.) v. MANNING AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[Ex. Div.]

Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, stated that in his opinion great pain was caused to cocks in cutting their combs. The removal did not prevent the cocks from suffering disease, the only object was for fighting purposes. He knew of no other cause for cutting them. On cross-examination this witness admitted that he had never done it himself nor seen it done; that it might be done in a minute. There was no portion of the comb without a nerve which communicated with the spinal cord; it was a tissue of blood vessels.

William Henry Jones, another member of the College of Veterinary Surgeons, stated that in his opinion the cutting of the comb would cause pain. There were nerves separated in the cutting off the comb, the fact of their wincing showed this. On cross-examination this witness admitted he had never cut a comb or seen it done, and that blood was no proof of pain; that he had studied the habits of fowls.

Frederick Crook, one of the judges of the Crystal Palace Poultry Show, stated that it was detrimental to a cock to cut its comb. It depended upon the class in which a bird was entered whether or no it disqualified the bird. There were exhibition classes in which it was the practice to dub birds, and there were also classes in which it was the practice not to have them dubbed.

Harrison Weir stated that he was an animal painter and artist, and that he had spent a good deal of time in studying the habits of birds and animals, and in his opinion dubbing spoiled the look of the bird and must be very painful. On cross-examination he said he would not interfere with nature.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the combs of cocks were cut for the purpose of their being exhibited, and it was clear from the evidence of Crook that the habit and practice was for game cocks to be dubbed. That so far from the operation of dubbing being cruel, it was for the real benefit of the birds themselves, inasmuch as in case they quarrelled or fought with one another in the fowl pen or yard, they could not pull one another by the comb, in which way they often injured and hurt themselves, and that such an act did not come within the statutes.

George Barker was called on the part of the respondents, who stated that he was veterinary inspector to the Corporation of Gravesend, and had had sixteen years' experience in veterinary matters. He said that cutting the comb of a game cock would decidedly not create much pain. He called a comb a fleshy excrescence, and stated that it had never been proved that it contained nerves communicating with the brain. That he considered it an advantage to game birds to have their combs cut, as it prevented their fighting with one another. It was an ordinary practice, he said, to do it in farmyards in Lincolnshire, where he had cut hundreds. It took a quarter of a minute, and the bird would eat directly, and did not appear to suffer. On cross-examination this witness said he was not a member of the College of Veterinary Surgeons. The comb, in his opinion, did not contain a nerve vein, there were blood vessels. In frosty weather the comb gets frost bitten. He did not consider it cruelty.

The justices being of opinion that the offences charged were not of the class of offences contemplated by the statute, dismissed the information.

The question for the court was, whether their decision was right.

Sect. 2 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, is as follows:— "And be it enacted, that if any person shall, from and after the passing of this Act, cruelly beat, ill-treat, overdrive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, ill-treated, over-driven, abused, or tortured any animal, every such offender shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding 5l."

Waddy, Q.C. (Morton Smith with him) for the appellant.—The case clearly falls within the provisions of sect. 2 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, and the decision of the magistrates is erroneous. If the word "cruelty" does not govern the rest of the section, the case falls within the words "ill-treat, abuse, or torture;" and if the whole section is governed by the word "cruelty," the case likewise falls within its provisions. The definition of "cruelty" given in the lexicon, is "a barbarous act which causes unnecessary pain." Now in the case it is distinctly alleged that this "dubbing" is an operation that causes pain; the sole question then is, was the pain so caused unnecessary? This is laid down by Wightman, J., in the case of Budge v. Parsons (3 B. & S. 385), "The cruelty intended by the statute," said the learned judge, "is the unnecessary abuse of any animal." The previous Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 59, in which the section under discussion is based, contained the word "wantonly." That does not appear in the present Act, so it is unnecessary to show a malignant disposition. Now who can doubt that the pain caused here was "unnecessary pain?" If the cocks were dubbed for the purpose of preparing them for fighting, it was done for an illegal purpose, and was therefore unnecessary. If they were dubbed for the purpose of exhibition, it was done for the purpose of gain, and was equally unnecessary. Suppose a prize was offered for one eyed dogs. No one could say that a man would be justified in putting out one eye of his dog; simply to entitle himself to the chance of getting a prize. Such a case would clearly be within the statute, so would trimming sheep. Cutting horses stands on quite a different footing. No doubt pain is thereby caused, but it is not unnecessary pain, for it is necessary for man's purposes to make the horse useful and subservient to him.

Biron for the respondents.—Whether this "dubbing" is cruelty or not, is a matter of fact within the discretion of the magistrates, and they having given their decision on the question of fact, this court has no power to review it. The question in cases of this nature must always be, whether pain has been inflicted to such a degree as to amount to cruelty? That is a question of fact. But supposing this court has power to review their decision, I contend their decision was right. If the "dubbing" was done with a bonâ fide purpose of improving the birds it is not cruelty within the statute; and it is found in the case that "dubbing" does in fact improve the birds. But not only so, it is found also that the operation of dubbing is to the advantage of the birds themselves, for it prevents their injuring each other in the fowl pen by seizing one another by the combs. Rounding the ears of foxhounds might be said to be cruelty if the "dubbing" is held to be so. But that is clearly not within the statute, for it is done for the purpose of preventing the dogs from tearing their ears in the brambles when in pursuit of game. It is for the appellants to show that the act was purposeless, which they have failed to do.

Waddy, Q.C. in reply.

KELLY, C.B.—I am clearly of opinion that the decision of the magistrates was wholly incorrect, and that the respondents should have been convicted. The first question is, whether it is "cruel" to cut off the combs of cocks? Now no doubt some acts may be done to certain animals causing extreme pain, and yet these acts may be lawful, not because they are cruel, but because cruelty is inflicted on them for some lawful purpose, as, for instance, the case of cutting horses. The purpose and object may be such as to legalise acts which would otherwise be within the statute. I do not now enter into these questions, but it would be difficult to argue that such cases were not legal, though they do in fact inflict great pain. That pain is inflicted for good. Again, certain operations may be performed on sheepdogs, such as cutting their ears; but that is not the question now before us. It is enough for me to say that when the case comes before me I shall not be disposed to inflict punishment on any one simply because he had inflicted pain, if it were ordinary for him to do it, or if the purpose for which he inflicted the pain was legalised by custom. But when we come to look at this case I look at that, and that alone, and to that I will apply a few observations. First, then, with regard to the act itself. Does it inflict pain and torture? If it does, no one can doubt it is cruel, and that it is to "cruelly illtreat, abuse, and torture" the animal. One witness says there is no pain. That evidence, however, I disregard, for I entirely believe one of the witnesses in the case, who is a member of the Royal Veterinary College, when he said it gave great pain. In cross-examination, it was elicited from him that he had never done it himself, nor seen it done, but it does not need to see such an act as this done to know whether it is cruel or not. There are nerves within the comb the excision of which must cause extreme pain and torture, and if that be so, though it is quite impossible to measure the degree of pain, it must be very extreme. This is to be inferred also from the obvious effect on the animal when it is performed. Then it is said the operation only lasts half a minute. But in an operation of that duration very great pain may be inflicted. An operation of a few seconds may cause pain, and when it lasts for so long as half a minute great pain may result. It appears to me that very acute pain was inflicted. Then comes the question whether any reason or purpose can be assigned for it that can legalise or justify this act, which otherwise would be barbarity. Upon the evidence it appears to me that the object is to enable the animal to be used for cock fighting. That is illegal. No one can say, therefore, that that is a good object. There is no other in the case. They say it was for the purpose of exhibition; but that makes no difference. One class of animals exhibited is a class of fighting cocks; it cannot, therefore, be said that because taking off the combs makes the cocks more fit for cock fighting that that is an object to legalise the cruelty which results from an operation of that kind. There is, therefore, cruelty and abuse of the animal, and as it was done for no lawful purpose, and as it does not appear to fit the animal for any lawful purpose it is an act which cannot be justified, and one therefore within the statute.

CLEASBY, B.—The magistrates have, as I understand, found the facts, and referred to us as a matter of law whether the case is within the statute. If, instead of stating the case in that way, they had found as their conclusion of fact that pain was not inflicted under such circumstances or to such an extent as to amount to cruelty, there would have been no case for us to consider. But they have not so stated the case; therefore I think they have not drawn that conclusion. They thought, however, that the purpose for which the act was done was such that it was one of a class of cases not within the statute, and upon this they ask our opinion. I do not agree in that conclusion. Undoubtedly every treatment of an animal which inflicts pain, even the great pain of mutilation, and which is cruel in the ordinary sense of the word, is not necessarily within the Act. Many cases were put in the course of the argument in which it is clearly not so. Whenever the purpose for which the Act is done is to make the animal more serviceable for the use of man the statute ought not to be held to apply. As was said by Wightman, J. in Budge v. Parsons (3 B. & S. 382, 385), the cruelty intended by the statute is the unnecessary abuse of the animal. Neither cock fighting, nor the chance of a prize at an exhibition, is such a purpose as prevents the word "cruel" as used in the Act from applying.

Case remitted to the magistrates with this opinion.

CORY AND OTHERS v. BRISTOW.

Poor rate—Moorings in the Thames—Rateability—Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 147), s. 91.

To make an occupier rateable, his occupation must be actual, exclusive, and profitable, but an occupation may be actual and exclusive where the owner of the soil permits another to make a substantial erection upon it, for although the freeholder can at any time revoke the licence, yet until he does so, the occupation with regard to the erection is in the person who made it.

The Conservators of the Thames being owners of the soil and bed of the river, and having statutory powers to give and revoke licences to lay down moorings, granted to the plaintiffs permission to lay down moorings for two coal "derricks," subject to the conditions, "inter alia," that they should be worked to the satisfaction of the Conservators, and that if it should at any time be found inexpedient to allow the moorings to remain, the Conservators would cause them to be removed.

Under sect. 91, a week's notice must be given by the Conservators before causing such removal.

H. OF L.]

CORY AND OTHERS v. BRISTOW.

[H. OF L.]

The moorings consisted of four anchors and two stones; two of the anchors were made with one fluke each, and were such as are generally used for permanent moorings. In laying them down a hole was dredged out large enough to contain the whole of the anchor, at a depth of 7 ft. below the bed of the river, the stones were placed in similar holes; the derricks were attached by chain cables to both anchors and stones, and the holes were then filled up to the level of the river bed with ballast. The moorings thus formed, were as firm as moorings could be, and the derricks could only be moved by casting off the cables and leaving the anchors and stones behind.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal), that the derricks were liable to be rated in respect of such moorings.

This was an action brought (in pursuance of 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, a local Act) against the defendant, a clerk to the churchwardens, &c., of Greenwich, to recover 500*l.* for damages sustained by the plaintiffs by the unlawful seizure and conversion by the churchwardens, &c., of a ship known by the name of the Atlas, and for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs. The cause was tried before Brett, J., in Middlesex after Hilary Term 1874, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a special case stated as to whether the plaintiffs were occupiers of land in the parish of Greenwich.

The case was argued before the Court of Common Pleas (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, J., and Denman, J.) on the 26th April 1875, when judgment was given for the plaintiffs (ante p. 37; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 504; 44 L. J. 288, C. P.).

Against this judgment the defendant appealed on the 11th Dec. 1875, when the Court of Appeal (James, Mellish, and Baggallay, L.JJ., and Blackburn, J.) reversed the judgment of the court below (ante vol. 9, p. 500; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624; L. Rep. 1 C. P. D. 54), and it was against this decision that the plaintiffs now appealed.

The facts are fully set out in the reports of the case in the court below.

The resolution of the conservators by which permission was given to the plaintiffs to lay down the moorings was in the following terms:

Resolved "That permission be given to Messrs. Cory and Son to lay down moorings (at which they may place derrick hulks) immediately opposite the sluice next eastward of Angerstein's Wharf, East Greenwich, and 510 ft. from the river wall at the said sluice as per plan, the work to be done to the satisfaction of the Conservators of the River Thames, and under the inspection of the harbour master, and to remain under it, the following conditions being agreed to and observed by Messrs. Cory, viz., that the accommodation be assessed and the rent paid thereon; that the hulk be not used for the purpose of storing coals, that it be for the general use of the coal trade; that the barges to or from the hulk be in all cases towed by a steam tug to or from the Custom House, London; that all vessels leave the hulk immediately upon being discharged, and that sailing colliers, when discharged, be towed away to such part of the river as the harbour master may direct, and in all other respects be worked to the satisfaction of the Conservators under the inspection of the harbour master, and with the full understanding upon the part of Messrs. Cory that if at any time hereafter it shall be found by the Conservators inexpedient to permit the moorings of the derrick hulk to remain in that or any other part of the river, the Conservators will, under the powers vested in them by the 91st sect. of the Thames Conservancy Act, cause the same to be removed."

By sect. 91 of 20 & 21 Vict., c. 147, no mooring chains shall be put down or placed in any part of the river without the permission of the Conservators previously obtained. Every such mooring chain which shall be put down or placed shall be so continued only during the pleasure of the Conservators; and the conservators may, at any time, by giving one week's notice in writing, require such mooring chains to be removed; and in case default shall be made in such removal beyond the time to be mentioned in such notice, such mooring chain shall be treated by the Conservators as a nuisance, and removed accordingly.

Thesiger, Q.C. and Patchett, Q.C. for appellants.

—The material sections of the Conservancy Act are the 44th, which gives the conservators power to make bye-laws for the navigation of the river; sect. 50, which vests in them all the estate and rights formerly possessed by the Crown and the Corporation of London in the soil and bed of the river; sects. 57 and 58, which relate to grant of licences by the conservancy for various purposes, and amongst others for the laying down of mooring chains; sect. 90, which enables the conservators to purchase private mooring chains; and sect. 91, which has been already referred to. Sect. 91 raises an a priori presumption that it would be improbable that the conservators would actually vest the soil of the river in a person who put down mooring chains—it is more probable that they would keep it subject to their own bye-laws, and grant a mere licence for the use of the bed of the river—and the informal nature of the document by which the authority was given points to the same conclusion—if they had intended to give a title such as would enable the Messrs. Cory to maintain trespass, they would have done so under seal; but that is not the case, there is simply a resolution of the Conservators, and this is communicated to Mr. Cory by letter—with the exception of the word "rent" there is nothing in the document which points to a tenancy. In the resolution the words are that "permission" be given—not "to occupy" but to lay down mooring chains. Not the words you would expect if the conservators were vesting any title to the bed of the river in the appellants:

In the latter case every word of the judgment of Blackburn, J. is applicable to the case now under discussion, and Lush, J. bases his judgment upon the documents in the case. [Lord BLACKBURN.—In that case the moorings belonged to the Conservators—here they are your own moorings.] It matters not whether the Conservators put them down as agents or put them down as their own and charge for them. The illustration of the lodger would be quite as apposite to the present case as to the case cited.

were two cases very similar to the present one, and although the occupation in those cases had been for several years, it was held that they were not rateable. The same principle was maintained under the converse of the present circumstances in London and North-Western Railway Company

Moreover, the occupation in the present case is not a permanent one, and Cory v. The Churchwardens of Greenwich (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 499; 41 L. J. 142, Mag. The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Cairns).—My Lords, the question raised by this appeal is whether the appellants are rateable to the relief of the poor of the parish of Greenwich under an assessment which has been made against them. In the assessment the description of the property rated is thus given. First, "Moorings to which coal derrick and apparatus, Atlas No. 1, are moored to bed of river." Secondly, "Moorings to which coal derrick and apparatus, Atlas No. 2, are moored to bed of river." So that the subject matter in respect of which the appellants are said to be rateable is certain moorings by which a certain coal derrick is moored to the bed of the river Thames. Now, my Lords, in order to place the facts of the case upon a distinct footing, and to distinguish them from one or two authorities which have been very much pressed upon your Lordships I will direct your Lordships' attention to the statement in the case as to the nature of these moorings. With regard to Atlas No. 1 the case states that it is "moored or retained at the spot where she floats in the following way, viz., by two single fluke anchors on the side nearest the shore, by two stones on the channel side, and by two stream anchors, one at her head and the other at her stern." It is also stated that, having been formerly in another position than that which she now occupies, in moving her from the former position, the four anchors and the chain cables by which she had then been attached to the mooring were removed with her, and two of them were put down again in mooring her at her present moorings, and that those two are two of the four to which I have already referred. It is stated in paragraph 12 that the moorings as actually laid down for Atlas No. 1 consist of four anchors and two stones, and that of those anchors the two named in paragraph 8, that is to say the two which had followed her from the place where she previously had been moored, which had been taken on board and brought with her, these two are "small and of little importance," and it is not contended on the part of the defendant that any liability to be rated in respect of the soil occupied by them attaches to the plaintiffs. I ask your Lordships' attention to that, because it appears that there are two of these anchors which are part of the equipment of the ship, and followed her from her previous moorings, and are dropped at her present moorings, and it is not said that they constitute any moorings in respect of which rateability will arise. But the other two anchors are made with only one fluke each, and are such as are never used as anchors on board ship, but are only used for permanent moorings. Anchors with one fluke could not be trusted to take the ground when dropped in the ordinary way. In laying down each of these anchors, a hole was dredged out, large enough to contain the whole of the anchor, and to a depth between 7 and 8 ft. below the bed of the river. The anchor was then carefully laid on with the fluke downwards, and the hole was afterwards filled up to the level of the bed of the river with ballast, which lies all round and over the anchor, through which ballast the chain cable is led up to the derrick. Again, the two stones used are each of them about 7 ft. long by 5 ft. wide and 3 ft. thick. In order to put each of these in their places, a hole was dredged out large enough to contain the stone and about 7 ft. deep. The stone was then let down into the hole, and the hole then filled up to the level of the bed of the river with ballast. There is about 4 ft. thickness of ballast on each stone, and about seventy tons of ballast are used in each hole, a chain cable is led up through the ballast to the derrick. The moorings formed by these two anchors and stones are as firm moorings as it is possible to place in the river. It is quite impossible that the derrick using them can weigh them in the ordinary way in which ships weigh anchor. If the derrick had to be moved, it could only be by casting off the cables and leaving these anchors and stones behind. Now, my Lords, by whom was this work done of embedding these moorings in the soil of the river? That is stated in the 11th paragraph, "Instead of themselves laying down the moorings contemplated by the said resolution" (to that I shall have afterwards to refer—it is the resolution authorising this work) "the plaintiffs caused and procured the necessary work to be done by the workmen of the said conservators, and paid the said conservators the whole of the costs and charges of the materials and labour expended in and about the same." Therefore your Lordships will take it just as if the present appellants had themselves by their own servants purchased the materials which were necessary for these moorings, and then by permission of those who could authorise them, laid the moorings down in the bed of the river. With regard to the other moorings there is some difference in the way in which they have been made. The 16th paragraph of the case states, "The material position of the moorings of Atlas No. 2 consists of two anchors, similar to the anchors mentioned in paragraph 12, but having iron instead of wooden stocks, which bury themselves by their own weight in the bed of the river, so that it was not necessary to dredge holes to receive them. But instead of the stones used for Atlas No. 1, two large fan-shaped screws have been used. These are screwed into the bed of the river to a depth of 10 ft. in the manner shown upon the plan marked 'A' annexed hereto, which is to be taken as part of this case. These screws, together with the two single fluke anchors, form moorings as permanent as those used for Atlas No. 1, and it would be equally impossible for the derrick using them to weigh them in the ordinary way." These being the facts with regard to these moorings, I will ask your Lordships to observe how completely they differ from the facts in the case of Cory v. The Churchwardens of Greenwich (subi sup.). The facts of that case were these: There was a derrick which, as regards that which was above water, appears to have been of the same character as those which I have just mentioned, and it was moored in the river, but it was moored simply in this way, "by two single fluke anchors on the side nearest the shore, and by two stones on the channel side, and by two stream anchors, one at the head and the other at the stern. The anchors and stones were merely dropped into the river, no force being used for the purpose of fastening either anchors or stones. Before dropping the stones, a small quantity of ballast was removed in the bed of the river, so that the stones might be flat." My Lords, under these circumstances it was held that the moorings were not immoveable from the bed of the river, that they were only, as the late Mr. Justice Willes expressed it, "part of the equipment of the vessel itself," and that therefore there were no moorings which could be said to be fixed to the soil of the river, and to be occupied as part of the soil by the plaintiffs. That, my Lords, I think puts aside that authority, and will enable your Lordships, having regard to the facts which are found in the present case, to arrive, as I think you will without hesitation, at the conclusion that you have here moorings which are clearly fixed into and bedded in the soil of the river Thames, just as much as if piles had been driven 10ft. or 20ft. deep into the soil, and that if you find any person in occupation of these moorings, and that occupation is a beneficial occupation, the person so occupying is occupying hereditaments within the statutes which create chargeability to the assessment to the poor. There arises, then, this other question. Who is the occupier of these moorings? In the first place, to whom do they belong? Unquestionably they belong to the present appellants. They do not belong to the conservators of the river; they were provided by the appellants out of their own money, and put down at their own expense. And this circumstance differs the present case most materially from the second case, which was much pressed in argument upon your Lordships. I mean the case within the jurisdiction of the conservators of the river, the case of Watkins v. The Overseers of Milton (ubi sup.). In that case there was a coal hulk which was moored in the river Thames for the purpose of containing coal which was put out of lighters into the hulk, and then again distributed in other lighters when wanted for use. This hulk was moored in the river Thames, in the parish of Milton, near Gravesend, and it was moored in this way. There were two screw piles driven into the bed of the river by the conservators, and belonging to the conservators, and a license was granted by the conservators to the owner of the hulk to moor or attach his hulk to these piles so driven into the bed of the river. It does not appear from the agreement in the case that there was an exclusive permission given to the owner of this hulk only, and if I were to judge by the agreement alone I should have said that it might have been in the power of the conservators either to have attached a vessel of their own, or to have allowed some other person to attach a vessel or hulk of his to the same screw piles. I see, however, that the learned judges assume that it ought to be looked at, and therefore I prefer to look at it as if exclusive permission had been given to the owner of the hulk to attach, as in point of fact for several years he had attached, his hulk to the piles. But, my Lords, that case turns entirely upon this, that the owner of the hulk who was the person rated was not in occupation of these moorings. The moorings were not his, but were the moorings of the Conservators, who having these moorings belonging to themselves gave him the permission to attach his hulk to these moorings. The court held, and I will assume rightly held, because it does not bear in any way upon the facts of the present case that that was merely a permission to attach the hulk to the moorings of the Conservators, and that there was no occupation by the owner of the hulk of the moorings of the Conservators. My Lords, whether that case be rightly decided or not, it has no bearing upon the facts of the present case, where your Lordships find moorings put down by the appellants, and used by the appellants alone, and with regard to which either you must arrive, as it seems to me, at the conclusion that they are occupied by no person whatever, or if they are occupied by anyone, that they are occupied by the appellants. But, my Lords, it remains to look more accurately at what is the character of the occupation of the appellants, and how it is that they come to have the occupation of these moorings. For the purpose of rating, it might, indeed, be sufficient to look at the mere fact of occupation. They are found in occupation, and that is to them a valuable occupation, of this fixed property, and are therefore rateable to the relief of the poor, even though it might turn out that their occupation is a wrongful one, or one the propriety of which they cannot justify. But when your Lordships look at the circumstances under which they have come into that occupation, it appears to me that their possession of the moorings is a rightful one, and is itself to be designated according to the most accurate expression "an occupation" of the moorings. Their occupation arises in this way. The Conservators of the Thames have under the Act of 1857, carried over to them, and brought into their proprietorship, all the rights in the bed and soil of the river Thames which belonged to the Crown, or which were claimed by the Corporation of London. They are made the guardians, as it were, of the navigation of the Thames, and the protectors of the bed and soil, for the purpose of the navigation. They have certain very wide powers given to them for the protection of the navigation, and may make bye-laws for the same purpose. They have power to make piers and landing-places for the accommodation of the public, and they have powers to authorise riparian owners to make landing places, and wharves, and jetties, and to put down mooring chains and moorings for the better and more convenient enjoyment of access to their lands. In this particular case, the Conservators passed a resolution giving Messrs. Cory permission, not as a matter of favour or indulgence, but upon the proper assessment of rent by the proper officer as to the value of such permission, to occupy the moorings, in accordance with the terms of that resolution, and Messrs. Cory are warned at the end of their agreement that the Conservators will retain the statutory rights given them by the 91st section of the Conservancy Act, of causing the moorings, at any time they think fit, to be removed on giving a week's notice, but subject to that right of removing them by their statutory power at week's notice, the moorings will be allowed to remain, the rent assessed upon them being regularly paid. Now, my Lords, as I read that, putting aside the words and looking at the real substance of the transaction, I cannot look upon it as otherwise than an exercise upon the part of the conservators of their Parliamentary powers, by giving to Messrs. Cory a right to lay down these moorings, and also a right, after the moorings are laid down, to occupy them through the instrumentality of this derrick, until, in the exercise of the same Parliamentary powers, and upon a week's notice being given, the Conservators shall remove them from their occupation. It therefore seems to me that your Lordships have here a fixed property, found in the occupation of the Messrs. Cory, to an occupation of which fixed property no person else can set up any claim, and that done by an exercise by the Conservators of powers which appear to me to provide for, and to authorise, if it were necessary to find authority for it, an occupation of that kind. On the whole, my Lords, I must say I am entirely satisfied with the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal, and I submit, therefore, to your Lordships that this being a case of error, judgment here also should pass for the defendant in error.

CORY AND OTHERS v. BRISTOW.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I take the same view of the case as my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. There are two questions to which, as it appears to me, we must direct our attention, and to which, indeed, our attention has been most ably directed by Mr. Thesiger and Mr. Patchett. First, what is the nature of the interest conferred by the agreement or permission set forth in the case before us? Secondly, when we have ascertained the character of that interest, what is the nature of the occupation which has been exercised by the appellants in this case? As Lord Campbell expresses it in Forrest v. The Overseers of Greenwich (ubi sup.), as regards the nature of the occupation, the question is whether it be "a permanent and profitable occupation of land within the parish," which seeks to assess the person in respect of such occupation. As regards the interest of the person who is to be rated, it must be an interest in himself exclusively. On the first point, the argument turned upon the latter branch of the case, viz., whether the appellants had got such an occupation under this instrument as would make them liable to rating. I apprehend that in ascertaining the answer to that question, the courts have not meant by the term "exclusively" that the interest may not be determined on certain terms and conditions, but merely that the person so occupying should have the right, unattended by a simultaneous right of any other person in respect of the same subject matter. The common illustration in cases of this character is that of a landlord of an hotel or of a lodging house, in which case, although a person sleeping at the hotel may have the exclusive use of his bedroom for the night, or the exclusive use of a sitting room during the day, or a lodger the exclusive use of the chambers he occupies, still there is a concurrent right reserved by the landlord of the hotel or the person who lets the lodgings, of using the hotel or lodging house for whatever purposes he may think fit for managing the establishment and all purposes connected with it. That is not such an occupation on the part of the lodger as would make him liable to be rated. But in the present case all the argument has turned upon this, that independently of the question whether or not this be a license or in the nature of a demise, inasmuch as there are certain bye-laws which may be made from time to time by the Conservators who have given this permission, and inasmuch as by the 91st section of the Act the power of any person to have this beneficial occupation may be determined on a week's notice, therefore there is not conferred on the Messrs. Cory the exclusive possession of these mooring chains, which they have been permitted to place in the river as is described in the case. I apprehend, my Lords, that it would be a confusion of ideas to say that it interferes with the exclusive possession any more than the right of re-entry on the part of a landlord in certain given events could be said to interfere in any way with the right of the tenant during the time he is holding. He is in beneficial occupation for a term, though that term is limited by certain contingencies which may possibly determine his interest at an earlier period. Now, my Lords, what is the effect of this agreement? A permission is granted to Messrs. Cory to lay down mooring chains according to the powers vested in the Conservators pursuant to the 58th section of the Act, and when laid down they are to remain. They are to do that at their own expense, and they are to do it to the satisfaction of the officers appointed for that purpose by the Conservators, a phrase which would not be used with respect to any work they were to do themselves. Independently of the bye-laws, and independently of anything arising upon the 91st section, the mooring chains are to remain, and during the whole of that time the Messrs. Cory are in exclusive possession, and in permanent possession, in the sense in which that word is used in cases of this description, and in profitable possession. I cannot find anything on the face of the instrument that can intimate any doubt at all upon that being the character of their possession the remaining of these mooring chains of which they are to make use being secured to them, subject only to those contingencies which they have agreed upon, but the possession being full and complete until these contingencies occur. It was observed by Mr. Patchett that in Watkin's case (ubi sup.) the Conservators did the work, and he said, so they did here, but that really is a transparent fallacy. They did not do any portion of the work here. It was simply that, instead of hiring another set of labourers, the Messrs. Cory hired the labourers of the conservators, which I apprehend they were at perfect liberty to do if the conservators were willing that they should be so employed, and they paid the conservators for those labourers whom they so employed in execution of the work. In other words, the Messrs. Cory did the work through the medium of a particular agency. That agency makes no difference in their position. The work was entirely done by the Messrs. Cory, and they having done this work all the other conditions in the agreement were also fulfilled, one of which was that the rent was to be assessed in the course provided by the Act, which was done, and it was assessed at a tolerably high figure. All that having been done, it seems to me that Messrs. Cory became the owners, and subject to the events which might determine the ownership under the permission, the sole and complete owners of this profitable tenement. Then arises the question.

CORY AND OTHERS v. BRISTOW.

[H. OF L.]

Are the Messrs. Cory the owners in the sense of being occupiers of land situate within the parish? My Lords, I can have no doubt upon that point, when I look at the nature and the character of these mooring chains. They are described in the papers before us, and the case is thereby at once distinguished from two or three of the cases which have been cited, one being with reference to a floating dock and another being with reference to an arrangement by which these mooring chains were sunk, as they were sunk here, but fixed so far less than here that they were capable of being moved like other anchors, whereas here they were sunk and fixed, and would have to be hauled up by machinery fixed in a derrick. That alters the present case from the case of a floating dock, which is, as it were, a vessel floating about upon the water, and which cannot be said to have any immovability whatever in any given parish, and so can hardly be subject to rates. The circumstance in the other case that the derrick itself by its own instrumentality could haul up the stones and mooring chains just as it could any anchor reduced it again to the case of a ship of which it could not be predicated that it occupied land situated within a parish. But here we are told by the case itself that the derrick cannot be removed at all except by slipping its chains and cables, because the stones and the rest of the apparatus are so fixed in the bed of the river as to prevent their being hauled up. It is not a nice question here as was said in part of the argument between the possibility of moving a more or less great weight, but these circumstances indicate the intention from the very first of all the parties to the agreement that it should be a fixed and permanent mooring chain subject only to such contingencies as might arise in the execution of the works of the conservators if anything should occur to require its removal. My Lords, I think that not one of the cases has been in the slightest degree brought up to such a case as we have here before us. I cannot have any doubt whatever that there is a permanent beneficial interest liable to be divested in certain given contingencies as I have described, that it is a valuable and exclusive interest and that it is an interest situate in the bed of the river within the parish of Greenwich, and, therefore, that it is liable to be rated.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, in this there is no real conflict about legal principles. All the judges of the courts below have agreed as to the grounds of rateability. The occupation to which it is attached must be an actual and exclusive and a profitable occupation. The only question is whether the Messrs. Cory had such an occupation? I think they clearly had, and were therefore liable to be rated. It is not necessary to consider the nature of the powers of the conservators for the purpose of the argument; but if it were, I have no doubt that they acted within those powers in their dealings with the appellants. Under the 50th section of the statute they had vested in them all the interests of the Corporation of London and the Crown in the bed and soil of the river Thames, with authority to make jetties, piers, and landing places, and to permit the construction of such moorings as are the subject of our inquiry. Exercising their statutable powers they entered into a bargain that for certain considerations the Messrs. Cory should have liberty to plant their moorings in the bed and soil of the river with an understanding that if the conservators should at any time find it inexpedient to permit these moorings to remain they might cause their removal under the 91st section of the Thames Conservancy Act by giving a week's notice. The Messrs. Cory proceeded with their work, and completed a large and costly erection, digging down several feet in the bed of the river, filling the excavation with great stones, passing heavy chains through them, and piling on the whole some seventy tons of ballast. All this was done with their own money, and under their own control, and the erection so completed was their own property. The conservators did not spend a penny, or do an act in the course of construction, or meddle in any way with it when it was completed, it remained in the hands and under the full dominion of those who had created it, subject to the right of removal of the conservators when they might find it desirable to fulfil the statutable conditions for that purpose. In this state of undisputed facts it appears to me that the Messrs. Cory had an occupation of a very real and substantial kind, and an occupation which was not merely actual but rightful, fairly purchased and warranted by law. If the occupation was not in them it was in nobody, and I cannot, in my view of the circumstances, concur with some of the learned judges in holding that the occupation, actual or constructive, remained in the conservators. If by their permission a great stage had been put upon piles driven into the river's bed for 20ft. or 30ft., to which the Messrs. Cory could alone have access, as they alone had erected it, or if a great house had been built with the same licence, and in the same way, having its foundation in the river, the conservators might as well have been called the occupants of both, though neither belonged to them, and upon neither could they have entered for a moment. There was, therefore, in my judgment, an actual occupation in the Messrs. Cory, and if their occupation was actual, it was exclusive. The licence or permission, call you what you will, under which the moorings were created, was not to be capriciously determined at any instant, or without the formal notice prescribed by the statute, and until that notice was given, the conservators, if they had ventured to intrude upon them, would have acted illegally and been liable to answer in an action. For the time, and subject to the conditions, Messrs. Cory were exclusive occupants as completely as if their occupation had been of their own fee simple estate. If the occupation was actual and exclusive, it was confessedly profitable, and so had all the qualities needful to render the occupants subject to the rate. I need add nothing as to the authorities cited, as not one of them appears to me to sustain the appellant's contention. Mr. Thesiger ably urged the public importance of preserving to the conservators the control of the river, and the inconvenience of the construction which would recognise the exclusive occupancy of the appellants. But the contract is clear and specific, and the effect of its express provisions cannot be destroyed by any allegation of its interference with the interests of commerce. The conservators had a perfect legal right to do what they did; their bargain equally bound them and those with whom they dealt, and we must accept its terms and their consequences. Besides, unless the provision as to this statutable notice was a mere nullity, and this has not been asserted, it undoubtedly limited and suspended the control of the conservators over the bed of the river, and that result, if an evil one, could not be avoided on either view of the case. On the whole I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be sustained.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. Neither the Court of Common Pleas in this case, nor the Court of Appeal entertained any doubt that there was an occupation of land here, so that the parties might be liable to be rated. Upon that I will only make one remark to show that the case of Cory v. The Churchwardens of Greenwich, in which the Court of Common Pleas had upon this very same rate, and very same derrick, decided that it was not rateable, is really not in point of law in conflict with the decision of the present case, either as it was determined by the court below, or as it will now be affirmed by your Lordships. The manner in which the case was raised was different, and that made a difference in the result. In the former case, Cory v. Churchwardens of Greenwich, the churchwardens went before the stipendiary police magistrate and asked him to enforce the rate. Upon hearing the case, he thought that the Messrs. Cory were rateable, and he did enforce the rate. Then he was required to state a case for the Common Pleas, which case he stated, giving powers (I suppose by consent of the parties) to the Court of Common Pleas to draw all inferences of fact from the case so stated. How they came to be so stated as they were I do not know, but on the facts as appearing upon that case, the Court of Common Pleas, as then informed, drew the inference of fact that this derrick was no more occupying the land than any ship whose anchor has been dropped upon the ground and rides at anchor can be said in the legal sense of the term to have an occupation of the ground. If that representation of fact was right, the conclusion of law would follow, that the Messrs. Cory did not occupy any land and could not be rated. That much was clear, whether or not that conclusion was properly drawn from the evidence, as stated by the magistrate, is not a question now before your Lordships, and we need not form any opinion upon it. If the representation of fact was correctly made, the conclusion of law that the Messrs. Cory were not rateable would be perfectly irresistible. But now, my Lords, that having taken place, upon the very same rate, the parties raised the question in a different way, which also they had a right to do. The magistrate, after the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, of course refused to grant his warrant of distress, but the overseers had a right under the Act, which is commonly called Jervis's Act, to come and get a mandamus, or rather a rule in lieu of a mandamus, for the purpose of raising the question before a jury, and ultimately, as they have done here before this, the final Court of Appeal. That course having been taken, an action having been brought, the facts were more accurately determined, and what your Lordships have now to do is to see what is the effect of the facts as found and stated at the trial, not as found and stated by the magistrate previously. Taking the facts as they are found now, I apprehend that no one of your Lordships could for a moment doubt that here there was a complete occupation of the soil (whoever it was that occupied it) by the derrick occupying by means of those moorings which were fixed in the soil, I think I may say quite as permanently as the foundations of an ordinary house would be fixed. No doubt they were capable of being removed and taken up, and so the foundations of a house would be, still it is clear that they were fixed and occupying the soil. My Lords, the only other question was, who was the occupier? Were the plaintiffs merely persons having an easement without occupying, or were they the rightful occupiers? Upon that, my Lords, I do not think it necessary, nor would it be becoming in me, as I was one of the judges in the court below, to say more than that I have not seen any reason to change the opinion which I then formed as one of the judges of the Court of Appeal, viz., that the plaintiffs are the occupiers, and that as such occupiers they are properly rateable, and that I understand to be the opinion of all your Lordships.

LORD GORDON concurred.

THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF ESSENDON v. BLACKWOOD.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF THE COLONY OF VICTORIA.

Rateable property—Exemption—Local Government Act 1874—Racecourse—“Land used for public purposes”—Beneficial occupation by individuals. The Victoria Local Government Act, 1874, enacts (sect. 253) that “all land shall be rateable property, except land the property of her Majesty which is unoccupied or used for public purposes.”

The respondent, as chairman of the Victoria Racing Club, held land used as a racecourse, under a demise from the Crown for ninety-nine years at a peppercorn rent, in trust for the club, and for the purposes of the Victoria Racing Club Act 1871, the reversion being in the Crown. The members of the club had certain privileges beyond the general public in the use of the land, and the club had a pecuniary interest in the rents and profits of it.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the land was not within the exemption, not being used solely for public purposes, without any beneficial occupation by individuals.

Hanna v. Seymour Road Board (2 W. W. & A. B. 98) approved.

Quære, first, whether the land was at the time, and for the purpose of rating, “the property of her Majesty;” secondly, whether a racecourse to be enjoyed by those only of the public who are able and willing to pay for admission can be deemed to be “used for public purposes.”

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria (Stawell, O.J., and Stephen, J.) affirming a decision of the Court of General Sessions of the Peace for the Central Bailiwick, which had decided that the respondent was not liable to be rated under the Local Government Act, 1874 (38 Vict. No. 506) in respect of the Melbourne Racecourse, of which he was occupier as Chairman of the Victoria Racing Club.

The facts appear shortly in the headnote above, and are more fully detailed in the judgment of their Lordships, in which also the sections of the various Acts of the Colonial Legislature bearing upon the case are set out.

McIntyre, Q.C. and J. D. Wood appeared for the appellants, and argued that under the circumstances the land could not be considered the "property of her Majesty," being demised to the respondent and his successors for ninety-nine years, and even if it were so, it is not "used for public purposes," which must mean "national purposes," horseracing not being such a purpose, and the public not being admitted without payment, while the members of the club enjoy special privileges. To bring the land within the exemption it should be used exclusively for public purposes, which this land cannot be said to be, as the club makes a profit out of it. They cited Theisiger, Q.C. and Erskine Pollock (Poland with them) for the respondent, contended that the land came within the exemption in the Act as being common property used for a public purpose. The English decisions before the Mersey Docks Case (ubi sup.) were conflicting. See Reg. v. Badcock (6 Q. B. 787), but they have only a remote bearing, as this statutory exemption is wider than is allowed by English law. The whole character of the demise, and of the Victoria Racing Club Act, 1871 (35 Vict. No. 398) establishes that the land is used for a public purpose.

May 14.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows: This appeal is from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria, which affirmed the decision of a Court of General Sessions of the Peace, disallowing a rate, made by the Council of the Borough of Essendon and Flemington, on a racecourse vested in the respondent, as chairman of the Victoria Racing Club. The description in the rate is "Trustees of Racecourse—Racecourse," and the assessment is made on a net annual value of 2500l. The racecourse is held by the respondent under a demise from the Crown, in trust for the club, and for the purposes of "The Victoria Racing Club Act 1871." The question to be decided is whether the racecourse falls within the exemption from rateability contained in the 253rd section of the Colonial "Local Government Act 1874." That section enacts, that "all land shall be rateable property," save "land the property of Her Majesty which is unoccupied or used for public purposes, land in the occupation of the Crown or the Government of Victoria," and land held or used under certain specified conditions to which it is not necessary to refer. The respondent contends that this racecourse is "the property of Her Majesty used for public purposes;" the appellants say that at the time of making the rate it was neither the Crown's property nor used for public purposes. The history of the racecourse and of the club is found in the preamble of "The Victoria Racing Club Act 1871." A grant from the Crown (21st Sept., 1859) was made of certain lands (said to contain 301 acres) to Mr. Ligar and four other persons, for twenty-one years, at a peppercorn rent, upon trust that it and the buildings to be erected on it should throughout the term "be set apart, maintained, and used as a public racecourse," subject to such reasonable rules and regulations for the admission of the public, and the price to be paid for such admission, as the trustees should in writing resolve on. Power was given to the trustees to raise money to be applied in furtherance of the purposes of the grant, and to charge the admission prices with the payment of the money so raised. The preamble further states that in 1864 the racing club was formed, and with the consent of the above trustees had "now" the control and management of the racecourse, and that the club had expended considerable sums of money in improving the course, and in erecting good and substantial buildings and fences on it, and proposed to expend further moneys to a considerable amount in erecting a new grand stand and other buildings. Such was the state of things when the Racing Club Act of 1871 was passed. It enacts (sect. 3) that the club may sue and be sued in the name of the chairman, and (sect. 6.) that execution may issue on judgments against the chairman upon the property of the club, except the land vested in or demised to him under the Act. Sect. 7 enacts that Ligar and the other lessees shall cease to have any interest under the grant of 1859, and that the land demised by it shall be vested in the chairman and his successors "in trust for the club," as if he and they were a corporation sole, for the term and upon the trusts mentioned in the grant. The 8th section empowers her Majesty to demise the same land and any contiguous land to the chairman and his successors for any term of years. In pursuance of the powers conferred by this section, the Crown, by a grant of the 8th Jan. 1872, demised the racecourse to the respondent and his successors for the term of ninety-nine years, at a peppercorn rent, to be held by them "in trust for the Victoria Racing Club, for the purposes of the Victoria Racing Club Act." The 10th clause of the Act is as follows: "The lands by this Act vested in or authorised to be demised to the chairman shall be held by such chairman and his successors in office only for the purpose of being maintained and used for a public racecourse, under and subject to the provisions of this Act, and any byelaws to be made under and by virtue hereof, and save as herein expressly provided, shall not be used, demised, or let for building purposes, or unless, with the permission in writing of the Board of Land and Works first had and obtained, for any other purpose whatsoever." It is unnecessary to consider whether the term of twenty-one years granted by the original lease has merged in the larger term, for the 11th section declares that the land so granted shall be "vested in the chairman for the purposes mentioned in the 10th section." Powers are given to the committee of the club to maintain the existing buildings on the land, and to erect such others as may, in their opinion, be expedient "for or in connection with the use of the land as a public racecourse" (section 12); also to make by-laws for the election of members to the club, and the expulsion of members, and for the management of the affairs of the club, and also for regulating all matters concerning the racecourse, "and the admission thereto and expulsion therefrom of members of the club, and the public respectively, and the charges to be paid for such admission, and for the general management of the racecourse, races, and race meetings:" (sect. 13.) It is to be observed that the Act provides for two classes of byelaws, one regulating the club, the other the racecourse. The 24th section enables the committee to prescribe by byelaws, the tolls and charges to be levied for admission to the racecourse, and the buildings thereon, and to demand and recover them from any person coming upon the land or buildings; but it contains a very material provision in favour of members of the club, viz., that "the committee may in any such byelaw provide that members of the club shall be exempt, either wholly or to such extent as such byelaw shall specify, from the payment of all or any of such tolls or charges." Provision is made that byelaws shall not be in force until a month after they have been notified to the Chief Secretary of Victoria, within which period they may be disallowed by the Governor in Council (section 14), and for their publication in the Gazette: (sect. 15.) The Governor in Council may repeal bye-laws: (sect. 18.) Other sections provide that they shall be exhibited on the racecourse, and prescribe penalties for offences against them: (sects. 18-20.) Power is given to the chairman to let from year to year, or for a less time, any portions of the racecourse or the tolls demandable under the Act: (sect. 25.) Power is also given to the chairman to borrow on the credit of the rents, profits, tolls, and other revenue of the club, 15,000*l.*, and to mortgage the revenue to secure it, and to re-borrow to that amount; the money to be applied in the permanent improvement of the land for racing purposes, or in the erection and maintenance of buildings, or for rendering the land more convenient and useful for racing purposes: (sects. 26, 27, 28.) Provision is made for an annual audit of the accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the club by an auditor appointed by the Board of Land and Works; and such accounts are to be open to the inspection of the public: (38 and the following sections.) The 43rd section enacts that if the land shall, except with the consent of the Governor in Council, cease for twelve months to be used as a public racecourse, or to be applied to any other purposes, it shall revert to her Majesty for the benefit of the public: (sect. 43.) To this provision, however, there is attached a condition (material to be considered with reference to the question to be now determined), that the Crown shall not be entitled to resume possession without previously paying to the chairman "in trust for the club" the value of all buildings then upon the land, to be determined in case of dispute under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act: (sect. 44.) It is to be noticed that the Act assumes that the club may possess real and personal property other than the land derived from the Crown, and vests such property in the chairman and his successors, in trust for the club: (sect. 9.) It appears from the evidence stated by the Court of Sessions, that large sums have been expended by the club in erecting a grand stand, ranger's house, horse boxes, and other buildings, the grand stand alone having cost 14,000*l.* On the other hand, large profits have been derived from the race meetings, as much as 13,887*l.* having been received at one meeting, upon which there was a net profit of 4497*l.* Large profits also have been made by fees for the use of the racecourse as training ground, and by the sale of the right to sell liquor, and for sheep depastured on the racecourse. The receipts, it is stated, go to the funds of the club. It is also stated that "the members of the club have certain privileges, so far as the grand stand, saddling paddock, and hill are concerned, and pay 5*l.* a year." If this racecourse, with all the above conditions, had been held under a grant from a private owner, it could not have been disputed that it would be rateable. It is exempt only, if, being Crown property, it is used for a public purpose. In their Lordships' view, it is extremely doubtful whether it can be predicated of this land that it was, at the time and for the purpose of rating, the property of her Majesty. It was then vested in the respondent and his successors, for a term of ninety-nine years, with a modified power of sub-letting. The Crown had a reversion only, and was no longer the present and immediate owner of the land. If the proposition that the property is the Crown's be correct, it might have been affirmed with equal truth had the term been 500 years instead of ninety-nine years. By the interpretation clause of the Colonial "Local Government Act," the words "owner of any rateable property" are declared to mean "the person for the time being entitled to receive, or who, if the same were let to a tenant at a rack rent, would be entitled to receive the rack rent thereof;" and by the 290th section, unpaid rates, in default of payment by the occupier, may be recovered from such owner. It was conceded that if the respondent should let the land, the tenant, as occupier, would be liable to be rated; and it seems plain that if such tenant were in default, the rates might be recovered from the respondent as, within the meaning of the Act, the owner of the land. Undoubtedly if a grant were made by the Crown to its own nominee, as a bare trustee for exclusively public purposes, it might properly be held that the land, within the meaning of the exemption, was still the property of the Crown. But is that the character of the respondent's holding? In coming to the consideration of this question, their Lordships assent to what was suggested by Mr. Thesiger, in his able argument, that the two questions of property and public use in some degree run into each other. It is not easy, nor is it necessary to define, generally, what is meant by the words of the exemption "the property of the Crown used for public purposes," though land used for the public service, or as a public park, may be mentioned as instances which would clearly fall within them. But it may well be doubted, whether a racecourse to be enjoyed by those only of the public who are able and willing to pay for admission (all others being liable to be punished as trespassers—sect. 21) can be deemed to be so used. Their Lordships, however, do not think it necessary to decide the appeal on this point, being of opinion that, in order to bring the case within the exemption, the respondent ought to show that the land was used solely for public purposes, without any beneficial occupation by individuals; and this, they are of opinion, he has failed to do. The Chief Justice of the colony took this view of the exemption in a case where the tolls of a bridge had been let for seven years to a builder, to enable him, it was said, to repay himself the cost of building it. The bridge having been found to be the property of the Queen, Stawell, C.J., said, "The only question, therefore, is whether it was used for public purposes. To be deemed so, it must be purely and solely used for such purposes. Here the public had, no doubt, a right of passage over the bridge, but only on payment of a toll, so that it was not for public purposes only, it subserved a private purpose also, and was, therefore, rateable." (Hanna v. Seymour Road Board, 2 W. W. & A. B. 93.) The respondent's trust is two-fold. He holds in trust for the club and for the purposes of the special Act. No doubt there is some indication in the Act that these purposes were of a public nature. The sanction of the governor in council required for the bye-laws, and the power given to the same authority to repeal them, the audit of the accounts by an auditor appointed by Government, and the direction that the accounts shall be open to the public, tend to show that in some sense the racecourse is what it is called, "a public racecourse;" but these are not conclusive tests, since some commercial companies of a public or quasi public nature have been made subject by statutes to not dissimilar conditions. But, together with the trust for these purposes, there is the trust for the club, and it is plain that there are many special privileges and profits to which the members of the club, as such, are entitled, differing in kind from any which the general public can enjoy. Nor were these privileges conferred without consideration. The members of the club had voluntarily expended large sums of their own money in buildings and other improvements before the land became vested in them, and proposed to spend further moneys for the same purpose. It was, therefore, not unreasonable that they should have special privileges, and an interest in the profits to be derived from the racecourse. Thus the 24th clause enables the committee, in framing the byelaws prescribing the tolls and charges to be taken on admission, to exempt the members of the club wholly or in part from such tolls and charges; and, although the byelaws have not been produced, it was not denied that this exemption has been made. There is nothing in the terms of the trust (if no byelaw was made to the contrary) to prevent the members of the club having access at all times to the racecourse and the buildings on it without payment; and they have, as stated in the case, certain privileges "so far as the grand stand, saddling paddock, and hill are concerned." It is true the members pay an annual sum of 5*l.*; but this is obviously the subscription to the club, and in respect of it they, as members of the club, obtain privileges of an exclusive character, greatly coveted and valued by those engaged in racing pursuits, which constitute a beneficial enjoyment of the land beyond that of the general public. Further, the club, as a club, has a pecuniary interest in the rents and profits of the racecourse. The Act contains no express trust for the appropriation of these profits, but a trust may be implied from the 24th section that they should be applied to the maintenance of the racecourse, and the use of it for racing purposes. No provision is made for the appropriation of the surplus profits after these purposes are fulfilled, and their Lordships see no reason to suppose that they might not be properly applied to repay the moneys which the club may have expended for the buildings placed upon the land. This would obviously be a benefit to its members derived from the profits of the land. Not only so, but by express provision of the 44th section, on the contingency of the land reverting to the Crown in case it shall cease to be used as a racecourse, the club would receive a large pecuniary benefit in being paid the value of all the buildings on the land. It is evident that the cost of these buildings might have been defrayed entirely, or in great part, out of the profits derived from the racecourse. In addition to any moneys which the club, out of its own funds, may have spent on buildings, either before or after the Act, the 15,000*l.* which the respondent was empowered to borrow on the credit of the tolls and rents, may have been expended for the same purpose. All buildings thus placed on the land were to be maintained out of the profits of the racecourse, and the money borrowed to erect them might have been wholly repaid from the same source; yet in the event of the ceasing of the term, the respondent would receive in money the full value of all those buildings. The only trust declared of this money is "for the club." Its members, therefore, would be absolutely entitled to it, subject to no obligation to apply it to any public purpose whatever. The judges below do not deny that a beneficial interest may accrue to the club in this respect; but say that as a forfeiture and consequent resumption are not to be presumed, "they are not to suppose that the value of the buildings will be received by the club." Such a contingency, however, might very possibly happen. Supposing the profits to be insufficient to maintain the racecourse, it is not likely the club would keep it open at a loss, and resumption might then take place. Besides, these provisions, coupled with those already commented upon, afford tests for determining whether or not the land was vested in the respondent as a bare trustee, for a public purpose only. The respondent's counsel sought to support their contention that the use of land as a racecourse was a public purpose by referring to the 6th clause of the Victoria Land Act 1869, which enables the governor to reserve from sale Crown lands which, in his opinion, are required "for any public purpose whatsoever," or "for the recreation, convenience, or amusement of the people;" but a comparison of this clause with the exemption clause of the Local Government Act does not assist the respondent. The words "for the recreation, &c., of the people" are not found in this exemption clause, and the introduction of them into the 6th clause of the Land Act, indicates that the previous words "for any public purpose" may have been used in a sense which would not include objects of this nature. It is unnecessary to refer at length to the English decisions. In this country the exemption of Crown property rests on the omission in the Poor Law Acts of any words to bind the Crown. In Victoria the exemption is defined and limited by express enactment. So the class of cases in England, which declared that land used for public purposes, and from which the occupiers derived no individual profit was exempt from rateability, derived their authority simply from being decisions of the courts. These decisions were swept away by the judgment of the House of Lords in the Mersey Docks v. Cameron (11 H. of L. Cas. 443), which determined in effect that, except in the case of the Crown, a liability to be rated attached upon every occupation from which benefit is derived, although the occupation was for purposes which might be deemed to be of a public nature. Even when the above-mentioned class of cases was considered to declare the law, Lord Campbell, in Reg. v. Harrogate (2 E. & B. 184), said, "You have to show that all the purposes to which the money was applied are public." Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court and the decision of the Court of General Sessions be reversed; and the Court of Sessions having reserved the question of the amount of the rate until the question of the liability of the respondent to be rated had been decided by the Supreme Court, they will further advise her Majesty to direct that the case be remitted to the Court of General Sessions, with a declaration that the respondent is liable to be rated for the racecourse, for the purpose of that court determining the amount of the assessment. Their Lordships think that each party should pay his own costs in the Supreme Court; and her Majesty will therefore be further advised to direct that the costs (if any) which may have been paid by the appellants to the respondent, under the rule of the Supreme Court of the 4th July 1876, be repaid by the respondent to the appellants. The respondent must also pay to the appellants the costs of the appeal to her Majesty.

REG. v. BELL AND JORDAN.

Larceny—Proof of ownership of property—Official liquidator of a trading company—Winding-up.

An indictment charged the prisoners with stealing brass, the property of H. The evidence was that the brass was the property of a trading company (limited), and that it was seen on the company's premises about twelve days before it was missed on the 24th March 1877; that the company was being wound-up; and that H. was the official liquidator. A copy of the London Gazette, dated 19th May 1877, was produced, which stated that at a special meeting of the company duly convened, and at a subsequent special general meeting (April 25th) a resolution was passed for winding-up the company voluntarily, and that H. and S. were appointed liquidators at the special general meeting.

Held, that this evidence did not prove that the brass was the property of H. as laid in the indictment. Case reserved for the opinion of this Court at the West Riding Yorkshire quarter sessions.

1. These prisoners were tried before me at the Spring General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, for the West Riding of the county of York, holden at Wakefield, on the second day of April 1877, on an indictment which charged John Bell with feloniously stealing, on the 23rd March 1877, 600 weight of brass, the property of Henry Hart; and Patrick Jordan with feloniously receiving, on the said last mentioned day, the same property.

2. In order to prove that the said Henry Hart was the owner of the property, the subject of the indictment, William Varney was called as a witness, and swore that he had been the secretary of the Cardigan Iron, Steel, and Wire Company (Limited) down to the time of the winding-up of the said company, as mentioned in the notice in the London Gazette set out below. That the said company carried on business at Brightside-lane, Sheffield; that the said Henry Hart was the official liquidator of the said company, and that he (witness) saw the brass mentioned in the indictment safe on the 12th March 1877, at the said place of business in Brightside-lane, and that he missed it on the 24th March 1877. He also produced a copy of the London Gazette of the 19th May 1876, in which appeared the following notice.

The Cardigan Iron, Steel, and Wire Company (Limited).

Notice is hereby given that at a special general meeting of members of the Cardigan Iron, Steel, and Wire Company (Limited) duly convened and held at the Cutlers-hall, Sheffield, in the county of York, on the 4th April 1876, and at a subsequent special general meeting of members, also duly convened and held at the Cutlers-hall, in Sheffield aforesaid, on the 25th April 1876, the following resolution was duly passed and confirmed.

That the agreement dated the 13th March 1876, and made between the Cardigan Iron, Steel, and Wire Company (Limited), of the one part, and Joseph Agnes and Edwin Parker and William Booth and Joseph Croft and Francis Day and James Booz Cave and Humphrey Turner and Benjamin Jones, of the other part, be and is hereby confirmed, and that the company be wound-up voluntarily in accordance with the terms of such agreement.

And at the said subsequent special general meeting the following resolution was duly passed.

(2.) That Messrs. Henry Hart and Robert Henry Sharp be and are hereby appointed liquidators of the Cardigan Iron, Steel, and Wire Company (Limited).

E. H. SHARP, Chairman.

3. The certificate of incorporation of the said company was not produced, and no other evidence, verbal, or documentary was given or tendered to prove that the said Henry Hart was the owner of the property mentioned in the indictment.

The counsel for the prisoners objected to the production of the said copy of the London Gazette as evidence of the matters stated in the above notice, inasmuch as it was not made evidence of the truth of its contents; nor was it the proper evidence of the voluntary winding-up of a limited joint stock company or of the appointment of an official liquidator in such winding-up under the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act 1862 and 1867, or either of them, or any other statutory enactment; and that the London Gazette is not evidence of the truth of the contents of a notice inserted in it except by virtue of some statutory enactment.

1. That there was no evidence to go to the jury of the existence of the Cardigan Iron, Steel, and Wire Company (Limited), no certificate of incorporation being produced.

2. That the copy of the London Gazette produced was not evidence in this case, and did not prove the existence of the said company.

3. That if there was evidence to go to the jury of the existence of the said company, that it ought to have been proved that Henry Hart was the official liquidator of the said company, that there was no evidence to go to the jury of this, and that the copy of the London Gazette produced did not prove this.

I declined to stop the case and left it to the jury, and they returned a general verdict of guilty against both prisoners, but I deferred passing sentence until the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved could be had upon the points submitted on behalf of the prisoners, and granted bail.

The opinion of the Court is, therefore, requested.

1. Whether the prisoners were properly convicted, or

2. Whether the conviction ought to be quashed upon the objections, and the points or any of them submitted by the counsel for the prisoners at the bar.

HENRY LEATHAM, Deputy Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

Lord COLBRIDGE, C.J.—It appears to us to be clear that there was no evidence which could be fairly left to the jury to show that the brass stolen was the property of the prosecutor Hart, or that he had ever dealt with it as his property. The evidence was sufficient to show that he might have had a title to the property, but fails to show that he had ever taken possession of it.

The rest of the court concurred.

Conviction quashed.

HOLME v. GUY.

Charity—Endowed school—Dismissal of schoolmaster—Action of ejectment by governors of school against master—Consent of Charity Commissioners—"Suit or other proceeding"—Charitable Trusts Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 17. An action by the governors of an endowed school against the schoolmaster, whom they had dismissed, praying for an injunction to restrain him from teaching in the school, and from remaining in occupation of the school house or the land belonging thereto, is not a "suit, petition, or other proceeding" within the meaning of the 17th section of the Charitable Trusts Act 1853, so as to render it demurrable on the ground of the governors having commenced the action without having previously obtained the sanction of the Charity Commissioners.

Decision of Jessel, M.R., affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Jessel, M.R.

The hearing in the court below is reported ante (p. 306), where the facts of the case are sufficiently stated.

The Master of the Rolls held that the action, which was brought in the Chancery Division by the governors of the Ashby Endowed Grammar School against the master, whom they had dismissed, praying for an injunction to restrain him from teaching in the school, or for remaining in occupation of the school house and land belonging thereto, was not a "suit or other proceeding" within the 17th section of the Charitable Trusts Act 1853, so as to render it necessary for the governors to obtain the consent of the Charity Commissioners before commencing the action.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

Ince, Q.C. and Shebbeare, for the appellant.—The words of the 17th section of the Charitable Trusts Act are very wide, and require a certificate of the Board of Charity Commissioners to be obtained before the institution of any suit "for obtaining any relief, order, or direction, concerning or relating to any charity, or the estate, funds, property, or income thereof." The present action is clearly one for obtaining relief concerning a charity within the meaning of the section. [MELLISH, L.J.—According to your construction of the section, it would take away all the power of the trustees in dealing with the charity. JAMES, L.J.—The case made by the statement of claim is, that the defendant, having been dismissed, is a mere trespasser. The action is therefore a mere action of ejectment, and it surely cannot be contended that the 17th section of the Act was intended to apply to an action of that kind.] The language of the section is imperative. It forbids the institution of any suit until the sanction of the Charity Commissioners has been obtained. They referred to

The Charitable Trusts Act 1850 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 136),

Fischer, Q.C. and Cutler, for the respondents, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—I do not think that this is a case in which it was requisite for the governors of the school to obtain the certificate of the commissioners before commencing the action. It is obvious, from the nature of the 17th section of the Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), that it was never intended to interfere with the rights or powers of the trustees of a charity in their character of owners of property, or to interfere with their rights as masters employing servants. The object of the section in question was to prevent strangers from commencing expensive suits or other proceedings in Chancery for the purpose of raising a complaint against the management of a charity, or of preventing anyone from coming in, as is indicated in Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, or as in this case, for the purpose of complaining against the trustees for improperly dismissing a schoolmaster. Proceedings of this sort are not such proceedings as strangers ought to take unless the Charity Commissioners are first satisfied that they should be taken. But the object of the section was not to prevent the trustees of a charity from bringing an action of ejectment against a tenant holding over, or to prevent an action on the covenant against a tenant who will not pay his rent, or to prevent the taking of proceedings by way of distress against a defaulting tenant, or to prevent them from taking proceedings against a man who, as here, has been dismissed from his office, and yet will persist in presenting himself there, and in thrusting himself on the property of the charity—the object of the section was not to prevent the trustees of a charity from taking such proceedings as these without having first obtained the sanction of the Charity Commissioners. These are actions at law to which the Act of Parliament was not intended to apply. It may be said that there is a case to be tried, that the allegations in the statement of claim are not well-founded, and that the schoolmaster is entitled to retain his office, on the ground that he was not properly dismissed. That case cannot, however, be raised by demurrer, but must be raised by way of defence to the statement of claim. The order of the Master of the Rolls must, therefore, be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

MELLISH L.J., and BAGGALLAY J.A. concurred.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

THE DISS URBAN SANITARY AUTHORITY v.
ALDRICH.

Justice of the peace—Power to state case—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 305.

The power of justices to grant or refuse an order enabling a local authority to enter lands under sect. 305 of the Public Health Act of 1875 is wholly discretionary, their decision being, therefore, final.

The plaintiff applied to the justices under sect. 305 of the Public Health Act for an order authorising them, as the local authority, to enter upon certain lands of the defendant for the purposes of the Act. The application was dismissed, but the justices stated a case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, for the opinion of this court.

Held, that the justices had no power to state a case, as this was not the determination of a complaint within 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

The plaintiffs intended to construct a certain sewer under powers given to them by the Public Health Act 1875, and upon the report of their surveyor that it was necessary to enter upon defendant's land for that purpose, they served the defendant with notice to that effect; he refused to allow them to enter, whereupon they applied to the justices in petty sessions for an order authorising them "to enter into, through, or under the defendant's land, for the purpose of laying down an extension sewer for the purposes of the Public Health Act 1875. By sect. 305 of the Act, "if no sufficient cause is shown against the application, the court may make an order accordingly." The justices dismissed the application, but stated a case for the opinion of the court, as to whether they were right in law in doing so.

Wills, Q.C. (Hannen with him), for the defendant, raised the preliminary objection that the court had no jurisdiction, as the case was not within 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, which gives the justices power to state a case. It enacts that, "After the hearing and determination by a justice or justices of the peace of any information or complaint which he or they have power to determine in a summary way, by any law now in force, or hereafter to be made, either party to the proceedings before the said justice or justices, may, if dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, apply in writing . . . to the said justices to state and sign a case setting forth the grounds of such determination," &c. Here there was neither an information nor complaint. The application was merely for a licence to enter defendant's land. The justices "may" make the order—it is not "shall" make the order—whether they make the order or not rests wholly on their discretion. There is no cause of "complaint" against a man because he insists upon his own rights.

Lumley, for the plaintiffs.—The functions of the justices under sect. 305 are not purely discretionary, but they are to a certain extent judicial. They have to determine whether the entry is necessary or not for the purposes of the authority. The justices having exercised a judicial function, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, does apply. Besides, there is a complaint, for the defendant obstructs by his refusal the works of the local authority. [LUSH, J.—But the defendant has not done any wrong.] The 16th section gives the sanitary authority the right of entry for the purpose of making sewers, and this right is obstructed. [LUSH, J.—If they have the right, what necessity is there for this application?] The Act gives a right to enter under sect. 16, and the defendant refuses to allow that right to be exercised; the application is then made to the justices to enforce the right.

MELLOR, J.—If that were a "complaint" the word would apply to nearly every case in which the magistrates exercise jurisdiction. We have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

REG. v. W. COOPER.

False pretences—Proof—Construction of a letter. An indictment for false pretences alleged that the prisoner falsely pretended that he was a dealer in potatoes, and as such dealer in a large way of business, and in a position to do a good trade in potatoes, and able to pay for large quantities of potatoes as and when the same might be delivered to him.

The only evidence thereof was the following letter from prisoner to prosecutor: "Please send me one truck of Regents and one truck of Rocks as sample, at your prices named in your letter. Let them be good quality, and then I am sure a good trade will be done for both of us. I will remit you the cash on arrival of goods and invoice."

Held, that the false pretences alleged were proved, the letter reasonably conveying to the mind the construction put upon it in the indictment.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court at the West Riding of Yorkshire Quarter Sessions.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the West Riding of the county of York, holden at Wakefield, on the 2nd April 1877, the defendant William Cooper, was indicted for and convicted of having obtained 8 tons 15 cwt. and 2 qrs. of potatoes, the property of one John Gellatly, by false pretences. Copies of the indictment and of the letter of order for the potatoes, signed by the prisoner and addressed to John Gellatly containing the alleged false pretence, are subjoined.

"West Riding of Yorkshire to wit. The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that William Cooper, on the 17th Jan. 1877, at the parish of Sheffield, in the West Riding of the county of York, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did falsely pretend to one John Gellatly that he the said William Cooper then was a dealer in potatoes, and as such dealer in potatoes, then was in a large way of business, and that he, the said William Cooper, then was in position to do a good trade in potatoes, and that he, the said William Cooper, then was able to pay for large quantities of potatoes, as and when the same might be delivered to him, by means of which said false pretences, the said William Cooper, did then unlawfully obtain from the said John Gellatly, eight tons, fifteen hundred weights and two quarters of potatoes, of the goods and chattels of the said John Gellatly, with intent thereby then to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact, the said William Cooper was not then a dealer in potatoes, and was not then as such dealer in potatoes in a large way of business, and whereas in truth and in fact the said William Cooper was not then in a position to do a good trade in potatoes, and whereas in truth and in fact the said William Cooper was not then able to pay for large quantities of potatoes as and when the same should be delivered to him as he, the said William Cooper, well knew at the time when he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid; to the great damage and deception of the said John Gellatly, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her Crown and dignity.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further present that the said William Cooper afterwards, to wit, on the 17th Jan. 1877, at the parish aforesaid in the Riding aforesaid, did incur a certain debt and liability to one John Gellatly, to wit, a debt and liability to the amount of 32l. 16s. 8d., as and for the price of certain potatoes supplied to him, the said William Cooper, by the said John Gellatly. And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said William Cooper in incurring the said debt and liability, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did obtain credit from the said John Gellatly under false pretences, to wit, by falsely pretending to the said John Gellatly that he, the said William Cooper, then was a dealer in potatoes, and as such dealer in potatoes then was in a large way of business, and that he, the said William Cooper, then was in a position to do a good trade in potatoes, and that he, the said William Cooper, then was able to pay for large quantities of potatoes as and when the same might be delivered to him, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said William Cooper was not then a dealer in potatoes, and was not then as such dealer in potatoes in a large way of business, and whereas, in truth and in fact, the said William Cooper was not then in a position to do a good trade in potatoes and whereas, in truth and in fact, the said William Cooper was not then able to pay for large quantities of potatoes as and when the same should be delivered to him, as he, the said William Cooper, well knew at the time when he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid; to the great damage and deception of the said John Gellatly, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown, and dignity."

The following was a copy of the letter of the prisoner to the prosecutor:

Hamerton, Sheffield, Jan. 17th, 1876.

Dear Sir,—Please send me one truck of Regents and one truck of Rocks as sample at your prices named in your letter. Let them be good quality, then I am sure a good trade will be done for both of us. I will remit you cash on arrival of goods and invoice. Yours truly, WILLIAM COOPER.

P.S.—I may say if you use me well I shall be a good customer. An answer will oblige saying when they are put on.

It was amply proved in evidence that the prisoner when he ordered the Regents and Rocks, which are kinds of potatoes, had no intention of paying for them; that he held from time to time a stall in the public market, for which he paid by the day, and also dealt as a huckster carrying about fruit in a small cart drawn by a donkey; and several of the witnesses, though very well acquainted with him and his trade, were ignorant of his dealing in potatoes. The potatoes were sold by the prisoner in part at the railway station at a less cost than they would have stood to him, and as to the other part, when on receipt of a telegram from the seller inquiries were made by the railway people, the prisoner, who was at the railway station filling his sacks, left the potatoes and his sacks, and could not be heard of for several weeks, though the police were in active search of him.

C. OAS. R.]

REG. v. W. COOPER.

[C. OAS. R.]

It was contended by the prosecution that the letter of order of the prisoner amounted to a representation that he was a person trading in a considerable way, and that the order given was on a scale consistent with his ordinary transactions. Whereas his ordinary dealings were on a very small scale, to which the large order for potatoes was disproportionate, and that consequently the prisoner had misrepresented his real character and position, and thereby had made the false pretence alleged in the indictment. The falsehood of the pretence, supposing this construction be correct, being amply proved by evidence.

I left the case to the jury, holding that the contention of the prosecution was consistent with law, but leaving it to them, that if they thought the letter did not prove the false pretence, as alleged in the indictment, the prisoner should be acquitted.

The jury convicted, and the prisoner was admitted to bail, to appear to receive sentence at the next Quarter Sessions to be held at Bradford on the 2nd July next.

The opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown cases reserved is requested, whether upon the facts proved the defendant was properly convicted upon this indictment.

WM. ALDAM,

Chairman of Quarter Sessions for the West Riding of Yorkshire.

S. Tennant, for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. The letter of the 17th Nov. was the only evidence in proof of the false pretences alleged in the indictment. There was no light thrown upon that letter by any other evidence. It is consistent with the statements in the letter that the prisoner never had up to that time, dealt in potatoes, but that he was about to commence dealing in them. The words "sample" and "a good trade will be done" all have reference to the future. To sustain the conviction the false pretences charged must be necessarily contained by implication in the letter. The words "I will remit you the cash on the arrival of the goods" do not necessarily import present ability to pay for them. Where a person obtained money by the false pretence that he was going to pay his rent, it was held not to be a false pretence within the statute: (Reg. v. Lee, L. & C. 309; 9 Cox C. C. 304.) In Reg. v. Jenkinson (L. & C. 157; 9 Cox C. C. 158), where a married man obtained money from a woman by falsely representing himself to be unmarried, although there was no express statement by him to the woman that he was unmarried, yet that was necessarily conveyed by his promise to marry her. In Reg. v. Burrows (11 Cox C. C. 258), on an indictment for fraudulently obtaining goods in a market by falsely pretending that a room had been taken at which to pay the market people for their goods, the jury found that the well-known practice was for buyers to engage a room at a public-house, and that the prisoner pretending to be a buyer, conveyed to the minds of the market people that she had engaged such a room, and that they parted with their goods on such belief; yet it was held that there being no evidence that the prisoner knew of such a practice, and the case being consistent with a promise only on her part to engage such a room, and pay for the goods there, a conviction could not be sustained. The cases of

Reg. v. Giles, L. & C. 502; 10 Cox C. C. 44; and Reg. v. Hasleton, L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 134; and 18 Cox C. C. 1, were also cited.

Lockwood, for the prosecution.—It is sufficient if, upon the evidence produced, the false pretences will reasonably bear the construction imputed by the indictment. They need not be the necessary implication from the acts and conduct of the accused—the test is, what conclusion would a man reasonably draw from them? In Reg. v. Barnard (7 C. & P. 764), the wearing of a commoner's cap and gown at Oxford naturally suggested that the person wearing them was a student at the university. So here, the giving of a large order by the prisoner, and the suggestion that a good trade might be done, naturally conveyed the idea that the prisoner was in a large way of business. So the promise to remit cash on the arrival of the goods naturally imports that the prisoner was able to pay for them. In Reg. v. Giles Blackburn, J. said, "It is not necessary that the false pretence should be made in express words, if the idea is conveyed." Taking the whole of the defendant's letter together, the idea was conveyed that the prisoner was a dealer in potatoes, in a good way of business, and able to pay for the potatoes he ordered on their arrival.

Tennant was heard in reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question for the court, as I understand the case, is whether there was evidence upon which the false pretences alleged in the indictment could fairly be sustained. The indictment alleges that the prisoner falsely pretended that he was a dealer in potatoes, and as such dealer, then, was in a large way of business, and that he was in a position to do a good trade in potatoes, and that he then was able to pay for large quantities of potatoes as and when the same might be delivered to him, and that a large quantity of potatoes was obtained by means of those false pretences. It is not contended by the prisoner's counsel that if the false pretences were truly alleged in the indictment they were negatived by the evidence. The question is whether the letter set out in the case, which was the only evidence of the false pretences, sustains the allegations thereof in the indictment. At first I was under the impression that it was enough for the prisoner to show that the false pretences alleged to be conveyed by the letter to the prosecutor did not necessarily arise from the letter, but that if the letter would bear an innocent construction the charge would not be made out; but upon consideration I am satisfied that that was a mistaken view, and that it was a question for the jury whether the false pretences alleged did or did not reasonably arise from the letter. I have no desire to protect persons who conduct their business in a loose and careless manner, but at the same time we must be guided in our decisions by the principles of the criminal law. The true principle applicable to this case was well enunciated by Blackburn, J., during the course of the argument in Reg. v. Giles, "it is not requisite that the false pretence should be made in express words if the idea is conveyed." The question in all these cases is what was intended to be conveyed to the mind of the prosecutor by the acts, silence, or conduct of the prisoner. If a particular idea is intended to be conveyed to his mind, and was conveyed, and if it be false, the statute is complied with. In the present case the prisoner by his letter did mean to tell the prosecutor, or at least it may reasonably and consistently be read to tell, what the indictment alleges to be the false pretences whereby the potatoes were fraudulently obtained. I am of opinion, therefore, that the conviction was right, and should be affirmed.

O. CAS. R.]

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD v. MURPHY.

[Q.B. DIV.]

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LUSH, J.—The substantial question is whether there was any evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find that the false pretences alleged were made by the prisoner. The falsity of the pretences alleged was abundantly proved, and the only question is, whether there was evidence of the pretences as alleged, in other words, were those pretences, or either of them, proved to have been made by the prisoner. There must be a false pretence of an existing fact which may be proved by the act or words of the prisoner, or by both combined. If it is to be proved by words, it is not necessary that the words should bear but one meaning—it is sufficient if they are fairly capable of bearing the meaning imputed to them in the indictment. In this case the question is whether the prisoner intended, by his letter to the prosecutor, to convey the meaning put upon it in the indictment, and did the prosecutor so understand the letter? If so, the letter is just as much evidence of the false pretences charged as if the very words had been in the letter. I am of opinion that this letter is capable of the meaning imputed to it by the allegations of the false pretences in the indictment. If a man orders goods by a letter in those terms without any further explanation, that letter is fairly capable of the meaning of it imputed in the indictment. The jury found that it was capable of that meaning, and the letter was read by the prosecutor in that sense. I therefore think the conviction should be sustained.

DENMAN, J.—I agree with the judgment of the court, but I still entertain considerable doubt about one part of the case. I doubt whether we are not going too far in holding that the letter contains a representation of facts. There is one statement in the letter which, when construed by one of the decided cases may amount to a false statement of fact, and in that view I think the conviction may be upheld, but upon no other part of the letter do I think that there is any representation of a fact. It appears to me that if the letter had said merely, "Please send me one truck of Regents," &c., &c., it would not have been sufficient to establish the false pretences alleged. Then as to the latter clause, "I will remit you the cash on arrival of the goods," that appears to me to be a mere promise and not a statement that the prisoner had actually then the means of remitting cash. But there is an intermediate statement. "Let them be good quality, then I am sure a good trade will be done for both of us," which may be considered to be a statement of fact. In Reg. v. Giles the prisoner pretended that he had power to bring the prosecutrix's husband back, and that was held to be a statement of fact. That warrants us in holding that where a man is not in a position to do what he professes he will do at a given time, he is making a false statement of fact. The indictment charges that the prisoner falsely pretended that he then was able to pay for large quantities of potatoes, as and when the same might be delivered to him, and that pretence,

I think, is proved by the letter. I am, therefore, warranted in agreeing with the judgment of the court.

POLLOCK, B.—Having heard the whole of the argument, I have come to the conclusion that the conviction should be affirmed. It is not sufficient for the prisoner to show that the letter might bear another meaning, if it is reasonably capable of bearing the meaning imputed to it in the indictment. It is the duty of the prisoner to show by special circumstances that it bore the construction he contends for. I think that the false pretences charged may be fairly inferred from the letter, and that the conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by J. M. LELY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, April 13, 1877.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD v. MURPHY.

Education—Neglect of child to attend school—Prosecution of parent under bye law—Habitual neglect of parent proved—Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), s. 74—Elementary Education Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79), s. 11.

Where a parent habitually neglects to provide instruction for his child, it is not in the discretion of the local authority to proceed against the parent for a fine under one of their bye laws, but they are bound to apply, under the Education Act of 1876, to a court of summary jurisdiction for an order compelling the child to attend some certified efficient school.

By a bye law made under the powers of the Education Act of 1870, s. 74, the parent of every child of not less than five, nor more than thirteen years of age is required to cause such child to attend school, and by another bye law under the same section every parent not observing the bye law is liable to a penalty of 5s., which penalty is by virtue of the same section recoverable in a summary manner.

By sect. 11 of the Elementary Education Act 1876, it is enacted that "if the parent of any child above the age of five years habitually and without reasonable excuse neglects to provide efficient elementary instruction for his child, it shall be duty of the local authority to complain to a court of summary jurisdiction," which court "may order that the child do attend some certified efficient school willing to receive him."

The child of the defendant having failed to attend school, the prosecutors summoned him before a stipendiary magistrate under their bye law. The facts proved at the hearing of the summons amounted in the opinion of the magistrate to an "habitual neglect" on the part of the parent within the meaning of the 11th section of the Act of 1876. Thereupon the magistrate dismissed the summons under the bye law, but offered to grant a summons under the Act.

Held, that the magistrate was right, and a rule calling upon him to act under the bye law discharged.

[Q.B. Div.]

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD v. MURPHY.

[Q.B. Div.]

THIS was a rule under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5, calling upon John Bridge, Esq., stipendiary magistrate of the Wandsworth and Hammersmith Police Court, to show cause why he should not grant a summons against one J. Murphy for unlawfully neglecting to cause his child to attend school, in contravention of a bye law made by the London School Board under the authority of the 74th section of the Elementary Education Act 1870.

The facts were that the School Board had applied to the magistrate for a summons against J. Murphy under a bye law made by them as above stated. The magistrate had asked certain questions of the School Board Officer who applied for the summons, and coming to the conclusion from the answers to such questions that the parent had habitually neglected to provide education for the child, refused to grant the summons applied for, on the ground that the offence came within the meaning of the 11th section of the Elementary Education Act 1876.

The following sections of the Education Acts are material:

Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), s. 74:

Every School Board may from time to time, with the approval of the education department, make bye laws for any of the following purposes: (1.) Requiring the parents of children of such age not less than five years, nor more than thirteen years, as may be fixed by the bye laws, to cause such children (unless there is some reasonable excuse) to attend school. . . . (4.) Imposing penalties for the breach of such bye laws. . . . Any proceeding to enforce any bye law may be taken, and any penalty for the breach of any bye law may be recovered, in a summary manner. . . .

Elementary Education Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79), s. 11:

11. If either—

- (1.) The parent of any child above the age of five years, who is under this Act prohibited from being taken into full time employment, habitually and without reasonable excuse, neglects to provide efficient elementary instruction for his child; or
- (2.) Any child is found habitually wandering or not under proper control, or in the company of rogues, vagabonds, disorderly persons, or reputed criminals;

It shall be the duty of the local authority, after due warning to the parent of such child, to complain to a court of summary jurisdiction, and such court may, if satisfied of the truth of such complaint, order that the child do attend some certified efficient school willing to receive him and named in the order, being either such as the parent may select, or, if he do not select any, then such public elementary school as the court think expedient; and the child shall attend that school every time that the school is open, or in such other regular manner as is specified in the order.

An order under this section is in this Act referred to as an attendance order.

Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse:

- (1.) That there is not within two miles, measured according to the nearest road, from the residence of such child, any public elementary school open which the child can attend; or
- (2.) That the absence of the child from school has been caused by sickness or any unavoidable cause.

Sect. 50:

Where any act, neglect, or default is punishable under this Act, and also under any other enactment or any bye law made a School Board or other local authority for the time being in force, proceedings may be instituted in respect of such act, neglect, or default under this Act, or such other enactment or bye law, in the discretion of the authority or person instituting the proceedings, so that proceedings under one enactment or bye law only be instituted in respect of the same act, neglect, or default; and any bye law made either before or after the commencement of this Act by any School Board or other local authority under sect. 74 of the Elementary Education Act 1870, if otherwise valid, shall not be rendered invalid by reason that it is more stringent than the provisions of this Act; and nothing in this Act shall prejudice the effect of or derogate from any provision relating to the committal of children to industrial schools or the employment of children contained in any previous Act of Parliament which may be more stringent in its provisions than this Act.

The following bye laws (inter alia) had been made by the prosecutors:

No. 2. The parent of every child of not less than five years nor more than thirteen years, is required to cause such child to attend school, unless there be some reasonable excuse for non-attendance.

No. 7. Every parent who shall not observe or shall neglect or violate these bye laws or any of them shall, upon conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5s. including costs, for each offence.

Ottaway showed cause, and argued that the words of the 11th section of the Elementary Education Act 1876, were imperative, and left no option to the School Board to proceed under the bye law against a person guilty of "habitual neglect" within the meaning of that section; and that it followed from this that as soon as the "habitual neglect" under the 11th section was proved, the jurisdiction of the magistrate to convict under the bye law was gone.

Holl, Q.C. (Fullarton with him) in support of the rule, argued that the School Board had a discretion to proceed under the bye law or the 11th section of the Act of 1876, and that the School Board, and not the court of summary jurisdiction, were the proper judges whether a particular parent ought to be proceeded against under the bye law or the statute, and they relied strongly on the express words of sect. 50 of the Act of 1876, by which bye laws under sect. 74 of the Act of 1870, were preserved intact.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the stipendiary magistrate was right. The only question is, whether the School Board might have proceeded under the bye law, or whether they were bound to proceed under the 11th section of the Elementary Education Act of 1876. Now it seems to me that the offence under the bye law and the statute are perfectly distinct, the offence under the bye law being an isolated offence, and the offence under the statute being an habitual one. If the offence under the statute be proved, the magistrate obtains power to deal with the child in the manner pointed out by the statute, but not otherwise. The School Board, however, maintain that they may adopt whichever mode of proceeding they please, and this contention is attempted to be supported by a reference to the 50th section of the Act of 1876, by which the powers of the School Board to proceed under the bye laws is expressly preserved. At first I was much struck by the argument founded upon this 50th section, but upon consideration I think that the words of the 11th section are too forcible and express for that argument to prevail. The 11th section does not deal with one act, but with a series of acts, and provides that "it shall be the duty" of the local authority to proceed against the parent in the manner and for the purposes pointed out. Words like these leave not one atom of discretion in the local authority. What happened here was that the School Board sought to prove an offence under the bye law, and in fact proved an offence under the statute. That being so, it became their duty to proceed under the statute, and it became the duty of the magistrate to dismiss the summons under the bye law. The protection of the child is the main object of this legislation, and that object would not be attained by granting a summons under the bye law.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I had at first some doubt whether the School Board had not a discretion to proceed under the bye law. But when I consider the whole policy of the Education Acts, I see that the bye law applies to ordinary, and the statute applies to extraordinary, cases. The great object of these Acts is to secure the education of children, and that object is sought to be attained, in the case of parents unable or unwilling to have their children educated, by the wide and important provisions of the 11th section of the Act of 1876. As soon as the magistrate found that an offence under the statute was proved, he was justified in dismissing the summons under the bye law, inasmuch as the School Board have no power to free themselves from the obligations imposed by the 11th section.

REG. v. CUMBERLEGE AND OTHERS.

Vestry clerk, remuneration of—Preparation of valuation list—Disallowance by auditor—Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 7—Vestry Clerks Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 57), s. 7.

By the Vestry Clerks' Act, sect. 7, the vestry clerk is to make out, when required by the vestry, the poor rate, and to assist the churchwardens or overseers in preparing and making out all other parochial assessments or accounts. And by the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act, s. 7, the overseers of a parish may charge any expense incurred by them, with the consent of the vestry, in making out any valuation list upon the poor rate.

The vestry of the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, having charged in their accounts the sum of 100l. paid to their vestry clerk for preparing the valuation list, the poor law auditor disallowed the charge on the grounds (1), that the preparing of the vestry list was among the statutory duties of the vestry clerk, for which his salary, under the statute, was to be taken as payment; and (2) that the charge was excessive, in the absence of particular evidence that any person had received any part of the 100l.

Held, by Lush, J., that the valuation list was not an assessment, that the amount charged might have been and had been sanctioned by the vestry, that the claim of the vestry clerk was not restricted to disbursements out of pocket, and that a rule to quash the disallowance upon certiorari ought to be made absolute.

This was a rule to quash on certiorari the disallowance by Hugh Lloyd Roberts, Poor Law Auditor of the Metropolitan Poor Law Audit District, of the sum of 100l. paid to John Olaxton Button, Vestry Clerk of the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex, in accordance with the resolution of the vestry of the parish for his services in preparing the valuation list, and to quash also the surcharge of the said sum of 100l. upon the Reverend Samuel Francis Cumberlege, George Bell and William Barringer.

The following are extracts from the return to the writ of certiorari:

The following entries appeared on the payments side of the account of the parish of Saint Paul, Covent Garden, for the half year ending 25th March, 1876:

	£	s.	d.
February 7. John C. Button, preparing, &c., valuation list	100	0	0
March 25. Messrs. Shaw and Sons' Subscription to the Justice of the Peace	1	4	6

The following was the certificate of disallowance entered in the book of account of the parish:

I do hereby certify that in the account of the half year ended at Lady Day, 1876, of the Vestry Churchwardens and Overseers of the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, I have disallowed the sum of 101l. 4s. 6d. as payments illegally made out of the funds of the said parish.

And I find that Samuel Francis Cumberlege, clerk in holy orders, George Bell, and William Barringer, Esquires, authorised the making of a portion of such illegal payments, to wit, of the sum of 100l., and I do hereby surcharge upon them the sum of 100l., and I do hereby further certify that the said sum of 100l. is due from them.

And I find that Samuel Francis Cumberlege, clerk in holy orders, George Bell and James Richmond and John Coutts, Esquires, authorised the making of the remainder of such illegal payments, to wit, the sum of 1l. 4s. 6d.; and I do hereby surcharge upon them the sum of 1l. 4s. 6d., and I do hereby further certify that the sum of 1l. 4s. 6d. is due from them.

As witness my hand this 31st day of July, 1876.

(Signed) H. LLOYD ROBERTS,

Auditor of the Metropolitan Audit District.

The following was the statement of reasons entered in the book of account of the parish of Saint Paul, Covent Garden, with respect to the disallowance of the sum of 100l.:

In the account of receipts and payments with respect to the poor rates for the half year ended at Lady Day, 1876, of the Vestry, Churchwardens, and Overseers of the Poor of the Parish of Saint Paul, Covent Garden, I disallowed the sum of 101l. 4s. 6d., which sum is composed of the undermentioned items, entered and charged in the said account as and for payments made out of the poor rates of the said parish, to wit:

	£	s.	d.
Mr. John C. Button, the Vestry Clerk of the said Parish, for preparing the valuation list	100	0	0
Messrs. Shaw and Sons Subscription to the Justice of the Peace	1	4	6

£101 4 6

A statement of my reasons being required with respect to the sum of 100l., a portion of such disallowance, I now state that I made such disallowance because the said sum is charged in respect of work and labour performed by Mr. Button, the vestry clerk of the said parish, which come within the official duties imposed upon vestry clerks by the statutes in that behalf made and provided; and because the vestry clerk of the said parish was bound, as part of his official duties, to have performed the duties in respect of which such sum was charged without any fee or recompense beyond the annual salary of 150l. which he enjoys and receives as such vestry clerk, and because the said vestry, churchwardens, and overseers were not authorised in law to make such payment and charge the amount thereof upon the poor rates of the said parish, and because no statements of particulars, with vouchers of payments, were produced to me with regard to the payment of any part of such sum of 100l. by the said vestry clerk to any other person or persons.

[Q.B. Div.]

And I surcharge the sum of 100*l.* upon Samuel Francis Cumberlege, clerk in holy orders, George Bell, Esquire, and William Barringer, Esquire, because they authorised the making of the illegal payment.

Dated this 3rd day of August, 1876.

(Signed) H. LLOYD ROBERTS,
District Auditor.

From the affidavit of Mr. Button it appeared that at a meeting of the said vestry, duly convened for and duly held on the 16th April 1875, and at which meeting inter alia the business had relation to the making of the valuation list for the parish, it was duly resolved "That the churchwardens and overseers be appointed a committee for the purpose of preparing the Valuation List 1875, assisted by the vestry clerk, and that they be authorised to employ such assistance as they may deem necessary for that purpose;" and that such resolution was duly recorded in the minute book of the meetings of the said vestry.

At the time the said resolution was so come to, Mr. Button received from the vestry definite instructions to prepare the said list on behalf of the said committee, and to do all such things as might be necessary, and to employ such assistance as he might think needful in the matter, for saving the committee labour and time in connexion therewith, and to bring forward the subject of his remuneration at a future time, when the vestry would be in a position to judge of the amount and value of the labour performed by him in the matter.

At a meeting of the said vestry duly held on the 7th Feb. 1876, and of the holding of which said meeting, and the purposes thereof, notice had been duly given, it was by express resolution resolved, "That this vestry (being the body of persons performing the duties of overseers so far as regards the duties of assessment, making and collecting of rates for the relief of the poor of this parish) hereby acknowledging that the expenses incurred and labour bestowed by the clerk to this vestry, of, and occasioned by, and incident to, and incurred in making the Valuation List 1875, for this parish, were incurred, undertaken, and bestowed, with the consent, by the direction, and under the authority of this vestry, by virtue of its express resolution for such purpose so intended, come to at a vestry meeting held on the 16th April last, after due notice given, hereby expressly resolves that the sum of 100*l.* be paid to Mr. John C. Button, the clerk to this vestry, as special remuneration to him in respect of such his expenses and labours, and this vestry authorises such sum to be charged upon the poor rate of this parish." Such meeting was attended by numbers of the vestry equal to two-thirds of the entire elective strength of the vestry, and after going very fully into and discussing the question of the amount to be paid to him by way of remuneration, the said resolution was, with the exception of the vote of one number, carried unanimously. The said resolution was duly recorded in the minute book of the meetings of the said vestry, and the said sum of 100*l.* was thereupon paid to Mr. Button by the cheque in respect of which the surcharge now complained of was made.

Such payment was supported before the auditor by production of the notices of the meetings of the vestry above referred, and of the minute book containing the resolutions of the said vestry above set out, and by a receipt, as follows :

St. Paul, Covent Garden, London, W.C.,

JOHN C. BUTTON.

The item having been objected to, Mr. Button, after some verbal explanations, wrote to the auditor, prior to the actual disallowance, in the following terms :

Vestry Clerks' Office, St. Paul, Covent Garden,
London, 29th July 1876.

Valuation List, 1875.

Dear Sir,—Before you proceed to allowance or disallowance of the 100*l.* charged in the accounts of this vestry for the half year ending Lady Day last as a payment to me for valuation expenses, I desire to lay before you in writing an epitome of the verbal explanation given by me to you on Thursday last. The labour, &c., was undertaken pursuant to resolutions of the vestry, and a general and fair estimate thereof may be formed from the following outline :—Perusing, collating, and extracting information, and making calculations from Government returns, many attendances and inquiries for the purpose of obtaining additional information, and the viewing of properties, and in various attendances upon owners, affording them explanation to enable them to make returns, finally digesting and reducing information into shape and drafting new list at the suggestion of the Government authorities, attendances on the surveyor of taxes, going through the entire list and returns with him, with a view to bring figures into accord.—Subsequently attending the vestry committee, going through calculations and entire list again with them, and obtaining their approval of and sanction to list as submitted, and ultimately preparing list in duplicate, and obtaining signatures, &c.—Attendances before assessment committee to support list when such committee determined not to revise, on the ground that such list was invalid.—Attendances on Local Government Board, and upon clerk to assessment committee, discussing the matter in all its bearings, and afterwards obtaining from vestry full power to take all needful steps to maintain validity of list, as a preliminary step to proceedings to uphold list, searching, perusing, and consulting Acts of Parliament, and other matter, to enable me to exhaustively prepare case for opinion of counsel.—Preparing case, with usual attendant legal expenses, and ultimately obtaining counsel's opinion that the list was perfectly valid, further attendance upon and correspondence with clerk to assessment committee, submitting opinion, and such committee determined likewise to take counsel's opinion; several attendances upon its clerk, going into, and affording him such information as he required, many of the facts being otherwise out of his reach, to enable him to prepare case, and when drafted, going through same with him in long conference, and finally settling same.—Attendances upon revision, upon the committee determining to proceed with list, and upon appeals. The performance of the above cost out of my own pocket upwards of 40*l.*, in obtaining the services of a skilled accountant, to verify figures and calculations, &c., and in payment of proportionate part of the salary to a clerk, whose services were for a considerable time exclusively devoted to the preparation of list, beyond fee to counsel, 6*l.* 16*s.*, besides various minor items of incidental expenses. The whole of the above facts and circumstances were within the knowledge, or brought under the notice of the vestry, at the time of its deliberation upon the amount I should receive; considerable discussion ensued on that occasion, and the vestry, being largely attended, ultimately resolved (some members proposed I should receive more, one less) that 100*l.* would be reasonable remuneration, such sum to cover services rendered in preparation of list, and all legal charges connected with sustaining the same. The first resolution was passed 16th April 1875, and matters were not complete till end of November. If you require any further information, I shall be happy to afford it.—I beg to remain, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

H. Lloyd Roberts, Esq.

JOHN C. BUTTON.

The statements in the above letter were corroborated by the chairman of the Vestry meeting, and Mr. Button's affidavit concluded as follows :

It is not true, as stated by the said auditor in his said "reasons," that no statement of particulars, with vouchers of payment, were produced to him with regard to the payment of any part of such sum of 100*l*. I produced to him the case for opinion of counsel referred to in paragraph 6 of this my affidavit, with usual receipt thereon for the fee of 5*l*. 16*s*. referred to in my letter to him above set out, and although I explained to him it was not customary for solicitors to take receipts from clerks for their wages, I offered to procure a receipt from the clerk referred to in my said letter, and to verify the payment in any manner he might think proper.

[Q.B. Div.]

Notwithstanding the ground stated by the said auditor in his said "reasons" that this work and labour performed by me in respect of which I was paid the sum disallowed, comes within the official duties imposed upon me as vestry clerk as aforesaid, and that I was bound, as part of such my duties, to perform the duties in respect of which the allowance was made without fee or recompense beyond my annual salary. I am enabled to state as a fact, from inquiries to that effect made by me, that in various instances the said auditor, as the auditor of the accounts of various metropolitan parishes, has allowed the expenses incurred in the preparation of the valuation list 1875, of such parishes respectively, the clerks to the vestries of such parishes respectively holding their appointments as such by virtue of the same statute under which I hold the appointment of Clerk to the Vestry of St. Paul, Covent-garden, aforesaid. In some of such instances a resolution under the statute 27 & 28 Vict., c. 39, sect. 7, was alone relied upon in support of the items allowed by the said auditor, in others details were likewise produced to the said auditor, and in some of such instances it was disclosed on the face of the accounts and documents laid before the same auditor that such, or portions of such, voted moneys were paid to the vestry.

A. Glen (McIntyre, Q.C., with him) for the auditor, showed cause, and argued that the disallowance was right, on both grounds stated by the auditor. He cited

Ex parte Melish, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47;

Reg. v. Guyer, 2 A. & E. 216;

Reg. v. Glyde, 2 M. & S. 323 N.;

Reg. v. Chorlton upon Medlock, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 326; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. D. 62; 45 L. J. 33, M. C.

A. Wills, Q.C. (Lewis Glyn with him) for the vestry, supported the rule, and argued that the disallowance was wrong on both grounds. This audit is not between the vestry clerk and the parish, but between the overseers and the parish, and the services in respect of which the overseers made the payment disallowed, are entirely outside the statutory duties of the vestry clerk, as may be seen by reference to 13 & 14 Vict., c. 57, sect. 7.

Our adv. vult.

May 2.—The written judgment of the court (LUSH, J.) was delivered by that learned judge as follows:—This is a rule to quash the disallowance by the Poor Law Auditor of the Metropolitan Audit District of a sum of 100*l*., charged in the accounts of the Vestry of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, as a payment made to their vestry clerk for preparing the valuation list required by the 32 & 33 Vict., c. 67, and the surcharge of that sum upon the members of the committee who authorized the alleged illegal payment. The reasons stated by the auditor for the disallowances are, "That the work came within the official duties imposed upon vestry clerks by statute, and for which they are therefore remunerated by the salary assigned to them: and because 100*l*. is an excessive charge, no statement of particulars with vouchers of payment having been produced with regard to the payment of any part of such sum to any other person." The 7th section of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864 (the 27 & 28 Vict., c. 39) enacts that "when the overseers of any parish incur any expense in making out any valuation list, &c., with the consent of the vestry given by express resolution, after due notice they may charge such expense, so far as the same may be authorized by the vestry, upon the poor rate." The first resolution passed by the vestry on the subject appointed the churchwardens and overseers a committee for preparing the valuation list 1875, assisted by the vestry clerk, and the committee were clearly authorized to employ such assistance as they might deem necessary for that purpose. It is stated by the vestry clerk in his affidavit, and is not questioned, that at the time the resolution was come to he received from the vestry definite instructions to prepare the said list on behalf of the committee, and to do all such things as might be necessary and to employ such assistance as he might think needful in the matter for saving the committee labour and time in connection therewith, and to bring forward the subject of his remuneration therefore at a future time, when the vestry would be in a position to judge of the amount and value of the labour performed by him in the matter. After the list was made, which, as appears by the affidavit, involved a considerable amount of labour and expense, the vestry passed the following resolution: "That this vestry hereby acknowledging that the expenses incurred and labour bestowed by the clerk to this vestry of and occasioned by and incidental to, and incurred in making the valuation list, 1875, for this parish, were incurred, undertaken, and bestowed with the consent, by the direction, and under the authority of this vestry by virtue of its express resolution for such purpose so intended come to at a vestry meeting held on the 10th April last, after due notice given, hereby expressly resolve that the sum of 100*l*. be paid to Mr. John C. Button, the clerk to this vestry, as special remuneration to him in respect of such his expenses and labour; and this vestry authorises such sum to be charged upon the poor rate of this parish." These resolutions satisfy all the requirements of the 7th section of the Act. The expense was incurred with the consent of the vestry, given by express resolution after due notice, and the amount charged is the precise amount authorised by the vestry to be paid. The question therefore is whether the duty of preparing the valuation list is a duty attaching to the office of vestry clerk as such, for, if it is, the payment of 100*l*., or any part of it, for the service was a mere gratuity, and the vestry had no authority to charge it upon the poor rate. As no duties other than those prescribed by the Vestry Clerks' Act, the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 57, have been imposed on the vestry clerk of this parish, we must look to the 7th section of that Act in order to determine whether this particular work is included either in terms or by reasonable intentment within the range of his duties. That section requires him, amongst other things, to "make out when required by the vestry the church rate, and procure the same to be signed and completed, and when there is no collection of poor rates, or assistant overseer to make out the poor rate, and procure the same to be allowed and to make all the subsequent entries in the rate-book, and to give the notices thereof required by law"; also "to assist the churchwardens or overseers in making out all other parochial assessments or accounts, and in examining the accounts of the collectors of such assessments." These are the only words to be found in the Act upon which an argument can be founded, and I think it is plain that they do not bear the construction contended for. The valuation list is not an "assessment" which in this clause is evidently used as synonymous with "rate." It is only a draft or proposal, which, when adopted and settled by the assessment committee, is to become the basis of an assessment. That the word assessment could not have been intended to include a valuation list is clear, for no such thing had been thought of at the time the Vestry Clerks' Act passed. The work in question is in truth a new duty imposed by the Assessment Committee Act, not a substitute for, but an addition to the former duties of overseers for which no provision is made other than this, that the overseers are responsible for its being done, and are authorised to charge the expense of doing it upon the poor rate. It is, of course, implied that the expense they incur must be reasonably proportioned to the service they require. It is the duty of the auditor to see that the authority to charge is not made a pretext for extravagance or favouritism. Nothing of the kind is suggested here, nor does the auditor find that the amount allowed by the vestry is more than the services required and performed are fairly worth, or than the vestry would have had to pay if they had employed a stranger. His reason for disallowing it is that it was part of the duty of the vestry clerk to do it, and that it was included in his salary. In this I am of opinion that he was mistaken. His reason for not allowing even the expenses out of pocket might have been sufficient if the vestry clerk were entitled only to what he had been obliged to expend. But they are not put forward as a separate charge, and they were taken into account by the vestry in assessing the gross sum, and there is nothing to show that that was not a reasonable allowance to cover both the work and the outlay. The rule must therefore be made absolute with costs.

Rule absolute.
